Presented to

"Universal Historical Series"

By J. P. MacLean,

Hamilton, O.

Dec. 12th, 1881.

WITHDRAWN

ST. PAUL'S SUNDAY SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
JE
379

STARR KING SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
2441 LE CONTE AVENUE
BERKELEY, CALIF. 94709

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE

AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

DEVOTED TO

THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL RELIGION, FREE INQUIRY, RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, AND INTELLIGENCE.

AARON B. GROSH, EDITOR; ABNER R. BARTLETT, ASSISTANT EDITOR.
G. W. MONTGOMERY AND E. H. CHAPIN, CORRESPONDING EDITORS.

VOLUME IX.---NEW SERIES.

UTICA:

A. B. GROSH AND O. HUTCHINSON, PUBLISHERS.

1838.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/gtu_32400007787801_9-10

INDEX TO VOLUME IX.....NEW SERIES.

DIRECTIONS.—Seek, first, the title—probably under a, an, or the, if not, under the principal noun or adjective—then the class or subject. For Ordinations, etc., see The Record—for comments, etc., on Scripture, see Scriptures explained. A. B. G.

Abusive letters 229
A chapter 122
Active virtue 328
Address of B. Bailey, Jr., 275—to Deity, by W. C. 219—to life 227
A fault among Universalists 332
A fragment 203
Agents, lists of 80, 96, 104, 112, 151—for periodicals 85
A good reply 370—rule in reading the Bible 176
Aion 179
A leaf from prayerful meditation 287
A misunderstanding 239—corrected 47
A mother's love 120
An answer 259
An appeal to the public 109
Ancient Universalists 389
Anecdotes 88, 171, 376—by John 155
An examination of Taylor's Diegesis 127
Angels 370
Another conversion from Universalism 43
A plan to revive societies 102
Apologetic and expostulatory 367
A Query, S. Goff 114, 132—A. F. 308
Arabia and Palestine 368
Are holidays happy days? 408
A reason for the hope that is in us 154
A reminiscence 315
A request to Editors—information wanted 173
A sister 184
A slandering liar detected 255
ASSOCIATIONS—Murray, O., 119, 319—Hartford county, Conn. 175—Central, N. Y., 195—Mohawk, 205—Niagara, Genesee, Black River, 213—Merrimack, Somerset, 214—Otsego, 235—St. Lawrence, 245—Allegany, 247—Southern, Western Reserve, Chatahochee, Northern, 279—Chautauque, Steuben, Chenango, 307—Pittsburg, Kennebec, Rockingham, Y. C. and Oxford, 319—Penobscot, Washington, O., Cheshire county, N. H., 327—New-York, 347—Hudson River, 347. 351—Cayuga, 355—Richland, Strafford county, N. H., Susquehanna, Quinnebaug, Lincoln and Waldo, 374.
Astonishing facts relative to a former world 336
Assumption not argument 404
A word about going to church 204
A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES—Introduction 19—Female influence 33—Early associates 65—Forming the manners 73—The habits 89—Domestic duties 97—Dress 105—Recreations 113—Mental cultivation, 121—The disposition—Conversation 129—Self government 137—Marriage, 145.
A voice to husbands, etc. 398, 399
Be cautious—W O* 311, 351
Beneficence in spirit 163
"Be not overcome of evil" 174
Biblical Interpretations—(for texts, see SCRIPTURES—) 74, 93, 202, 209, 220, 228, 234, 302, 309, 318, 334, 343, 349, 367, 373, 381, 390, 405
Bigotry and superstition, etc. 317
Bless and be blessed 66
Brotherly love 184, 230
Calumny 211
Campbell, Alexander (see THEOLOGICAL DIS.)
Candor 333
Capital punishment 15
Card—A. Peck 147—T. P. Abell 175 271
CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED—False position of unbelievers 1—Objections from Geology 57—Astronomy 161—Bigotry of unbelievers 201—Responsibility of do. 257—Internal evidences of Revelation—Character of the Deity 361.
Causes of misery 171
Change, J. M. E. 43—Editorial 159, 269
Chanting, Dr. 296
Characteristics of the Caribs 352
Charity, A. R. B. 343—S. Barden 44
Christ, our exemplar 141—a reconciliator 208—a Saviour 252—despised and rejected of men 170
Christians 381
Christian kindness 112—religion 395
Christianity and female character 152
Church music 150
Circulars—see Associations and Conventions
Clinton Liberal Institute 167, 271, Examination, etc. 287, 299, 316, 371
Coldness and indifference of Universalists 228
Combe, Geo., Esq. 77, 87
Coming out from the world 219
Competency of testimony 320
CONFERENCES—Union at South New-Berlin 36—North Norwich 76—Pavilion 101, 109—in Michigan 125—Hudson River Association 131—Western N. Y. 213, 335, 341—Constantia, Knoxville 335—Allegany Association 366—see THE RECORD.
Confidence in God 237—propriety of 28
Consistency 396
Consolation of the Gospel 306
Constitutions, society and church, 77—Ohio city Institute 323.
CONVENTIONS—New-York [175] 183, 187—Pennsylvania 187, 263—Massachusetts 214—Illinois 214, 263—United States 261, 324, 364, 372—New-Hampshire 263—South Carolina, Vermont, Connecticut 319—Ohio, 374.
Conversion of the apostles 265
Converts from Partialism 81, 381
Corrections 175—corrected 320
D. D. 29
Death 405
Deaths, W. C. Hanscom 200—(See last page of each paper.)
Debate on Universalism, 6, 79—(See Theological Dis.)
Debating societies beneficial 378
Decline of Universalism, various 30—J. Potter 60—A. B. G. 142
DEDICATIONS—North Norwich 76—Sharon 251—(See The Record.)
Delegates' expences 111
Desultory reflections 226
Dialogue 75
Difference of opinion 37
Diligence in business 273
Dissipation 192
Doing good 35
Don't be a talker 328
Do we worship Christ? 341, 381
Do we slander less than formerly? 45
Dr. Alexander vs. Dr. Alexander 406
Dr. Lansing in Rochester 51
Duelling 95, 103, 149, 255
Economy 69
Education of children 400
Effects of sin and righteousness 354
Effects of true and false hope 409
Elocution 263
Eloquence of sympathy—Oration 321
Emulation and Christian endeavor 276
Endless wo and nature 214
Enjoy the truth 323
Error the cause of impiety 207
Essays—Prize, by M. Rayner 17, 25—on the best practical means of promoting Universalism 337—by J. Baker 225.
Eternity 392—of God 72
Evening reflections 75
Examination and exhibition—(See Clinton Lib. Inst.) 287
Excitements in religion 104
Excommunications 398
Experience 184
Ex post facto laws 222
Extemporaneous preaching 67
EXTRACTS—from sermons, J. W. Bailey 44—H. Belding 244—from "Cheering Views" 88—by A. C. Barray 99—112, 120, 136, 323, 344.
Facts 222
Faith and Hope 64
Fishpool, Elder John 135, 150
Force of education [232] 240
Forgiveness 283
"For the sake of Jesus" 334
Francisco, Cornelius Henry 133
Friendship 379
Friendly letter (See Letters)
Fruits of the revival 135, 150
Fulness of the Gospel 212
General Convention 324
God is love 101—unreconciled 379
God's people 313
Gradual development of Christianity 128
Happiness 229, 404
Healthful exercise 184
Herald of Truth 31
History 144
Home 283
Hope, J. Baker 35—J. M. E. 115—A. B. G. 190—G. W. G. 251—and faith 64
How shoes were bought for a poor S. S. S. 400
Hypocrisy 311—by C. S. Hussey 59
Illiberality 261
Illustration of divine justice 21
Immortality 54
Imposition of hands 88
Indecision of character 40
Independence day 214
Indifference among Universalists 228, 399
Influence 101
Insanity 200
Installations, (See The Record)
Intemperance 369
Inventions 192
Inquiry, C. G. B. 270—Inquirer 246
Irresolution 358
Is Christ the cause of salvation? 383
Is it dangerous? 280
Is not your doctrine licentious? 392
Is the Gospel the greatest blessing, etc.? 308
It is lamentable 332
"I would not live always" 251
J. G. A. 69
Jesus a covert 353—a deliverer 369
Jewish idolatry 267
Job's comforters 394
Kneeland, Abner 231
Know thyself 28
Lacon out-laconed 5
Let God be true 369
LETTERS—Lewis to Castleton 20—Eaton to Eddy, etc., 27, 54, 79, 90, 95, 124, 316—Messinger to friends etc. 29—Montgomery and Sawyer 60, 92—Dudgeon to Owen 61—Combe to Regents of University of Mich. 77—Dudgeon to Editor 91—Editor to Fowler, Savage, etc. 93—Wilcox and Waggoner 125, 147—Sanford to Brown 151—Clark and Elder 85. 163—Skinner to Fowler, etc. 198—Lewis to Ely 284—Rogers and Ed. 285, 293, 301, 350—Montgomery to Campbell 294, 318—Goodrich and Messinger 307, 363—Atkinson and Montgomery 317, 350, 359—Montgomery to Price 311—Miss Barker and Cook 316, 371—Publishers to J. V. Wilson 375.
Liberality (among Indians) 71
Life 275—to young men 13
List of agents—(See Agents)
Literature and religion 8
Logical arguments 395
Look unto Jesus 153
Love 43—of God 72—and fear 76—of approbation 139—of praise 181—the strongest motive, etc. 237—brotherly 184, 230—thy neighbor 206—of truth 404.
Lying 218
MAN, what is, 255—whence came he 353—what is he 366—whence is he tending 374.
Marriage 126
May you die among your kindred 48
Memoir of Freeman 287
Methodist misrepresentation 396
Miserable comfort 126
Mistaken charity 6—conceptions of God 8
Moral omnipotence 181—education necessary to political prosperity 224, 232—courage 300—relation of God and man 348.
Motive to obedience 381
Music, Ella 180—E. H. C. 126
Mutual intelligence 143
My mother 227
Mysterious religion 209
Nagle, Sir Edward 376
Names 119
Natural laws 64
Nature of religion 88—animate, etc. 349
Necessity and accountability 393
Neglect of public worship 262
New attack on Universalism 70
New preachers, meeting houses, societies, books, etc.—See The Record—publications.
Obituary notices 47
"Of ecstacy or rant there is no need" 227
Offers 375, 399
Ohio city Institute 211, 323
Old age 259—authors 144
Omnipotence 35—moral 181
One more call 287
Opposition to Universalism 165—to reason 254
ORATIONS—July 4th, Chapin, 248, 256, 264—Mind, Montgomery 289—Sympathy, Elwood 321
Ordinances, etc., Whitney 156—Brown 341—French 393—Ed. 118, 286.
Ordinations, (See The Record.)
Organization 117
Orthodoxy and infidelity 126
Our Prospectus for 1839, 359—own affairs 271—next volume 398.
Parents, which is best? 219—and children beware 147
Partialism not the bread of life 221
Partialist merriment 85
Passages from diary of a work'g man 283, 291, 299, 306
Paul on Mars' hill 16, 24
Penmanship 355
Philantropy of infidelity 62
Phrenology 62—on accountability 20
Pious slander 314
Pitkin, Rev. J. B. 22
Pleasures of sinning 231, 354
Points of union 219
Prayer, H. L. H. 237—C. Spear 251, 259, 276—Eugene 389
Principles carried out 85

PRIZE ARTICLES—Essay by M. Ravner 17, 25—by J. Baker 225—Tale, by T. J. Smith 177, 185—a candid confession 86.
Propriety of confidence in God 28
Prospects at the West 181
Protracted meeting in Utica 110
PUBLICATIONS—(Religious) Age of Truth 38—Chase's Life 39—The Expositor 31, 39, 159, 215, 263, 295, 367, 384—Ely and Thomas' discussion 207—The two Opinions 31, 127—The Pro and Con 193—various Sermons 111, 207—Universalist Union 295, 304, 383—Religious Tests 118—Examination of Taylor's Diegesis 127, 144—Layman's Legacy 360—Register and Almanac 151, 167, 175, etc., Hanscom's Sermons 264, 335—Universalist and Ladies' Repository 152—Universalist Belief 223—Voice to Youth 175, 199, 207, 223, 279—Glad Tidings 200, 263—Trumpet 207—Watchman 216—Berean and Biblical Interpreter 239—Songs of Zion 408—(Literary) The Knickerbocker 55, 175, 207, 279, 351, 383, 391—Passion for riches 118—Rural Repository 175—Lady's Book 7, 207, 383—Ellen Clifford 279—Boston Quarterly Review 31.
Punishment 157, 166, 174—by S. Miles, 388—capital 15
QUERIES—John 173—to those who think 210—A. F. and answer 308—various 114, 132
Quite a difference 269
Reason 96—and prejudice 123
Reasons for punctuality at church 40
Reflections 259—by Asa 251—by J. M. Elwood 388—by J. S. Kibbe 353—on annihilation 203
Religion 221, 312, 379—necessary, etc. 147
Religious influences of nature 70
" instruction of youth 220
" error, its tendencies etc. 387
Remarkable dream 274
Retribution 272
Retrospection 252
Return from the South 191—home 335
Revival in Schenectady 199—meetings 114
Rites of burial in Turkey 176
Sabbath musings 120
Saturday night 69
Saying and doing, two things 155
Scandal 296
Scraps and sketches 43, 180
" from the German of Jean Paul 136
Schoolmasters 112
Slanders refuted 21, 255, 275
SCRIPTURES EXPLAINED—Gen. iii: 15; 98, 204 411—401—Ex. x: 12, 343—1 Sam. xvi: 220—Ps. xx: 2, 3; cxvi: 11; 367—cxxxiii: 3, 318—Isa. xvi: 10; 234—xxxv: 6; 202—Matt. v: 4; 324—x: 30 to 36; 209—xiii: 43 to 45; 302—xvi: 26; 74—xviii: 20; 349—xxv: 46; 98—xxvii: 37; 334—Mark iii: 28-30; 245—xv: 26; 334—Luke xiv: 14; 234—xviii: 38; 334—John v: 28, 29; 245—xix: 19; 334—1 Cor. xv: 50; 317, 350, 359—Rev. iii: 18; 202—vii: 3; 309—xx: 12 to 15; 286, 294, 318, 326—(See p. 4, "Sunday Mail.")
"Search the Scriptures" 393
Secret prayer 91
Self-government 295
Selfishness 250
Seriousness, its benefits 268
I Sermon, 1 Peter 5: 6, 7, G. W. Montgomery 19
II " Ps. cxxii: 1, O. Roberts 169
III " Matt. xiii: 23, G. W. Montgomery 193—error in 215, 231, 311
IV " E. H. Chapin 329
V " Ps. cvii; 8, T. Clowes 401
Sermons, extracts from (See Extracts)
Settled pastors 30
Skinner, Rev. D. S. (See Theological Dis.)
Slanders refuted 21, 255, 275
Social kindness 274
Society and church constitutions 77
Society libraries 405
Something new 123
Soothing influence of nature, etc. 243
"Speak not evil one of another" 3
Spirit of Christianity 69
Spirituality of the Gospel 205
Sunday schools, etc. 340—books for 255
Support and consolation in sickness 316
Suspicions removed 163
Syra 400
Terrestrial and celestial bodies 313
The anchor of the soul 182
The Bible 399
The Bigot—a tale 305
The Book of Revelations 238
The broken hearted 32
The calumny refuted 275
The canary bird 257
The cause in western N. Y., G. S. 29, 37, 45, 62—A. C. Barray 54—N. Brown 133—(See Universalism.)
The choice of Moses 321
The Christian soldier 114
The Christian's rest 227
The Confession of Faith 131
The consolations of the Gospel 167
The converted one—a sketch 380
The day of judgment 286
The destruction of Jerusalem 378—the wicked 221
The devil 288
The existence of God 210
The Falls of Niagara 270, 277
The lesson of nature 404
The fold of Christ 227
The flourishing tree 325
The glory and joy of the preacher 132
The goodness of God 276
The Gospel 260
The Hamiltonian system 127
The human heart 347
The identity of human sympathy 37
The influence of nature 243, 322
The kingdom of God 283—and the judgment 348
"The lake of fire" 318
The love of God the strongest motive 237—of reading 216
The man of leisure and the pale boy 80
The native wood 139
THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION—[The even Nos. are Mr. Campbell's, the odd, Mr. Skinner's letters.] No. xiv, 9; xv, 11; [xv] xvi, 41; xvii, 52; xviii, 81; xix, 82; xx, 107; xxi, 116; xxii. 140; xxiii, 148; xxiv, 164; xxv. 172; xxvii, 188; xxvi; 196; xxix, 217; xxviii, 241; xxxi, 249; xxx, 281; xxxiii, 292; xxxii, 297; xxxv, 345; xxxiv, 356; xxxvi, 377; xxxvii, 385; Rev. A. C. 79—Mr. C. vs. Mr. C. 253—G. W. M. to A. C. 294, 318—Mr. S. and the Discussion 391.
Theology 158
The ordinances (See Ordinances)
Theory and practice 15
The promises of God 317
The prophecies 298
The Psalms. E. H. C. 246—Asa 363
THE RECORD—23, 31, 39, 47, 55, 67, 79, 87, 111, 119, 135, 158, 167, 175, 195, 203, 214, 263, 279, 319, 327, 374—See Associa's., Conferences, Conventions, etc.
"There is no moral change after death" 312
The religion of Jesus 315
The Sabbath 310
"The second death" 326
The secret of happiness 3
The slanderer 131, 296
"The soul that sinneth," etc. 243
The spirit of strife 269—religion 78, 86, 95, 102
THE SUNDAY MAIL—4, 13, 18, 26, 34, 44, 53, 59, 65, 76, 84, 92, 99, 106, 114, 122, 132, 138, 146, 156, 163, 171, 180, 186, 197, 204, 212, 228, 236, 244, 252, 260, 268, 273, 285, 291, 300, 308, 314, 324, 332, 340, 348, 353, 363, 370, 380, 388, 396 403, 410. (For texts, see p. 4.)
"The Universalist refuted" 233
The unsatisfying nature of earthly enjoyments 189
"The wicked shall not go unpunished" 300
The year before us 5
Think and judge for yourselves 313
Time 45—value of 192
To our Canadian subscribers 383—western Br'n. 55—friends 150.
To the believers, etc. in Illinois 397—patrons of the Herald 14, 31—public 21, 245.
To young writers 62
Tracts 278
Treatment of enemies 229
True liberty 118—and false kindness 192
Try the spirits 110
Union of Herald with Magazine and Advocate 14
Union Conference 36
United States Convention, (See Conventions)
UNIVERSALISM in affliction 343—in Maine 28—Ohio city 39—Germany 45—Richmond, Va., Buffalo, Scipio, and St. Lawrence county 63—Bristol 68—Missouri 71—Chautauque county 79—Ohio 100—western N. Y. 214. (See The Cause)—various places 87, 133
Universalist western emigration society 247, 274
" Historical society 372
Value of works to God 155—of time 192—of religion 210
Vindication 333
Virtue its own reward 226
Visit to Newark, Wayne county 351
W O* 311, 351
Wakefield's translation of the New Testament 115
What is man? 355
Who aid the infidels? 245
Wisdom 360, 376—of God 277
Withdrawal of T. Fisk 322
Without God in the world 389
Woman 48
Worship of God 160—one God 136
Wrong ideas of salvation 168
Youth's department 402
Zeal, A. C. Barray 266—for Universalism demanded by benevolence 36.

POETRY.

A dream of heaven 360
Boyhood 376
Buttercups and daisies 152
Child of the mist 176
Death 80—of Rev. W. C. Hanscom 200
Devotional moments 112
Earth's scenes are fading 208
Female attire 336
Forest devotions 160
Fragment of a story 216
God's goodness evinced in nature and grace 408
Heaven [232] 240
Hymn 368
King David 80
Lines, L. H. W. 64—to——ib. 168—Mrs. M. Williams 304—on C. A. Morton 344.
Mount Calvary 256
"My grace is sufficient for thee" 304
My home is not in earthly joys 184
New years address 16
Palestine 40
Prayer 280, 296
Sorrow 96
The brevity of life 272
The celestial birth 264
The children's prayer 400
The crown of life 32
The daisy 352
The flower and the infant 320
The humble poor 412
The humming bird 136
The Italian girl 56
The mourner comforted 400
The ocean 360—buried 312
The penitent 272
The powers of music 72
The soul's trust 192
The spirit to her interpreters 24
The temptation 376
The Testament 128
The voice of free grace 384—of God 232
The wanderer's home 352
The waters 120
The winds 224
The world 288
The worship of nature 264
This whispering voice 392
Time 8
To Elsie 88
To my departed brother 184
Tribute to the memory of M. L. H. 48
Where are they? 144
Who is my neighbor? 248
Winter and death 104

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, JANUARY 5, 1838. NUMBER 1.

[The following briefly sums up the subjects discussed in the numbers published in our last volume. It will serve to refresh the memories of our former readers, and to give new ones an idea of the ground already gone over—thus making each volume as complete in itself as possible. Nearly every number of the series, thus far, has been complete in itself, and independent of the rest, yet readers generally like to know what has been advanced by a writer, in reference to the end proposed. The erroneous opinions and practices of Christians, so far as they have been causes of infidelity, have now been attended to. Other subjects will now be considered. A masterly and interesting article on Geological objections will appear next in order. A. B. G.]

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER ELEVEN.

BY S. R. SMITH.

FALSE POSITIONS OF UNBELIEVERS.

The principal opinions, doctrines, and practices of Christians, which are believed to be so many causes of infidelity, have now been reviewed; and it has been shown, that not one of them is either sustained or authorised by the Bible. So far, then, as any or all of these particulars are urged as the ground of objection to a divine revelation, the unbeliever places himself in a false position—since they have no actual relation to, or bearing upon, the subject. This fact must greatly diminish the number, if not the force of infidel objections, and ought to induce the inquiry, whether it is not possible that every remaining difficulty is equally unfounded. We are greatly mistaken, if the unbeliever would not bestir himself in sober earnest, and that right early, were it shown with equal clearness and certainty, that his dwelling, or his health, or his pecuniary interest was endangered by the removal of an equal number of what he supposed to be the securities on which either rested and depended. And can any man believe that his moral and social—not to say religious—interests are of less moment, than his personal security or property? That there are such, is by no means impossible, and we apprehend that they will as readily be found among skeptics, as among any other class of mankind. Still, with the hope that such may be induced to reconsider the subject, and with a view to lighten their labor as much as possible, the several particulars already examined, will be presented in a more condensed form.

1. The Bible teaches that there is one, and only one God. And it represents him as the Creator, Preserver, and unwearied Friend of man. He is emphatically denominated the Father, as being alike the author of our being, and the moral and temporal guardian of his children. Thus in the Old Testament, while we are assured that "The Lord our God is one Lord," or Jehovah, we are also told, that "there is none else—no God besides." And in the New Testament, the same great truth is distinctly stated and enforced, that though there be lords many, and gods many, yet, to the Christian, "there is but ONE GOD, even the Father"—"ONE GOD and Father of all."

Now it is perfectly consistent, that a book claiming to be a revelation from God, should assert his existence—and equally reasonable that it should do so. And it is no less consistent, reasonable, and natural, that it should insist upon his entire unity, and indivisibility, and almightiness, in contradistinction to the numerous deities which had no actual existence, but which were, almost every where, the objects of human faith and worship. So evident is this, that it is even now difficult to call to mind what the Heathen divinities were supposed to be, and not on the instant contrast the God of the Bible in all the plenitude of his moral and natural perfections, with their utter nothingness. And it inspires a species of reverential awe, at the awakened consciousness of his all-comprehending presence, his sufficiency and eternity. It does more than this—it impresses the mind with a strong sense of the fitness and consistency of his being and perfections, and of the reasonableness of believing in his existence and attributes.

But in all this, no human mind for a moment reverts to the possibility of his existing in three distinct and equal persons. One absolute, omnipotent infinity of mind, is conceived of and confided in, as abundantly competent to provide for and control the destinies of the universe. And this is precisely the view given of the Deity, in the Scriptures. Reason and revelation coincide in ascribing to him a simple oneness of person and nature. Reasonable men, then, can not object to the Scripture representation of the unity of God—and none such will object, when they perceive that they have mistaken the opinions of honest but erring man, for the Bible doctrine of the divine unity. It is just as reasonable to believe that there is a God, as to believe that a house had a builder—as reasonable to believe what the Bible says, that there is but one God, as to believe that unity is not three—and as reasonable to believe that such representation is the result of revelation, as to believe any other fact that ever yet demanded the confidence and faith of the human mind.

The skeptic, therefore, when he objects to the Bible because he takes it for granted that it maintains the doctrine of the trinity, is at fault. And the fact that the Scriptures do teach the divine unity, and that they did teach it at a time when the whole world was rioting in the darkness and pollution of Heathenism, is proof that the Bible doctrine respecting God, was revealed from Heaven.

2. The Scriptures teach, that what is called the atonement, consists merely in reconciling man to the Deity. Thus, it is said by an apostle who well understood the subject, that "all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself"—that is, hath at-oned us to himself, or made us at one with him. And again—"God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself."—2 Cor. v: 18. 19. This mode of atoning, or reconciling man to his Creator, is hence made the basis of the Christian ministry: "we pray you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." The word rendered reconcile, in its various tenses and forms, is that which is once rendered atonement, and but once, in the New Testament, Rom. v: 11.

The following will give a perfect idea of the Scripture doctrine of atonement. A father, whose children have alienated themselves from him, and become dissatisfied with his government, may be reasonably supposed to send his only dutiful son to reclaim them and bring them home. The labor of performing this duty, may be extremely arduous—may subject him to much personal abuse and suffering; but no man in his senses, would suppose that such labors and sufferings diminished the guilt, or lessened the obligations of the disobedient to their parent. Much less would any one think that such sufferings were particularly gratifying to the father, or that they were endured in the stead of the actual transgressors.

Such, then, is the scriptural representation of this subject. Jesus declares that he came to heal the sick, to restore the lost, "to call sinners to repentance." And he does this, not by enduring the punishment of the guilty—not by imputing to them his own merits—but by teaching them the truth, and showing them the way of life and peace. And when men believe the former, and follow the latter, they are said to be reconciled to God, or to have received the atonement.

The Bible never represents that the sufferings of Christ were designed to render God more merciful, or to exonerate the wicked from merited punishment; but rather as the natural consequence of the duties which he performed. Thus, the Jews are said to hate him, because he rebuked their formality and hypocrisy; they persecuted, because they hated him; and Pilate put him to an ignominious death, to gratify their malignity. All this is perfectly natural and intelligible, and is evidently the view taken of the subject by the apostles. For one of them affirms, that in the persecutions which he endured, he made up "in his body, what was behind of the afflictions of Christ." By which he no doubt meant, that his own sufferings in the propagation of the Gospel, were of the same kind, and for the same object, and answered the same end in proportion to their importance. All this is perfectly reasonable and consistent with itself, and with what may be supposed of a benevolent Deity. It is wholly exempt from the imputation of absurdity, and consequently from every objection that lies against the common doctrine of atonement. The skeptic, therefore, brings no objection to the Scriptures, when he objects to the common views of atonement; and all his toil in endeavors to strengthen his position by difficulties raised from that source, is unavailing. He is in a false position, and should do himself the favor to correct his own mistakes, before he attacks with useless weapons, the truth of divine revelation.

3. The Bible teaches that man is naturally possessed of all the physical, mental, and moral powers and capacities requisite for the belief and practice of all that Heaven has required. The prophets, the Saviour and his apostles, always address men in terms which imply such ability, and which as obviously forbid the idea that he is totally corrupt, or incapable of truth and virtue. Some, while yet entire strangers to the Gospel, were acknowledged to be "not far from the kingdom of God." And no man of unbiassed mind, can read the beautiful parable of the "good Samaritan," and not perceive and feel that the doctrine of the entire and inherent depravity of mankind is forever exploded. In that, a semi-Pagan is represented as even fulfilling one of the most important of all moral duties, and acting up to the letter and the spirit of loving "his neighbor as himself."

The Bible, then, on the subject of the moral character of man, is certainly consistent with all human experience and observation, and, consequently, with reason. For nothing can be more notorious, than that the worst men are considered capable of doing better—and they are only supposed to be culpable, because they are thus capable. And, certainly, universal experience shows that men making no pretensions to religion, and who can not be supposed entitled to the appellation of Christians, do many things worthy of that holy calling. The Bible, then, is not objectionable on account of the view which it gives of our moral condition. Here, then, the skeptic is again in a false position. He objects to a system which has very generally obtained in the Christian church, and fancies that he shall overthrow the claims of the Bible to inspiration; when, in fact, that system has no more to do with the Bible, than with a dissertation on the distance and magnitude of the fixed stars.

4. The Scriptures distinctly assert, that every sin of every individual, will be adequately and certainly punished; and that this punishment will be inflicted on each transgressor, in his own proper person. Thus it is said, that God will by "no means clear the guilty," and that "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished." These expressions are so often repeated, in almost every form of expression, that no reader of the Bible need be told that it is a Scripture doctrine, that "every one shall receive according to his works." And when the facts of Jewish history are considered, it will be seen that the punishment denounced was always inflicted, and always upon the guilty. No instance occurs—and no intimation is ever given that one might occur—in which the innocent could justly suffer in the room or place of the guilty. But we are expressly told, that "every man shall die for his own sins."

And all this is agreeable with the universal experience of mankind, and is, consequently, as unexceptionable as a doctrine of the Bible, as in the experience of life. He who would complain of the chastisements denounced in the Bible, should, by the same rule, object to the eternal laws of physical nature, which bring anguish from the touch of fire, or pain from a broken bone. The operations of the mental and moral laws of the universe, as certainly bring guilt, and shame, and self-condemnation to the doer of wrong. This is the experience of every man, and he must be a very unreasonable man who can object to a book for asserting a fact of common experience. Such objection is only made by those who, professing to adhere to the teachings of reason, blindly rush upon its everlasting truths, and fall the victims of their own delusion.

If we were to propose the character which would comprise all that is excellent, and a plan of moral government least exceptionable, it would be just that character which the Scriptures ascribe to the Deity, and that system of moral government which they affirm he maintains. And as both are unequivocally illustrated by the laws of the physical universe, and confirmed by the convictions of every mind which reflects upon the subject, no place is perceived for any reasonable and well-founded objection to the Scripture doctrine of the nature and objects of punishment. To object to the principle that every stripe inflicted on the offender, is designed for, and actually results in his personal and continual good, is to prefer darkness to light. It is to attempt to reason against reason and experience, which is either sophistry or ignorance. But as unbelievers will neither admit themselves to be guilty of the one nor of the other, they will probably abandon the objection. If they do not, they will have no reason to complain if others think them pertinacious in maintaining a false position, in defiance of reason and consistency.

5. The Bible teaches that all punishment is limited in duration. This was to be expected, after learning that all the chastisements of the wicked are intended for their personal and individual good. And this fact has been fully proved from the Scriptures, as well as by experience and observation, and hence, the belief of the eternity of punishment is an absurdity. It is not merely reasonable, then, to believe that punishment is limited, but such belief is indispensable to consistency. That we are correct in this view of the subject, will appear by a few references to the Scriptures, in which the doctrine of the final termination of all suffering, of every description, is asserted in language so definite and certain, that it seems impossible to misunderstand its meaning. Thus, "death shall be swallowed up in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces." Again—"but where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord." And yet again—"We trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of them that believe."

Now a limited punishment is so obviously reasonable, when its only object is the emendation of the offender, that all men approve of its infliction. It is one of the provisions of civil society, teachers are indulged in employing it, and even parents deem its exercise perfectly compatible with the best affections of the human heart, and the utmost feelings of tenderness. When, therefore, the Bible so speaks of the retributions of eternal justice, as to show that they have a full measure and limitation, it is proved—demonstrably proved—to be consistent with reason. On what ground, then, do unbelievers object to the Scripture doctrine of punishment? Evidently on a mistake of what they teach respecting that subject. Here, then, we find them again in a false position, wrangling with a mere opinion, venerable indeed for its antiquity, and rendered respectable by the learning, talents, and piety of its advocates—but which, nevertheless, has been proved to have no authority from the Bible. But are unbelievers, or skeptics, prepared to admit that they have been—that they are mistaken in this matter? They must do so, or bear the imputation of objecting to what they acknowledge to be reasonable. Their high pretensions to reason and consistency, should induce them to make one more effort to sustain their reputation, by abandoning a favorite theory, and receiving the Bible as a revelation from Heaven.

6. It has been shown that the Bible makes no pretensions to be wholly and exclusively written by inspiration. It claims what is consistent with the circumstances of the case, that in all matters of religion, and in whatever concerns the perfection of morals, its doctrines and precepts are of superhuman and divine origin. And we trust that good evidence of this will appear in its proper place. But so long as the Scriptures professedly contain a revelation from God, it is certainly reasonable that they should demand no more than is consistent with their pretensions. And the believer in the inspiration of the Bible, should be careful to ask nothing for it, which it does not claim for itself.

The Scriptures claim divine aid, in the prediction of future events—in the adaptation of a single system of truth and morals to mankind in all ages; and in the institution of principles which, when followed out to their results, are certain to make men better and happier. Now it is certain, that no merely human intellect is sufficient for these things. But it is equally certain, that all these have been done by the Scriptures. And it is therefore reasonable to believe, that the principles and truths which accomplish so much, are of divine origin. The best forms of Heathenism are undoubted evidence of the highest energy of the human mind—and yet the institutions and moral truths of the Bible, are as much above these, as the heavens are higher than the earth.

The manner in which the inspirations recorded in the Bible, as well as the forms of expression in which they are delivered, constitute, in general, no part of the subject of actual revelation. Nor are these claimed as such, except in particular cases, by the inspired penmen. And this is very obvious from the records themselves; for were every part and particular expressly dictated by the spirit of God, the formal introduction of certain passages in which the Deity is said to speak, would be both unnecessary and improper. Such passages, then, carry upon their very face, the full evidence, that much of what is not thus introduced, was written without any special divine aid—as much so, as if the writer had merely quoted from some other author, in which case none would ever have doubted that all not thus marked was really the author's own.

If, then, the skeptic objects to the Bible on the ground that it is professedly, in all its parts, matter and manner, a divine revelation, he is again in a false position. It makes no such pretensions. And his objection, consequently, is entirely destitute of point or force. Its great and necessary truths are still a revelation; nor is it in his power to furnish even a plausible account of their existence on any other supposition. For he can not compare the highest and best systems of human invention, with the great plan of divine truth contained in the Bible, without a blush for the infidelity which made him doubt that Heaven has made a revelation to man.

7. The extravagances, particularly of some sects of modern Christians, have led either directly to infidelity, or strengthened the prejudices of skeptics against the Bible. But that book distinctly teaches, that "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace;" and that in regard to Christian worship, ordinances and practices, "all things should be done decently and in order."—These extravagances, therefore, are not chargeable either to the Bible, or to the maxims and usages of Christ and his apostles. And if we make reasonable allowance for the vehement style, bold and striking imagery, and forcible action, for which the Orientals are particularly distinguished, and which mingle in all the features of the sacred writings, we shall find nothing which can be even construed to favor superstition, excitement and fanaticism. It is certain that the inspired penmen differ greatly from all modern fanatics, and from any who have appeared in different ages of the church, in one important particular—that of always being reasonable. Indeed, they were the very opposites of all fanatics, in their quiet and peaceable demeanor, their sober and manly zeal, and their truly generous spirit of liberality.

Besides, it is by no means true, that the great body of Christians in this, or any other age, are or were fanatics. If an overwhelming majority of men of talent, erudition and moral worth can give character to any system, Christianity is very far from being properly considered as distinguished for fanaticism. An occasional exception should no more be seized upon as a specimen of the whole, than some human deformity should be regarded as the sole index by which to judge of the just proportions and physical beauty of man. Even in this age of excitement, a few master spirits, alone, make all the noise, and perform most of the extravagances, while the great majority deplore, or despise the folly and impiety which they display. So far, then, is the Bible from giving countenance to excitement and fanaticism, that an overwhelming proportion of its most devoted friends and believers have never been led from the paths of candor and sobriety.

The objector to the Scriptures, on account of the extravagances of some few believers in divine revelation, is again in a false position. For however valid his objections against the conduct of fanatics themselves, they have no possible relation to the Bible. They do not even remotely bear upon the question relating to a divine revelation. Let him then reflect on the figure he makes in the eyes of all candid persons—sneering at the Bible because a few hot-headed believers choose to act extravagantly. It is very true, that their extravagances are absurd and ridiculous enough; but, surely, not more so than the constant vaporings of certain pretenders to reason and philosophy, who, overlooking the mass of candor, piety and morality inspired by the Scriptures, mistake rant for Christianity, and animal excitement for evidence that the Bible is not a revelation! We shall be excused for repeating, that if skeptics would vindicate their claims to candor and common sense, they must inform themselves better concerning the teachings of the Scriptures, and abandon their objections to, and overcome their prejudices against revelation, on account of the extravagances of some of its believers.

8. The Bible teaches that there is no true religion, no vital Christianity, without morality. On this subject, it seems impossible for any one who has read it with the least attention, to be mistaken. What can be plainer than the following—"To obey is better than sacrifice"—"He will have mercy and not sacrifice"—"Faith without works, is dead"—"I beseech you by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies, a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service." On no subject is the Bible more express, or explicit—none is probably so often asserted and so enforced by almost every conceivable form of expression. But there is so much of Heathenism yet cherished by mankind, that plain and frequent as the demand for positive virtue is, it is either overlooked, or disregarded in too many instances. We say this is Heathenism—because it is notorious that all the piety of the Heathen world, consisted in offerings and sacrifices.

Previous to the multiplication of copies of the Bible by printing, and while the Latin church withheld that book from the people, it is not surprising that rites and forms should usurp, to a great extent, the place of the moral virtues. But it is extraordinary, that Protestants, who boast of their high privilege of reading and interpreting the Scriptures for themselves, should in too many instances, follow in the steps of their pagan and papist predecessors, and divorce morality from religion. Were this not done, we should never hear it said, that this man was highly moral, but not religious; and that one, truly pious, though he falls into divers transgressions!

Skeptics, however, seem very much disposed to take things as they find them, without being at the trouble to inquire into their causes. Hence, when some poor mistaken pietist does wickedly, not only the church, but the Bible is made to answer for his misdeeds. They forget that they are indebted to the Bible, and to an education in a Christian land and under Christian principles, for all their better notions of moral virtue. It is impossible for them to account for their moral superiority to the Heathens of Greece and Rome, in any other way. And yet they are constantly finding fault with the very book, whose instructions have alone improved their own morality. Is it not equally certain, defective as human virtue is, that the believers in the Scriptures have been as much, or even more improved by them, than unbelievers? No fact is capable of plainer and more tangible proof, than that they have. Nor is there any other method of accounting for the greater refinement and more correct morals of that part of mankind known as Christians.

Does the skeptic ever appear sensible of these facts?—does he either perceive or admit, that the Bible has thus been the instrument of moralizing mankind? We are forced to conclude that he does not—because his objections to it, founded on the vices of its professed believers, certainly imply that he considers it, in some sense, the cause of those vices; and, consequently, that the morals of mankind have rather been injured than benefited by the Scriptures. But from the quotations made—from an immense number of similar passages which might be adduced—from the superior morality of the Christian world, and even from the better notions of virtue entertained by unbelievers, than ever marked the ancient heathen world—from all these sources it has been shown, that the Bible both inculcates and promotes virtue. The skeptic, or unbeliever, is therefore in a false position, when he rejects the Bible on account of the vices of believers.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

"SPEAK NOT EVIL, ONE OF ANOTHER."

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

I am inclined to the opinion, that a large portion of the discomforts of society springs from the abuse of our speech. With respect to the abuse of this faculty, James calls the tongue a "world of iniquity—an unruly evil, full of deadly poison." It is probable that evil speaking and slander are two of the most frequent and deadly sins of the tongue.

It is to be hoped, in all charity, that Universalists will not be guilty of slandering one another. There are many, even of those who profess a great degree of reverence for God and his laws, and are carefully observing the ordinances of religion, who are too apt to be guilty of this sin. The tongue is such an untamable member, that many who have made good progress in other respects, have but partly succeeded in conquering it. No person can be guilty of a wilful slander against his neighbor, until he has thrown off the fear of God, and brought himself to renounce the sanctions and obligations of the Christian religion.

There are times when it may be wrong to tell even the truth of our neighbors, especially if it would operate to their prejudice. To prevent misapprehension, however, it may be proper to remark, that there are cases in which it would be lawful and right to speak what we know would be to another's injury for the time being. We may be called on to do so for the good of the cause in which we are engaged, or by a sincere desire for the reformation and amendment of the individual in question. We are at perfect liberty to speak of our brother's fault, when we are satisfied in our conscience that we have sufficient reasons. For instance, if we know that any one has so far violated the laws of good order in society, that the welfare of our cause requires that he should be punished—or if, when he has been charged with an offence by some other person, we are called to relate what we know of the affair. We may lawfully and innocently disclose what we know to another's prejudice, when it is absolutely necessary either to clear our own character or to prevent the young and inexperienced from being led astray by the artifices of wicked men.

It is thought to be very harmless to repeat whatever we have heard by common report—but it is probable that in very many instances of this kind, we should be chargeable with the guilt, not only of evil speaking, but also of slander—for it is notorious, that most of the ill-natured reports that are spread abroad, are false, or true but in part. Therefore, whenever we say any thing to a man's discredit, we are in great danger of incurring the guilt of slander. It is no excuse for us that others have spread the report first, and that we are telling nothing but what we have heard. The guilt of this crime does not attach exclusively to its first author, but in a measure to all who aid its circulation. The evil of repeating what we have heard, would not be so great, if we were careful to preserve the form and spirit of the report—but how often is it the case that we exaggerate in order to make it more authentic, and that we may stand justified in the eyes of the person to whom we communicate.

It is not intended to make a very specific application, but it would be well for Universalists to consider duly the importance of this subject. We are all sensible of the value of a good character—it is in itself of great worth, and many are depending almost entirely upon it for the means of subsistence. Those who are in the habit of talking lightly of their neighbors, would think it hard to be accused of thieving—but are they less guilty when they deprive a person of a good name? They certainly would not be willing to rob the man of his money, although they might get something by the crime—still they are robbing the man of that which is dearer to him than money, without gaining the least advantage to themselves. The consequences of slander are worse than those of theft, for the thief may be brought to make restitution by giving back what he has taken; but the slanderer may wish in vain to undo the evil that he has done. The report may have travelled to a great distance, and continue to be uttered by a thousand tongues, when we have no means of stopping its rapid progress. Shall we, then, as Universalists and Christians, be guilty towards each other of such a cruel act?

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SECRET OF HAPPINESS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

"Keep straight along up the hill, Miss, and then turn to your right, till ye come to a low, black house that ain't painted nor clabberded—that's where Miss Hamilton lives," said a woodsawyer who was engaged in his trade at the corner of a street in the little village of W., in reply to my inquiries for my widowed friend, to whose name he had prefixed the maiden appellative, in accordance with the generally acknowledged rules of Yankee phraseology. "A low, black house, without clapboards!" I repeated mentally, a sigh escaping at the melancholy idea of the wretchedness that had come upon that dear lady and her charming daughters. I had known them six years before, when they lived in luxury and refinement, and my intimate acquaintance with their characters and former habits of life, made me apprehend the most grievous results from their subsequent misfortunes.

Caroline, the eldest daughter, had been my schoolmate and very particular friend. She was the most intellectual scholar, the merriest companion, and the heartiest friend in the seminary. How distinctly could I recall her short round form and bright brunette complexion—her rich cheek and the sweet clustering dimples that surrounded her full red lips—and more distinctly still, her clear black eye, and the glossy ringlets that shaded her broad forehead, where the intellectual and reflective powers were fully developed, and the round conspicuous organ of mirth formed not the least characteristic impress of a mind full of gay humor and gladsome wit. And high above her ear, the phrenologist would point you to another striking prominence, half hid among the folds of her raven hair, and designated hope. "Ah!" thought I, "of my friend Caroline there can be no fear—it is always sunshine with her; but poor, little, nervous Arlette, and their fragile, sensitive mother—affliction can never come with rainbow promises to them."

I trembled with fearful apprehension as I rapped gently on the uncouth outer door, whose deep weather-stained hue was chequered with tiny patches of thin green moss. The sound ran hollow along the inner apartment, and sent a chill to my heart. Presently a light, rapid step echoed from the entry floor, the iron latch was lifted, and a bright smiling girl stood before me. "Caroline!" I half exclaimed, and was on the point of throwing my arm around her neck, in the rapture of our reunion. But no—though the smile and mellow voice were hers, the maiden had a true Saxon complexion—light hair and blue eyes. I looked again—could it be Arlette, the pale, sickly, diffident child I had known a half dozen years before? I pronounced her name doubtingly, and offered my hand. She recognized me in a moment, and flinging her white chubby arm around my neck, half smothered me with kisses. "Dear, kind friend!" she exclaimed, "how glad I am to see you, and how very kind in you to seek us out."

"I am happy, indeed, to see you," I replied, "though I was not aware of performing any rare deed of benevolence, in gratifying the ardent longings of my own heart, to greet once more the loved friends of my childhood. But where is Caroline—and your mother?"

"Come with me and I will show you," she answered, leading me through a long unpainted kitchen, whose floor and shelves were almost as snowy as white-lead could have made them. "Do n't look round much," said Arlette, laughing—"if you do, you will spy out some of my scouring."

"Your scouring!" I reiterated, in a skeptical tone.

"Oh, yes! you have no idea how nice I can scrub. Look here, are not these evidences?" she added, holding up her little hardy hands, and pointing out several small callouses, which she laughingly declared were a token of better wealth, than so many diamond rings would have been.

She threw open the door of a small apartment, and ushered me into the presence of dear, faithful Caroline, and her kind mother, from whom I received an unmeasured welcome, that told how little indeed the sound currency of the heart is affected by fluctuations of gold and silver wealth. It was the same cheerful Caroline as ever, only more matured and dignified; but there was a change in Mrs. Hamilton from the greatest physical fragility, to a degree of health and strength almost partaking of robustness.

"Hygeia reigns queen of our little court, you perceive," said the lively Arlette, in answer to my congratulations upon their apparent health and contentment, "and you know she usually brings with her the nymph, Happiness, as a maid of honor—and here she masks her in the shape of a laughing brunette, yclept Caroline Hamilton."

"One might suppose, then, Letty, that the nymph is possessed of the property of divisibility, for Caroline is not the only personation of happiness that my eyes chance to light upon just now," said Mrs. Hamilton.

"Oh, I am very happy to be sure," said Arlette; "but it was Caroline who first taught me to be so, and I was but a dull pupil in the art, for a long while."

"You know happiness is a constitutional virtue of mine," said Caroline, addressing me, "being the effect of a sanguine temperament and sound physical health; whereas, our little Letty, naturally nervous and melancholy, is obliged to have recourse to art, to supply the weaknesses of her constitution, and for her most successful lessons, she is indebted to what the world calls our misfortunes."

"Oh, I will tell you the whole story," said Letty, "and then you will see that I should give little heed to the teachings of misfortune, had I no sunshiny sister to make all the clouds bright. When we first came to this village, we occupied a pretty little white house, and lived in what is called genteel style—had one girl to do the hardest of the work, and indulged in many of the dearest luxuries of our former life; so that I scarcely realized the change in our fortunes, and was the same puny, fretful thing as before. But the fire devoured our house, and every thing we possessed but our lives—we did not even preserve the most necessary articles of clothing. We then found shelter in this rude domicil, which a kind farmer offered us free of expense, so long as no more profitable applicant was at hand—but, oh, what a hovel it seemed to me! I envied the poor Esquimaux. It was winter, and the neighbors provided us with wood; logs, half the length of the original trunk, and huge enough for Vulcan's forge, were piled into the kitchen fire-place, which has ample capacity for parlor, dining-room, and bed-chamber, (Caroline did talk of having half of it partitioned off for her sleeping apartment,) and there I sat in one corner, the very image of despair. A farmer's daughter had given me a pressed woollen frock, and other kind-hearted neighbors, other articles of apparel—one, a pair of calf-skin shoes, tied with leather strings—one, a pair of clouded, blue and white stockings, and a third, a red cotton shawl—so that my garments were at once the most comfortable and uncouth articles in existence. Caroline's were quite as grotesque as mine, but they were only subjects of merriment to her; and as for mama, she was quite too wretched to leave her bed. Caroline was busy in administering consolation to each of us—one moment at mother's bed-side, cheering her with a relation of some new kindness of our neighbors, or a discovery of some unlooked-for comfort—and anon, caressing her pouting Letty, and showing her all the bright spots in the picture, which I am sure I should never have seen of my own free will. 'Why, dear sis,' she would say, 'how nicely we are provided for in our day of need! A shelter for our heads—not quite so grand as a nabob's palace, to be sure—but spacious and well ventilated, with a gigantic chimney, and plenty of facilities for exercise,' (pointing to the dingy floor and dusty windows,) 'nothing to fear from dyspepsia, Letty—thick, substantial garments, and hearty, wholesome food—only look at the table!' she would say, 'and see the offerings which grace that altar of our household divinity: a dozen links of sausages, a brown loaf, and a jug of maple molasses, not to mention hominy meal, golden pumpkins, and long-john potatoes. Surely all Apollo's hecatombs are not to be compared, in point of luxury, to these sacrifices made to the hungry god.' Then she would point out the comforts and beauties of our dress—and tell me how the snowy fleece that I had so admired upon the innocent lamb, had become, by the honest toil of our yeoman's daughters, a warm and honorable garb for myself—how the meek little creature, whose gentle frolics I had often envied as he skipped upon the green, had yielded his harmless life to afford a covering for my freezing feet—how the cotton plant had shed its down, and the frugal housewife had spun her wool, and knitted her yarn, and dyed the stockings blue, that most appropriate of all colors for such a book-worm as I—and thus she ran on with her good-humored wit, till I laughed outright, and she saw no more tears from me that day. Since then she has taught me to work, and shown me the uses and blessings of industry and economy, till now I doubt whether there is any sphere of life so full of real, solid enjoyment, as that where the bread is earned by the toil of the hands."

I sojourned a week at the humble residence of the Hamiltons, and when I left, it was with this truth graven deeply upon my mind—that the secret of happiness is found in the exercise of our moral and physical powers, and in circumscribing our wants to our means, and adapting our habits to our circumstances.

Shirley Village, Mass.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL.

The passages selected for study and remark during the coming year are the following:—

No. 1,	January	7,	Matthew vi: 19-34.
" 2,	"	14,	Mark vii: 1-23.
" 3,	"	21,	John iv: 1-26.
" 4,	"	28,	Matt. vi: 1-18.
" 5,	February	4,	Matt. vii: 21-29.
" 6,	"	11,	Matt. xii: 1-8.
" 7,	"	18,	Matt. xiii: 1-23.
" 8,	"	25,	John vi: 22-40.
" 9,	March	4,	Matt. xviii: 21-35.
" 10,	"	11,	John viii: 12-29.
" 11,	"	18,	Luke x: 25-37.
" 12,	"	25,	Luke xi: 1-13.
" 13,	April	1,	Luke xii: 22-34.
" 14,	"	8,	Luke xv: 11-32.
" 15,	"	15,	Luke xvii: 20-37.
" 16,	"	22,	John ix: 1-38.
" 17,	"	29,	Mark x: 17-31.
" 18,	May	6,	John xi: 1-57.
" 19,	"	13,	Matt. xxii: 15-22.
" 20,	"	20,	John xiv: 15-31.
" 21,	"	27,	John xv: 1-11.
" 22,	June	3,	John xvii: 1-26.
" 23,	"	10,	Luke xxii: 54-62.
" 24,	"	17,	John xix: 1-16.
" 25,	"	24,	Matt. xxviii: 1-15.
" 26,	July	1,	Rom. xii: 1-16.
" 27,	"	8,	Luke x: 38-42.
" 28,	"	15,	Rom. xiv: 1-12.
" 29,	"	22,	John xiii: 1-17.
" 30,	"	29,	1 Cor. xiii: 1-13.
" 31,	August	5,	Rom. xiv: 13-23.
" 32,	"	12,	Gal. v: 16-26.
" 33,	"	19,	Gal. vi: 1-10.
" 34,	"	26,	Eph. v: 22-33.
" 35,	September	2,	Eph. vi: 1-9.
" 36,	"	9,	Phil. iii: 15-21.
" 37,	"	16,	Col. iii: 1-17.
" 38,	"	23,	1 Thess. iv: 13-18.
" 39,	"	30,	1 Thess. v: 12-28.
" 40,	October	7,	1 Tim. iii: 1-13.
" 41,	"	14,	1 Tim. vi: 3-21.
" 42,	"	21,	2 Tim. i: 1-12.
" 43,	"	28,	2 Tim. iv: 1-8.
No. 44,	November	4,	Titus ii: 1-15.
" 45,	"	11,	Heb. xii: 1-14.
" 46,	"	18,	James i: 21-27.
" 47,	"	19,	James ii: 1-13.
" 48,	December	2,	1 Pet. iv: 1-8.
" 49,	"	9,	1 John ii: 1-17.
" 50,	"	16,	1 John iv: 1-21.
" 51,	"	23,	1 John v: 1-12.
" 52,	"	30,	1 John v: 13-21.

Some weeks ago we announced to the youthful readers, especially, of the Magazine and Advocate that we were about to select from a series of family letters, such passages as might prove interesting or instructing to those connected with Sunday-schools or Bible-classes, or to such as were engaged in studying, or in earnest to understand, the New Testament. We have accordingly made some selections, and are now about to submit to the public those which have any reference to the fifty-two portions of Scripture which we have selected for study on the several Sundays of the coming year. Each No. of the Magazine will contain specimens from the correspondence which we have the pleasure of editing, illustrative of the passage which is placed against the Sunday following to the day of publication. If those who wish to become proficient in the knowledge of the Christian Scriptures, take the advantage which a previous knowledge of the passage to be commented upon affords them, they will have made each passage the subject of thoughtful and (may I add?) prayerful consideration before the day on which they receive their copy of this paper, which is to contain illustrations of the same. It was in the hope that this useful, profitable, and agreeable mode of study would be adopted by many of our readers, that the Table herewith given was constructed. PHILO PAIDON.

[We are compelled, by want of room to omit the remainder of this article, also to take some liberties in curtailing the explanation of the passage. It was unavoidable. A. B. G.]

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, JANUARY 7, 1838.

MATTHEW VI: 19-34.

This passage of Scripture has been set down as the first study of the year, not at random, but with design. This very paragraph of the discourse which Jesus pronounced upon the Mount, was the theme which our friend recommended to the consideration of all his family twice every year;—upon the first day of the year, and upon their several birth-days. His eldest son settled in business as a merchant in one of our largest cities, and even after his marriage, I find he still continued, occasionally, to write to his parents as he had been wont every Sunday, while yet a single man. This son, in the announcement which he made to his parents of the birth of a son, mentions that, when he first received his little boy in his arms, he involuntarily, or rather without premeditation, found himself gratefully acknowledging the kindness of the supreme and universal Parent, and also devoting his boy to the service of his Maker in the way which is indicated in this paragraph, and specially in the 33d verse. In his venerable father's reply, I find the following passage:—"To me the birth of your boy and the prospect of his long life and usefulness, are, perhaps, not less joyous than to yourself. That you should, as your first thought, have devoted your son to the service of God, and have resolved that you should earnestly endeavor to imbue him with the love, and discipline him in the habit, of seeking first, and above all other claims and objects, the kingdom of God and his righteousness, this has thrilled my bosom, and in the ecstacy of one moment, I felt amply repaid for many hours of labor, self-sacrifice, and dutiful exertion in endeavoring to form my first-born's mind to the same service, and to engage his affections for the same Master. No man, says Jesus, and experience saith so likewise, no man can serve two masters; and with the freshness of an event of yesterday I can recollect that, on the day of your birth, I also devoted you to the service of that Father who had made and fashioned you, and whom I looked upon as your proper parent, your mother and myself being regarded only as the trustees to whom were committed the cares and the responsibility of your welfare and felicity.—To find similar sentiments prevailing at the opening of your son's course on earth, speaks to my heart as the most convincing proof that the work which I undertook for you has prospered in my hands. May it be your happy lot after many years' perseverance in the good work of training your child in his Father's service, to be rewarded and comforted, as I am now!"

I shall now introduce a paraphrase of this passage by the second son, D., who was at the time pursuing his studies for the ministry at —— College. On the anniversary of his birth-day he writes to his father, and says—"Frequently as this passage has been the subject of my reflections, I think I have this time derived from its consideration more than usual profit and delight. I have put what I suppose to have been the meaning of Jesus, into the following commentary:—

'I have been warning you against one source of crime and misery—the love of ostentation. I have now to warn you against yet another foe to your best interest, even the excessive love of what you call the good things of this life. In the loudest and strictest professors of religion among you, you see this desire of accumulating the products of labor, so strong, that they even rob the houses, or filch away the property of defenceless widows and orphans; and ye love and pursue the same objects yourselves. Why should ye be so anxious to add to your stock of this kind? it is not enduring, it is subject to decay, destruction, and loss.—Now there are treasures which endure, which fade not away, and after these ye ought rather to be covetous. Consider within yourselves, I beseech you, the importance of having correct opinions as to what constitutes your highest enjoyments, for your opinions upon this subject will influence and give character to the whole of your conduct.—Where ye opine that enjoyment and happiness is to be obtained, there will your affections and desires be placed, and thither-ward will the current of your actions be directed; for the hope of happiness is the main-spring of action. Correct opinions on this subject I may compare to the views obtained by a sound eye, which serve to regulate profitably all the motions and actions of the body; erroneous opinions are like the incorrect visions of a diseased eye, leading the steps astray. Now, if your views in regard to happiness be incorrect, how miserably will you be led astray from the paths that lead to it!

'When I thus state the matter to you, your consciences tell you that these are higher, better, more blissful sources of enjoyment than those to which almost all of you are devoted. And will you listen to the delusive tale, that while ye are with supreme earnestness acquiring the lower enjoyments, ye can also possess the higher? I tell you, you can not, as ye would attempt it, pursue both, any more than we can serve two masters. God the supreme and Mammon the idol,* can not be worshipped as is due, by the same devotee.

'It is on this account that I say unto you, let not your thoughts be exclusively occupied with distracting, anxious cares about subsistence and clothing. Who bestowed on you life—whose workmanship are your bodies? Has the Maker and Giver so sparingly provided for the wants of the body and the continuance of life, that ye must distress and distract your minds about their maintenance? Are the inferior animals, who are less dear to their Maker than ye are, and less amply provided with intelligence to provide for their subsistence, are these—are the fowls now flying over our heads, not abundantly supplied by our heavenly Father? If they are provided for, are not you much more? Moreover, I would put it to yourselves to answer me, can any of you lengthen for one moment his days by this absorbing, anxious, distressing solicitude about the future? Is not God's providence visible also as to the vegetable creation, and if God has abundantly cared for vegetables, think you, that he has not made sufficient provisions for your shelter and raiment, even for you who are the chief of his creation? To doubt this, and act as you do, shows only your want of confiding trust in the parental goodness of your heavenly Father. Therefore, again I say, let not your whole soul be occupied in concern and care about your food and raiment, for your Father who made you to feel these wants, has provided you with means sufficient for the supply of them, and in doing as ye do, you, who are God's favored people, rise not superior to the nations who know Him not.

'I now show you a better way. Let it be your principal aim to know God, and to resemble him. Let God be the chief subject of your thoughts;—his character, his administration, his provisions for your welfare. Set your affections on things above and beyond your immediate wants. Let it be your care to provide higher enjoyments, instead of accumulating treasures of these very inferior sources of gratification. Let love to God and man, and the conduct therefrom resulting, engross your whole soul instead of your present carking cares. Dismiss the world from that place in your affections, 'which God should undivided have.' In few words, let devotional feelings have the first place, the empire, the dominion in your souls; and let the dictates of uprightness and benevolence prevail over all opposition, and be the regulators of your conduct: in so doing ye shall know a satisfaction and a blessedness to which ye are now entire strangers.

'Fear not to give to these your principal attention. Fear not that you will be in want, or that the future will be unprovided for. On the contrary, ye will have a new delight in labor and industry, and tenfold enjoyment in the fruits of your labor. Banish from your desires every wish to secure the applause or the influence which wealth procures for you from men, and in the name of truth and of God, whose Messenger and Messiah I am, I assure you that your judicious and healthful labors will always secure to you enough for subsistence, enjoyment and content. With devotion reigning and presiding in your bosoms, and with friendly feelings towards your neighbors, and a conscience unafflicted with the memory of wrong, ye can derive from your fare, be it scanty or abundant, an enjoyment, which, without these, all the treasures and good things which we are in search of, could never supply to you. Be it your care to cultivate a reverential, pious, filial disposition towards God, and a kindly, candid and brotherly disposition towards all his offspring, and you will not be withdrawn from necessary labor, but cheered and animated therein by a grateful and contented mood of mind unknown before. You will soon become persuaded that God, in the teeming fruitfulness of the earth, in your ability to labor, and in the intelligence which he has given you wherewith wisely to direct and conduct your labors, has amply provided for your subsistence and comfort. No good thing will He withold from those who love their brethren and Him."

P. P.

*"Covetousness is idolatry."

For the Magazine and Advocate

LACON OUT-LACONED.

Says Lacon—"It is only when the rich are sick, that they feel the impotence of wealth."

But I say—It is only when the poor are sick, that they feel, particularly, the want of money.

And now, reader, which paragraph contains the most good sense? and which is preferable, sickness and riches, or, sickness and poverty?

WELL.

Kindness in social intercourse, is, at least, as valuable as wit. Sugar will preserve even more effectually than salt.

A disposition to exaggerate is at once the vice and the mistake of the world.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 5, 1838.

THE YEAR BEFORE US.

I am not superstitious. The tales of early childhood have had their irregular traces erased by the hand of experience, guided by the reflections of sound reason, while the tablet was yet tender, and better lessons have taken their place, drawn by the hand of religion. Hence the shades of ghosts never rest on my path—the supposed agent of all temptation, I find to be the promptings of my own mind, and tales of supernatural prescience—of good or ill omens, amuse me but by their ingenuity.—Yet it were vain to deny that there are times when the deep, deep feelings of religion—of longings for infinity and spirituality will go astray and conjure up the thoughts of things whose existence reason denies, even while the soul cowers down before them in darkness!—At such periods—and there are few who have them not—every tale of olden time crowds upon the mind. Then shadows assume substantial forms, and vacuity is peopled with shadows—breathing, moving, speaking shades of other days or future events.

Reader—dear reader, have you never felt these hallucinations of the soul? After days of hard study—of wearisome toil—when evening puts on its dusky cloak, and light grows dim, the walls of your narrow room become draperied with gloominess, and seem to recede, out—and out—and out—till you almost think your floor an isolated platform in the vast immense, whose bounds, on every side, are curtained with darkness and doubt And then the confines of vision, seemingly far off, become peopled with strange forms, and past or future scenes of life are enacted around you, while you look on with a careless astonishment, and feel as if they were realities, and yourself but an awakened spectre in their midst! Oh, there are "more things," not only "in heaven and earth," but also in our own minds, "than are dreamed of in our philosophy!"—mysteries, awful, stupendous, overwhelming to the intellect, as it but clutches at the skirts of their shadowy outlines!

It was thus I felt as I mused on the past and the future, after I had completed the long and perplexing task of compiling an index, and bringing up all things as square as possible for the completion of the last volume. The finishing labors of my seventh year of editorial labors in the promulgation of Gospel truth, were performed, and the overwrought brain yet tingled with the tension and excitement, as it contemplated the errors of omission and commission, and the hopeless cares that oppressed me in the present time. Darkness crept on apace. Dusky forms were seen through my half closed eyelids, gliding noiselessly around me. They amused me much; for it was sweeter far to think of almost any thing else, than to brood over what I could not mend. A sweet calm gradually spread over my soul—the calm of unthinkingness—next to a temporary obliviousness of thought, or, liker still, to a sound sleep, with just enough of perception to enjoy it, and it alone. How long I continued thus, I can not tell. It seemed but a delicious moment drawn out into a length of several hours, like a pleasant morning dream, when I was startled by perceiving before me, a venerable gentleman, with snowy hair, and a countenance of mingled age and youth, sternness and benevolence. I looked at the door—it was closed. Surely, thought I, he could not have entered there without my hearing him. Yet there he stood, regarding me with as fixed a look as it is possible for a mildly beaming eye to give. In some confusion, I asked him to be seated, apologizing for my temporary obliviousness, by frankly stating the toils and cares, the hopes and fears which had led to it. He smiled pleasantly as I warmed with my tale, and concluded it with considerably more energy and assurance than I began it.

"I am the one," said he, "who should apologise. But having long been a reader of your paper, and passing through your city, I desired to become personally acquainted with you. On entering your house I was directed to walk up stairs, and to enter the first door---which I did without ceremony. I fear I have spoiled your nap, and revived a subject you had better forget entirely."

Forget! how can I forget what I am every moment reminded of?

"By forgetting the things that are behind, and pressing onward to those that are before"---said the old gentleman, laying his broad brimmed hat and woollen mittens on my writing table, and smoothing his long silvery hair back from his forehead. "Business is the true cure for care---business, and hope for its success, will cover with balm every irritation caused by present evils."

Business! have I not been busy enough---

"Yes, but it has been with the past"---said he, holding up my copy for the index---"it has been in recording your own and others' errors and omissions---of seeing what you and your subscribers had left undone or done amiss. Now, all that is past---it can neither be recalled nor amended---you can not publish in the last volume what you had intended to insert there---your subscribers can not send on their pay for it in advance---you must suffer a loss of the character you would thereby have given your paper, and they must lose what they else had saved. They can not save you from the past necessity of writing duns, nor will your fretting unwrite them. What is done is done, and what is published is published. Let it be so---but remember to avoid in the future what is disagreeable in the past and present."

I confess I was much piqued at being convicted, against my will, of folly; but unwilling to take all the blame, I referred to the unpromising prospects of amendment in the punctuality of delinquents, and especially my despair of their making up for past delays.

"Reform, first, what is amiss in yourself, and then you will have cause to complain of others. Your friends have made every allowance for your short comings, and have felt deeply for all your troubles---do you do the same for others, and since the times are improving, however slowly, do you also endeavor to improve correspondingly in your labors, and rely upon it, the harvest of substantial approbation is not far distant."

What would you have me do?

"A little of every thing. Let your editorial articles breathe as little of the cares for self, and as much for the general good, as possible. Prepare them with as much care as your business will allow, and on the most useful subjects you can call to mind. Select from the numerous contributions, such articles for each paper as will impart the greatest variety to your columns, consistent with the general effect you wish to produce on the minds of your readers. Former years have had for their greatest aim the spread of Universalism. It has been widely diffused. Lately you have endeavored to render its principles more active on the affections and conduct of its individual believers. You have been eminently successful. Let 1838 have its aim. The believers nearly every where, need that Universalism be made more practical as a social tie. Press forward. Urge on our friends union and organization. Entreat them to re-build the neglected and fallen down altars---to gather in defence around the down trodden and neglected sanctuaries of God---to re-organize and render eminently social the old societies---to form reading and social meetings wherever there are two or three believers---to unite in Bible classes, where old and young may mingle their songs of praise and their streams of mutual instruction in things pertaining to the kingdom. Call on preachers to consult with each other on the best means of organizing, in more social forms, old and new societies---to revive the drooping, to gather together the scattered abroad, and to build up the broken down societies and congregations of believers---and urge the laity to be more devoted in heart, hand, and means in holding up the hands of all who labor for the prosperity of Zion---to support the laborer and his family liberally, that he may devote himself more devotedly, more constantly to the good work to which he has dedicated his life. Long have our preachers forsaken the paths that lead to honor and wealth, to endure poverty and reproach in the ministry---long have they sacrificed, (poor as they are,) every year, dollar for dollar with the most able among their congregations, besides laboring for the spread of the Gospel as few laymen would be willing to labor for the pittance paid to preachers. Call upon the brethren every where, to consider these things---to no longer lay the burdens upon the least able, and the most laborious. Entreat and urge every man to labor more in society matters, and to contribute liberally, according to his means, to save the minister from these heavy burdens, which weigh him down, and prevent his running swiftly the race of increased usefulness. Nor do this yourself, only, but call on your ministering brethren to aid you with pen and speech---on your correspondents to offer occasionally their plans and thoughts on this subject——"

I could hold no longer---astonishment at his comprehensive plans for the future, swallowed up all forbearance, and I cried out---What an Editor you would make! But you would need a daily paper, with a larger subscription than we have, and every subscriber to pay in advance, to carry out your plans!

"By no means, my friend. Your weekly paper has already effected as much as I here have planned---and as for pecuniary means, only go on---improve our social, moral and religious condition, and we will abundantly provide you with means, as a necessary consequence. We will increase your list, second your efforts, become more punctual in our payments---in short, we will sustain you in all your labors, atone for our past neglect, and abundantly reward you——"

"We"---"our"---"we!" Who are you that thus speak for so many——but, lo, before I could finish my question, his white hair seemed to spread over the ceiling, and his body to mingle with the walls of the room! I rubbed my eyes---he was gone! I was alone in a dark room, just awaked from a sound sleep, and my ears ringing with an answer to my question---"WE ARE THE SUBSCRIBERS TO THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE."

Now, dear readers, be the foregoing a day or a night dream---a waking or a sleeping reverie---there is something so proper in the course pointed out---so philosophic in the remedy proposed for present evils, and so consoling and full of assurance in the prospect promised, and the pledges made on the part of our subscribers, that I am determined to pursue it, and hereby pledge this volume, for the year 1838, to the solemn duty of building up and strengthening, every where, the walls of Zion---not walls to divide and separate, but walls to unite together, forever and ever, the children of our God.

A. B. G.

MISTAKEN CHARITY.

However true it may be, that Universalists are sincerely desirous of advancing their particular opinions, and of diffusing the knowledge and enjoyment of their principles among mankind---it is equally and notoriously true, that they have scarcely begun to act with decision and perseverance, and in concert for the attainment of those objects. A few years of observation have induced the belief, that among other things, a mistaken charity has prevented much prosperity; and in many instances done direct and great injury to the cause of universal grace and salvation.

It is not intended by the phrase---mistaken charity---that we should be either destitute, or deficient in charity, or benevolence, but that our charities should not be misapplied, or exhausted on useless and improper objects. We may, and we certainly ought to think that the respective Christian sects are perfectly sincere in their opinions, and honest and upright in their intentions.---But our charity is misapplied, when we suffer ourselves to suppose that it is a matter of indifference whether they believe in the doctrine of endless sufferings, or in the final purity and happiness of the human race. The experience of every conscientious Universalist teaches him that it is not a matter of indifference. And appealing to this, he should not suffer his efforts to bring even opposers to the knowledge of the truth, to be neutralized or prevented by mistaken charity.

Another misapplication of charity, operates in the form of tenderness towards those who dissent from our opinions. It consists in the idle fear of giving them pain, by freely stating your own views, and urging the palpable objections which lie against their doctrines.---They will not appreciate such delicacy on your part---nor are they by any means conscious that they need your forbearance. It is consequently construed into cowardice---and they believe that you feel incompetent either to disprove their opinions, or to defend your own.

Again, your charity is misapplied in aiding and assisting them to do what you would not undertake---or which you would not do with equal liberality for your own denomination. In many instances you give money for objects and enterprises, which, if attempted by Universalists, would be spurned with abhorrence. This, to say nothing of the large sums which you give for the erection of the churches and support of ministers of other sects---much greater sums in many instances than you would give your own people for similar objects---directly injures and retards the progress of your cause.

Finally, your charity runs mad, when you encourage your children to attend the Sunday schools, Bible classes, and even the meetings of other sects. Depend upon it, they will take more pains to convert, and will more highly prize the conversion of one of yours, than of a dozen of their own children. In too many instances, all this happens because you would save the expense of a few books, or wish to excuse yourselves from the trouble of teaching them yourselves. Beware of mistaken charity.

S. R. S.

DEBATE ON UNIVERSALISM.

It is now the 22d of November, and up to this evening I have not heard from Mr. Skinner in reply to my last written in September. Our readers need not be informed what pains I have taken to have a letter from each party in every number. My two last letters were written in anticipation of Mr. Skinner, that time might not be lost in consequence of my absence from home during September and October. Whether Mr. S. has gone to attend a convention or to find a substitute, I do not affirm. Perhaps his indisposition which we have heard calls him to the South, might make it expedient to put it into the hands of Mr. Balfour. I will not object should circumstances so require. He certainly will not think of keeping us waiting till our sheet reach Richmond, and his answers be written there and mailed to Utica, New-York, to be printed and thence mailed to Bethany, Virginia! But that is not all; he can not issue one of my letters to his readers in his weekly paper till he sends along with it his reply; so that his reply must again occasionally wait till the compositor has set up my letter, or till the weekly is almost ready to be issued. These are rare facilities in this day of despatch, and an instructive comment on his proposition of dividing into smaller divisions than two numbers, our monthly correspondence, as proposed in his letter of arrangements of December last. This proposed division for despatch, it will be recollected, was made to obviate my objections to the delay of a monthly re-plication! We shall be glad to know whether we must wait for such a circuit. We do not think that it is in accordance with the true interpretation of our covenant.

A. C.

REMARKS.

The above is from Mr. Campbell's Harbinger for December. Involving us as publishers of this paper, it demands some notice at our hands. In No. 47, last volume, we stated that two, and generally three copies of each paper, containing Mr. Skinner's replies, were sent to Mr. C.—one by the Eastern and one by the Western mail, and the exchange paper of each week, simply directed to Bethany, Va. If none of these copies are received by Mr. Campbell, it must be—1st, because there is a singular failure in the mail; or, 2d, because Mr. Campbell's agents do not preserve them for him during his frequent absences from home. Can both or all three copies miscarry—by Eastern and Western mail? I think not. We receive Mr. C.'s Harbinger without fail (though not without delay)—and surely the mail from here to Bethany is as safe as from Bethany to Utica! During Messrs. Morse and Lee's discussion, the Editors of the Methodist Advocate and Journal kept complaining as Mr. Campbell does, that they saw none of the numerous copies of our paper we sent them—and probably with truth, as there is reason to believe they ordered some one in their employ to prevent its coming to their sight. I hope Mr. Campbell will more honorably back out of a discussion than by such a trick, and would ask him if he may not have carelessly neglected to give orders to his deputies to preserve our papers for his use? Let him remember that our paper for July 28th, was received at his office, yet he declares he never saw it! It was received, for Mr. Skinner's letter of July was copied from it into the Harbinger; yet in his letter of September 30th, Mr. C. says he has not yet seen the Rules, etc. of discussion signed by Mr. Skinner, (neither has the Harbinger copied Mr. Skinner's acceptance and explanation of them!) though they are contained in that same paper!!! If, after these facts, either office is to be blamed for carelessness or designed delay, let it be that which has thus been actually detected in it.

Mr. Campbell seemingly labors to convey the impression that he does not know where Mr. Skinner is—yet the last letter of Mr. S., published in the Harbinger informed him that Mr. S. had removed for the Winter, to Richmond, Va.—and Mr. C. actually sent a copy of his last letter to Mr. S. at that place! He valiantly professes a willingness to have the discussion transferred to Mr. Balfour. Quite likely! Some there are who desire to shift their place in hopes to gain relief from present pain. Possibly, also, Mr. C. remembered that Mr. Balfour had previously bound himself not to discuss the subject in this manner. If so, Mr. C.'s courage was wonderful!

But, to notice Mr. C.'s complaints and sneers at Mr. S.'s travelling, and that he thereby may delay the discussion—and his charge that Mr. C.'s letters are delayed until they can be accompanied by Mr. S.'s replies.—Mr. S. has made but one journey—viz. to Richmond—and that has caused no delay, as I will show; whereas Mr. C. has been constantly on the go, ever since the discussion began, and has thereby delayed it twice, for nearly two months each time. His letter of September 30, written on board the steamboat "Coquette," was published by us without waiting for Mr. S.'s answer; and his April letter was given in our paper three weeks before we gave Mr. Skinner's reply. In no case have we delayed publishing Mr. C.'s letters, to wait for Mr. S.'s replies. Yet how confidently this magnanimous man charges us with a contrary course!

The copy of Mr. C.'s letter of September 30, sent here, did not reach here in time for our paper of November 10—we published it November 17. The copy he sent to Br. S. at Richmond, did not reach him till November 11. Mr. S.'s reply reached here in time to be inserted in our paper of November 24. Now, where was the cause of delay? Certainly in Mr. C.'s letter not reaching either of us, until about FORTY DAYS after it was written on board the steamboat "Coquette."

In conclusion—let Mr. Campbell order his deputy Postmaster and deputy Editor to save our papers for him when they do arrive there—to copy out of them, not a part only, but all they contain of the discussion—let him take care that his own travelling does not delay the discussion, and that his steamboat letters do not "Coquette" it by the way, forty days at a time; and then, if miscarriages and delays still occur (as is not likely,) let him exercise a little more charity, and less sneering and complaining, before he so arrogantly lays the blame on our shoulders. This advice gratis to the Great Reformer. A. B. G.

P. S.—Since writing the foregoing, we received Mr. Skinner's reply to Mr. C.'s letter of December 6, and the next day, Mr. C.'s letter itself. The copy of Mr. C.'s December letter, however, is sent us by Mr. S., from Richmond—if Mr. Campbell has sent one to this office, it has not yet come to hand. Here, again, there is no delay owing to either Mr. S. or to us, but rather a gain by Br. S.'s being in Richmond. Both will appear in our next. A. B. G.

NEW YEAR'S ADDRESS.

It was our intention to have furnished an article for this paper in the shape of a poem appropos to the season. But peculiar circumstances have occurred to prevent us from fulfilling this design. We will endeavor to do so in our next. In the mean time, in regard to our Patrons and Friends, and to all, whoever or whatever they may be, we would desire, as far as is consistent with the will of our heavenly Father, health to the sick, joy to the sorrowful, light to the darkened, truth to the erring, repentance to the wandering, and the blessed influences, knowledge, and indwelling of Gospel principles to all. May the Winter be a season of joy—the Spring, of hope—the Summer, of promise, and the Autumn, of abundant fruition. May health be around us and peace within our borders. May our hearths be left pure and our shrines unpolluted. May the down-trodden be lifted up and the oppressed go free. And, Father in heaven, "may thy kingdom come and thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven"—may it prove to us all a "HAPPY NEW YEAR." E. H. C.

THE LADY'S BOOK.

A multiplicity of other engagements has prevented an earlier notice of this excellent and celebrated periodical—a circumstance the more regretted, as those who wish to subscribe for the next volume, must do it early. It commences with the year, Edited by Mrs. S. J. HALE and Miss LESLIE—two of the best female writers of our country—aided by a great array of talented correspondents. Additional embellishments are promised for the next volume, in monthly plates of the fashions, and each number will contain two pages of music. The December number, from which we learn these facts, is filled with good reading—some of it very good—except, perhaps, an article beginning on page 280, by a certain Editor in this city, of whose writings our readers must have had a surfeit within the past seven years! "The Lady's Book, and American Ladies' Magazine," is published monthly, in numbers of 48 octavo pages each, at three dollars per annum, or five dollars for two copies, by L. A. Godey, 211 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

With this, and the Ladies' Repository, of Boston, any of our female friends can enjoy, monthly, many beauties of literature and religion—while the gentlemen may add to the feast the prince of our monthlies, the Knickerbocker, and the Universalist Expositor. For the weekly feast, all our hebdomadals are at hand—and all are worthy of patronage and regular perusal, from the Louisville (Ky.) Berean, of the South-West, "down East" to the Banner of Augusta, Maine. A. B. G.

BE PARTICULAR,

1. To give the name of the subscriber, of the Postoffice, and of the State, in all payments, new subscriptions and discontinuances.

2. If you must discontinue, and can not get some one in your place, let us know it immediately, free of postage. The Postmasters will give such notices. ☞ Be sure and pay all arrearages if you wish to discontinue.

3. If you have already ordered a discontinuance, this paper is the last you will receive, unless you subscribe again.

4. Circulate this copy among your neighbors, and see if you can not induce some of them to become subscribers.

5. All who have not already ordered a discontinuance, are considered as subscribers for the present volume, by the terms of this paper—we hope they will continue such.

6. In making remittances, send such money as is designated in the following notice.

REMITTANCES—Should be made in United States, New-York Safety Fund, or Eastern States bank bills. These when genuine, and on solvent banks, are next to good drafts on banks, or on good and well known mercantile houses, in this section, for safety and use.—If possible send the above; if not, send such as are next best in New-York city, for which see late Bank note Exchange lists in city papers. G. and H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. WAGGONER at Carthage, and at Watertown in the evening—Br. BRITTON in Salisbury as the friends may appoint—Br. M. B. SMITH in Utica—Br. C. B. BROWN in Mexico and at Union Square in the evening—Br. J. T. GOODRICH at Smithville at such place as the friends may appoint, instead of Clinton.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. WAGGONER at Eatonville and at Esq. Snells in the evening—Br. BRITTON at Burrville—Br. FRENCH at Brownville—Br. J. T. GOODRICH at Norwich village—Br. C. B. BROWN in Jenning's Corners, Palermo—Br. SIAS at Tug Hill and on the West Road in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. BROWN at Caughenoy—Br. WAGGONER at Middleville and at Cold Brook in the evening.

There will be preaching by Br. SIAS on the evenings of January 15th, at Lorain Huddle—16th, as Br. Thomas may appoint—17th, at Port Ontario—22d, at Copenhagen—23d, at Great Bend—24th, at Lockport—25th, at Summerhill—26th, at Canton—29th, at Madrid—30th, at Ogdensburg—31st, at Hammond, as Br. Zuller may appoint.

CONFERENCES.—The quarterly Conference of the First Universalist church in Oswego county, will be held in Mexico on the second Sunday inst.

A Conference will be held in the Court House in Binghamton, on the 7th and 8th of February next. Br. Montgomery, of Auburn is expected according to promise—Brs. Bullard, Whiston, and Doolittle are also expected—and all ministering and lay brethren are earnestly and affectionately invited. Almost every means has been tried to put down our cause in that place, and it calls urgently on our friends to be up and doing in its defence, support and countenance. C. S. BROWN.

The first quarterly Conference of the Hudson River Association will be held on Thursday and Friday, the 11th and 12th of January, at the Court House in the village of Ballston Spa. Ministering brethren are invited and solicited to attend, and call at Mr. Rowland's, where friends will meet them. This will be immediately after the Ordination at Greenfield.

L. C. BROWNE, Standing Clerk.

Br. G. Brooks, of Athol, will be ordained to the work of the ministry, in the Universalist church at Porter's Corners, in Greenfield, Saratoga county, on Wednesday, January 10th. Services to commence at half-past 10, A. M.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Cooperstown, for O H—P M, Sodus Point, for self and P A—P M, Taberg, for A W—J M A, Liberty, (Ind.) for self and E V—J C K, Lima, (Ind.) for self, J W and D C—P M, Smyrna, for B H—Rev. G W M, Auburn, for J E and W A W—P M, Ames, for A M, A H, R M, D P C, D S, L R and M B—J S B, Butternutts—P M, Liverpool, for A G and R B—D McD, Dunkirk, for self, W P, H B, I E B, J C and J M L—B H F, New-Milford, (Pa.) for self, W S, D F, O W and E B—E S, Homer, for C L—Rev. J W B, Winchester, (N. H.) for G E S and A H—A C, Preble, for self, O C and D P—A S, Bainbridge, for self, R K, J K, W F and L C—M C, Cassville, (W. T.) for D R, W and B, S H H, S W, C S, E H, S A, W K C, E H and O McC—S S, Cold Water, (Mich.) for self, J T, L E and J W M—S R D, Lasselsville, for self and J H—S G A, Onondaga, for self, S H and E J—Rev. A U, Hornelsville, for O B, J B, C G, J A and J P—P M, Earlville—P M, Esperance, for J S B—Rev. T C E. Dunkirk—P M, Concord, (O.) for self, R F and W B—Rev. J H S, Centreville, for I F P, B Y and H J—L P, Panama, for D C and L K D—D B jr, Milan, for self and E C—G P, Mead's Creek, for self, Z C E and S O—D G, Dansville, for self, and J L M—H A A, Leyden, for A J—L V, Ellicottville, for self, I L, O S and S C—J H S, Chestertown, for W T—P M, Butternutts, for J H A—P M, Brewerton, for J C W—H G, Coxsackie—S C, Yatesville, for self, T F P, N R and J S W—D S, Ray, (Mich.) for self, A B and J N S—P M, Little Meadows, (Pa.)—P M, Brunswick, (O.) for R W—C C, Green Oak, (Mich.) for J H and J H—P M, Geneva, (O.) for G T—A M H, Newark, (O.)—A D B, Marsailles, (Ill.) for self, O C, L K, D G, J B, J S and E K—P M, Wyalusing, (Pa.) for B A—D L, Middletown, (Vt.)—P M, Ganges, (O.)—Rev. O A, Geneva.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TIME.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

A spoiler they have called thee, Time,
And told me of thy wrecks;
In every age, in every clime,
Some spoil from infancy or prime,
Thy trophied forehead decks.

In oriental lands they tell
The story of thy deeds;
Where once the jewelled footstep fell,
The serpent and the lizard dwell
Mid dank and darksome weeds.

The mighty forests of the West
Have fallen by thy hand;
The savage with his eagle crest,
Who once their glorious wealth possessed,
Is driven from the land.

And even hearts, they say, are thine,
To crush, and wreck, and waste,
The cherished hopes that round them twine,
Are broken like a fragile vine,
Before thy reckless haste.

But not to me, Oh Time! art thou
A tyrant fierce and cold;
Thou'rt ever braiding on my brow,
Fresh flowers of hope and joy, till now
'Tis gladness to grow old.

They tell me that I yet am young,
A bud upon the tree;
That showers of love are o'er me flung,
That still my spirit's harp is strung
To mirth and melody.

That soon the gloomy shades of grief
Will rest upon my heart;
That now the moments are but brief
Ere I shall be a faded leaf,
To curse thy cruel art.

Not so, Oh Time! I would be wise
In even sorrow's lore;
That will enrich my spirit till it rise
On freer wings above the skies,
Where clouds can never soar.

But oh! kind monitor, one book,
I pray thee seal again;
And hide it in some far off nook,
That never may my spirit look
Upon the page of sin.

Shirley village, Mass.

LITERATURE AND RELIGION.

We are aware that objections will spring up to the doctrine, that all literature should be produced under the influence of religion. We shall be told, that in this way literature will lose all variety and spirit, that a monotonous and solemn hue will spread itself over writing, and that a library will have the air of a tomb. We do not wonder at this fear. Religion has certainly been accustomed to speak in sepulchral tones, and to wear any aspect but a bright and glowing one. It has lost its free and various movement. But let us not ascribe to its nature, what has befallen it from adverse circumstances. The truth is, that religion, justly viewed, surpasses all other principles, in giving a free and manifold action to the mind. It recognises in every faculty and sentiment the workmanship of God, and assigns a sphere of agency to each. It takes our whole nature under its guardianship, and with a parental love ministers to its inferior as well as higher gratifications. False religion mutilates the soul, sees evil in our innocent sensibilities, and rules with a tyrant's frown and rod. True religion is a mild and lawful sovereign, governing to protect, to give strength, to unfold all our inward resources. We believe that under its influence, literature is to pass its present limits, and to put itself forth in original forms of composition. Religion is of all principles most fruitful, multiform and unconfined. It is sympathy with that Being, who seems to delight in diversifying the modes of his agency, and the products of his wisdom and power. It does not chain us to a few essential duties, or express itself in a few unchanging modes of writing. It has the liberality and munificence of nature, which not only produces the necessary root and grain, but pours forth fruits and flowers. It has the variety and bold contrasts of nature, which, at the foot of the awful mountain, scoops out the freshest, sweetest valleys, and embosoms in the wild, troubled ocean, islands, whose vernal airs, and loveliness, and teeming fruitfulness, almost breathe the joys of Paradise. Religion will accomplish for literature what it most needs; that is, will give it depth, at the same time that it heightens its grace and beauty. The union of these attributes is most to be desired. Our literature is lamentably superficial, and to some, the beautiful and the superficial even seem to be naturally conjoined. Let not beauty be so wronged. It resides chiefly in profound thoughts and feelings. It overflows chiefly in the writings of poets, gifted with a sublime and piercing vision. A beautiful literature springs from the depth and fulness of intellectual and moral life, from an energy of thought and feeling, to which nothing, as we believe, ministers so largely as enlightened religion.

So far from a monotonous, solemnity overspreading literature in consequence of the all-pervading influence of religion, we believe, that the sportive and comic forms of composition, instead of being abandoned, will only be refined and improved. We know that these are supposed to be frowned upon by piety; but they have their root in the constitution which God has given us, and ought not therefore to be indiscriminately condemned. The propensity to wit and laughter does, indeed, through excessive indulgence, often issue in a character of heartless levity, low mimickry, or unfeeling ridicule. It often seeks gratification in regions of impurity, throws a gaiety round vice, and sometimes even pours contempt on virtue. But, though often and mournfully perverted, it is still a gift of God, and may and ought to minister, not only to innocent pleasure, but to the intellect and the heart. Man was made for relaxation as truly as for labor; and by a law of his nature, which has not received the attention it deserves, he finds perhaps no relaxation so restorative, as that in which he reverts to his childhood, seems to forget his wisdom, leaves the imagination to exhilirate itself by sportive inventions, talks of amusing incongruities in conduct and events, smiles at the innocent eccentricities and odd mistakes of those whom he most esteems, allows himself in archallusion or kind-hearted satire, and transports himself into a world of ludicrous combinations. We have said, that on these occasions, the mind seems to put off its wisdom; but the truth is, that in a pure mind, wisdom retreats, if we may so say, to its centre, and there watches, keeps guard over this transient folly, draws delicate lines which are never to be passed in the freest moments, and, like a judicious parent watching the sports of childhood, preserves a stainless innocence of soul in the very exuberance of gaiety. This combination of moral power with wit and humor, with comic conceptions and irrepressible laughter, this union of mirth and virtue, belongs to an advanced stage of the character; and we believe, that in proportion to the diffusion of an enlightened religion, this action of the mind will increase, and will overflow in compositions, which, joining innocence to sportiveness, will communicate unmixed delight. Religion is not at variance with occasional mirth. In the same character, the solemn thought and the sublime emotions of the improved Christian, may be joined with the unanxious freedom, buoyancy and gaiety of early years.—Channing.

MISTAKEN CONCEPTIONS OF GOD.

The mistake now stated is one which lies at the very threshold of devotion. But when we enter the temple of our worship, how many errors are there, that darken its light and disfigure its beauty! The veil of the Jewish peculiarity is indeed rent in twain; but theology has lifted up other, and many, and darkening veils, before "the holy of the holies." Our sins, too, have separated between us and God, and our iniquities have hidden his face from us. Unworthy, afraid, superstitious, erring, grovelling in the dust, how can we love God, purely, freely, joyfully! How, even, can we see the perfection of God, as we ought! This, indeed, is the point upon which all difficulty presses. Men do not SEE the perfection of God. They do not identify that perfection with all that is glorious, beautiful, lovely, admirable and enrapturing, in nature, in character, in life, in existence. God's glory, they conceive to be something so different from all other glory; and God's goodness, so different from all other goodliness and beauty, that they find no easy transition from one to the other. They mistake the very demand of God's goodness upon their love. They conceive of it, as if there were something arbitrary, and importunate, and selfish in the demand. Demand itself repels them; because they do not understand it. They think of the Supreme Being in this attitude, somewhat as they would of a man, if he stood before them, saying, "love me; give me your heart; upon pain of my displeasure, and of long-enduring penal miseries for your disobedience." Divine goodness, thus regarded, does not, and can not, steal into the heart, as the excellence of a human being does. And this, I say, is a mistake. Divine goodness, thus regarded, is mistaken—misapprehended altogether. There is not so much that is personal in God's claim for our hearts, as there is in man's claim. It does not so much concern him, if I may speak so, that we should love him personally, as it concerns man, that we should love him personally. He is not dependent on our love, as man is dependent upon it.—The command which he lays upon us to love him, is but a part of the command to love all goodness. He equally commands us to love one another. Nay, he has graciously represented the want of love to one another, as the evidence of want of love to him. He has thus, in a sense, identified these affections; and thus taught us, that an affection for excellence, whether in himself or in his creatures, is essentially the affection that he demands. The demand for our love, which the infinite being addresses to us, is infinitely generous. He requires us to love all goodness—to love it alike in himself and in others—to love goodness, for goodness' sake—to love it because it is just that we should love it, because it is right, because it is for our welfare, because it is all our happiness.—Dewey.

DEATHS.

In this city, December 15th, Miss ANN BROWN, daughter of Samuel and Mary Brown, aged 21 years. Intelligent and affectionate, she was deservedly dear to her aged parents, and numerous friends, who mourn their loss in her departure.

In Plymouth, of consumption, March 17th, 1837, Miss HARRIET, daughter of Mr. Amos Johnson, aged 27 years. She was beloved in life and lamented in death. Her funeral was attended on the 19th of the same month and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to her relatives, friends and neighbors, by Br. N. Doolittle from Sam. iii: 31-33. J. T. G.

In Plymouth, of consumption, on the 2d ult., Miss ELIZA, daughter of Mr. Amos Johnson, aged 22 years. For five months had she been gradually wasting away, and from the period that she became convinced that she could not recover, she patiently and resignedly awaited the time of her departure. She had no faith in the doctrine of endless misery, but during her last illness obtained a hope which was "an anchor to her soul."—She was highly respected in life and her death is deeply deplored. Her many excellent qualities endeared her to all that knew her.

May the severely afflicted parents, the brother and sister, the intended spouse, and all the other mourning relatives and friends be consoled by the reflection that all the ties which have been severed by the hand of death, shall be reunited. Her funeral was attended on the fourth, and a discourse was delivered to a large and attentive concourse of connexions and sympathising neighbors from Job xiv: 14, by J. T. Goodrich.

In Hopkinton, October 22d, Mr. DANIEL COVEY, aged 57 years, of a short but painful illness. He was a Universalist in faith and practice. Funeral discourse on the 24th, from Job xix: 25, 26. F. J. B.

At Sandy Hill, Washington county, N. Y., (date unknown,) of consumption, CAROLINE R. LAMSON, daughter of Jonas Lamson, aged 15 years and 11 months.

This is the third daughter from this interesting family who has died of consumption in the short space of eighteen months. Truly "in the midst of life, we are in death." It is unnecessary to say to those who knew the deceased, that they were all that parents could wish in children, and that they lived beloved and died lamented. To our dear friends, the parents and the sorrowing members of that beloved family, we tender our warmest sympathies. We know that their afflictions are great, but we rejoice to know, also, that they "trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men," and mourn not without hope. They will believe us when we say, that we must earnestly pray that the abundant consolations of the Gospel may be truly theirs. I. D. W.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PURLISVED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eighh copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH.

Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 1838. NUMBER 2.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 14.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

BETHANY, Va., December 6th, 1837.

Sir.—Yours of the 13th ult. was received here last mail. Your preceding letter also was received since I last addressed you. I have therefore two letters to answer in this one. I shall briefly attend to the last first.

2. Your letter No. XIII, is little else than a series of accusations, denials, and unsupported assertions. I have never, in any one instance, either perverted or misrepresented you, to my knowledge or belief. You do not need to be perverted or misrepresented. I would not ask, in any opponent, any thing more perverted or more vulnerable than your defence of Universalism. It is, in my opinion, the grossest and most suicidal sophistry I ever read. I again reiterate every thing you say I have misrepresented or perverted, and stand to every declaration I have made. I leave our readers to settle those matters. I shall only apprise them of your manner. You did unequivocally admit my syllogisms on the words Paradise, Heaven, Hell, etc.; at the same time saying they "were wide of the mark." Now you take these words, "wide of the mark," etc., and the Baron Swedenborg's correspondences to prove that you did not admit their truth! What a high regard you have for the common sense of our readers! Does not a child know that to say that an allegation is wide of the mark, when there is no other objection to it other than its alleged irrelevance or impertinence, is no denial of its truth! You have never made an exception to the truth of those syllogisms. As to their relevancy our readers will decide for themselves. You have not even attempted to disprove them. I now say you can not detect in them the slightest error or irrelevancy.

3. A similar trick is discoverable in your 4th paragraph. There you substitute certain phrases for the word Gehenna, etc., and say what I asked for these, I asked for the word Gehenna by itself! In the 5th also you make me misrepresent Mr. Balfour. It is you, Sir, that misrepresent my quotation. You substitute my inference from his words, for the words themselves, which I did directly quote from him!

4. This is only surpassed by your foisting two clauses into a dogma (paragraph 7.) to show that I did not quote it fairly or comment on it truly! These you say "are my very words." They are not, pardon me, your "very words," quoted from the 38th page of your Magazine, and do not express the same idea; for you now confess you have inserted two clauses. They are not, however, in my judgment, any better for being mended. To talk about Divine Justice being satisfied with penitence and reformation, is placing it below our legal justice. If a man kill his neighbor, and repent and amend his ways, this satisfies the justice of no human law!!!—There is not, Sir, a civilized court in any country that would sustain your doctrine, or say that this reformed wretch "has been punished according to the full demerit of the crime." And this being your only punishment for sin, I re-assert that your dogma makes repentence the only punishment—the only hell.

5. It would seem from the recklessness of your assertions, accusations, and denials, together with the coarseness of your vulgarity as expressed at the close of your seventh paragraph, that you intended to browbeat me off the arena. This may be the best defence of Universalism you can offer; but to get into a passion and rail with you, is not the best exposition of its folly and rueful consequences which I have to offer. If you are the personification of the good sense, logic, and courtesy of Universalism, I was in error in not believing those who told me that I would never find a gentlemanly defender of your system. I shall henceforth, until you mend your manners, address you merely as the champion of Universalism, without any of the usual compliments of personal respect.

6. There is nothing that demands any special notice till your 18th paragraph. You make short work of my recapitulation of the acceptation of Gehenna, evading every point or passing it with a mere denial or assertion. It is true that in your 13th paragraph you seem to concede a great deal; but you will doubtless deny it, if I should hold you to it. You say that "the question at issue between us relative to Gehenna, is not whether it signifies future punishment in another state of being, but whether it signifies a place or state of endless misery; and you add, that since your religious opinions were formed (how long since you do not affirm!) you are "a firm believer in the doctrine of future punishment." It is the first I have heard of it, unless you mean by "future punishment" a day or two after the sin is committed. Where have you, Sir, published to the world that you believe in an after death Gehenna, punishment, but not of endless duration? Name the book, if you please, or the paper in which I shall find it thus written. You will excuse me for regarding this as deceptious till I see it in print.

7. But you add, "the doctrine of endless misery," [dreadful idea!] "if true, transforms the Divinity into a fiend! clothes heaven in sackcloth, and fills the universe with sighs and tears. To prove this horrid doctrine, Sir, is the task you have assigned yourself!" What shall we call this?—an anathema, a blasphemy, a flourish, a bugbear, or a Universalian argument!! This, if there be any sense in it, is just as applicable to your future punishment as mine; for if the Deity made his own Son an offering for sin, and yet punishes those whom he pardons only one hundred years in your Gehenna, no mortal can justify his ways. I dare not say what you have said about transforming the Divinity. Forbid it, Heaven! I will quote the Messiah who said that "he that is unjust in little is unjust in much."—Of this, however, at another time.

8. Before noticing your new argument, paragraph 18, I should remark on your 15th paragraph, that you seem to have got an advantage of me in the phrase present time. I quoted it, "Shall receive a hundred fold more in the present life, and in the world to come eternal life." You glory in this correction. I quoted from memory in a steamboat cabin full of passengers talking round me, having with me a Greek Testament to which I did not always look, for my memory in those matters is generally faithful. And it seems I committed several other errors of which you have convicted me: I mistook or miscounted the proper number of our letters, putting XI. for XII. and X. for IX., etc., etc. Yet, after all, the difference between "a hundred fold more in this present time" and in "this present life," goes but a short way in proving your allegation. But you wish to have it read, "a hundred fold more in the Jewish age, and in the Christian age eternal life!!!" This is too ridiculous for a grave reply.

9. You say that Dr. A. Clarke and other critics admit that sometimes melloon aioon and outos aioon meant the two dispensations. You might have quoted the New Version also in your favor in that case. But, Sir, you can not produce one critic out of your ranks (and I never read of one in them) that ever taught that in these passages it means any thing else than the present life and the future. All your critics quoted are perverted if you intended them to favor your ideas on this passage: FOR NOT ONE OF THEM SUPPORTS YOUR GLOSS.

10. I come now to the only point in this letter that is new. My 6th argument in proof that Gehenna or Hell can not refer to any temporal punishment in the New Testament acceptation of it, is drawn from the fact that neither Jesus nor his Apostles did at any time threaten temporal, physical, or corporeal punishment to those who disobeyed the Gospel. And how is this very weighty argument met? You prescribe the reading of certain Scriptures concerning the calamities coming on the Jewish people for their accumulated crimes; the case of Ananias and Sapphira; the chastisement of the Corinthians for abusing the Lord's supper; and Paul's delivering Hymeneus and Philetus to Satan for their contumacy!! And this is the proof that the Lord and his apostles did threaten bodily punishment or temporal sorrows in the Valley of Hinnom or some other place, to those who would not obey the Gospel!! Not one of these reach within a thousand miles of the point. Temporal punishments and chastisements are very common matters in the divine administration from the days of Cain down to the present time.—But all the intelligent know that temporal rewards, and temporal punishments, temporal blessings and cursings in the basket, store, family, field, and persons of the Jews, were the sanctions of that dispensation. But under the Gospel age there are no such sanctions—not riches, wealth, health, nor prosperity for obeying; not poverty, sickness, or temporal calamities for disobeying the Gospel. Christ's sanctions are, "He that believeth not shall be condemned"—not cursed with blasting, mildew, or locusts, or the Valley of Hinnom—They that "obey not the Gospel shall be punished with an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord!"—not with the loss of health, wealth, goods, or chattels. "Behold, you despisers, and wonder and perish," was Paul's finale—"Be converted that your sins may be blotted out," was Peter's argument. In no case was any temporal inducement or threatening urged as a reason of obeying the Gospel.—I will only add, that your evading the antithesis of "entering into life and being cast into hell, into the everlasting fire," leaves on record against you one of the most immutable and general laws of language—viz. the words on both sides of an antithesis are taken in the same extent of meaning. From all which, I ask, may we not conclude, that my six arguments in proof that Gehenna, in its New Testament associations, and antithesis with future bliss and eternal life, does most certainly and unanswerably mean future and everlasting punishment, all remain in pristine vigor; you having now assailed formally only one of them, and that evidently without perceiving the point of it? So endeth the first proposition.

11. Your letter No. XI. (miscalled No. X.) is upon aioon and aioonios. Your first assumption, paragraph 6, on this subject, is, that aioon, compounded of aei, always, and oon, being, can not mean endless duration, because that oon by itself signifies not duration, but being; and aei signifies not "endlessly," but "continuity"! You quote eight places (paragraph 7) where aei occurs in the New Testament; and I appeal to the reader whether aei does not in every one of them mean duration endless as the subject with which it is connected. "You do always (aei) resist the Holy Spirit"; "Always rejoicing"; "They do always err"; "Be always ready," etc., etc. The Scotch or English word aye, always, is this word aei anglicised. Now if there be any word that necessarily and essentially represents endless duration, it is the word aioon, always being.

12. You say you find aioon the substantive 127 times, while I count it only 103 times in the New Testament. I count the phrases where it occurs—you count the word, although it should occur twice in one clause of a sentence. This explains the difference. Five of your 127 are spurious, but for this I care not. You add, "It is translated by the word 'ever' 71 times, and by the word 'never' 7 times." This is a mistake: aioon is never translated never. There is a negative particle with it. You ought to have said, it is translated in the New Testament 78 times ever, three times evermore, twice eternal, and world without end once—84 times equivalent to eternal; and "world 36 times, worlds twice, ages twice, course once, and left untranslated twice." Very particular indeed! Mind, then, it is never translated once a limited time, or a part of any given duration; but on all occasions extends to the full limits of the subject.

13. You also say you count aionios seventy-one times, and that it is translated "eternal" forty-two times, "everlasting" twenty-five times, "ever" once, and "world" three times. I have not time to contest your enumeration; it is sufficiently accurate for my purpose—only that it is never, by itself, translated world. "Before the world was," pro chronon aionion, is from eternity.

14. But, Sir, your manœuvre (paragraph 8) in substituting eternity or eternities for aioon, is too preposterous for a school-boy. Certainly you intended that for your special friends, who know as much of criticism as of the philosopher's stone. But now, with your own data as to the number of occurrences and the common version of them, I have to submit a few facts and reasonings. And first of aioon:—

15. This word occurs, you say, 127 times. Now of these referring to God, or Christ, to his own being, perfections, and praises, we have it rendered 36 times "forever" or "forever and ever," such as Rev. x: 6—"Swear by him that liveth forever and ever." Rom. ix: 5—"God over all, blessed forever." xi: 36—"To whom be glory forever." Rev. i: 18—"Behold I live forever and ever." I formerly noted these at 22, because in 15 of these phrases the word occurs twice; but on your count I now put them down 36. Now, Sir, if in this case this word does not denote endless duration, no word can do it, or rather, there is no such thing!

16. But in reference to the future state of the righteous, we have this same phrase or word translated forever and ever in the following instances: John vi: 51—"If any one eat of this bread he shall live forever." viii: 51—"If any one keep my word he shall never see death." x: 28—"They shall never perish." "He that doeth the will of God abideth forever." 1 John ii: 17; vi: 58; viii: 52; xi: 26; 2 Cor. ix: 9; Rev. xxii: 5. Of this sort there are ten occurrences. Besides these, it is translated 38 times "ever," "forever," and "forever and ever"—making in all 84 times.

17. In reference to the punishment of the wicked, it occurs eight times in five passages—2 Peter. "To whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." Jude, ver. 13; Rev. xiv: 11; xix; 13; xxi: 10. "And they shall be tormented continually, forever and ever," or, as you say, for eternities of eternities.

18. Now, waiving the figurative uses of this word, we have got it thirty-six times applied to God and Christ, to their glory and praise; ten times to the future state of the righteous, and eight times to the future state of the wicked. I ask, then, by what rule or law of language—what canon of criticism, or for what reason do you conclude that when it is applied to God, to his perfections, to his praise, to the righteous portion of our race in the future state, it should always signify endless, forever and ever, in the most unlimited sense; and not have the same signification when applied to the future state of the wicked, but always in their case mean ending or for a limited time!! I put this question with the utmost confidence that it never can be, because it never was, satisfactorily answered by any Universalist.

19. But I have not half done with aioon yet. I have lying before me the Septuagint version of the Old Testament and the Hebrew Bible itself, and proceed to state a few facts for which I hold myself responsible:—

1st. We find olem or oulm, in some of its variations, more than three hundred, say three hundred and ten times, in the Hebrew Old Testament. In all these instances, with comparatively a very few exceptions, it is used to express unlimited time or a period without end.

2d. I find also that in the Septuagint aioon in some of its flexions, is found more than 320 times, from 320 to 328. In more than three hundred of these it represents the Hebrew oulm, and, as yourself admit, it fairly represents it.

3d. I was about to state that this word, as well as aionios, frequently occurs in the Apocryphal books; but by an interpretation of our rules of discussion, which I never contemplated, even in criticism you preclude these writings! Be it so, then. I argue nothing from this fact.

4th. Of some 18 or 20 cases at most, in which the word aioon in the Septuagint represents any other word than oulm, it is a word or a phrase which is synonymous with oulm, or where the Septuagint differs from the common Hebrew text. Now be it observed, that there is no word of such frequent occurrence in the sacred dialect of more definite, of less figurative, or of more ascertainable import, than aioon.

5th. For of the 320 times in which it is found in the Old Testament, it is translated "ever," "forever," and "forever and ever," and "evermore" about 290 times! Even in the Psalms of David we have it more than eighty times in such acceptations as, "The Lord shall endure forever." ix: 7.—"Thou hast made him most blessed forever." xxi: 6.—"The Lord is King forever." xxix: 10.—"Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever." xlv: 6, etc., etc.—"All the workers of iniquity shall be destroyed forever and ever." ix: 2, 7.—"His saints are preserved forever." xxxvii: 28.—"The Lord knoweth the paths of the upright, and their inheritance shall be forever." xxxvii: 18. I might greatly multiply these; for if I were to take your way of counting the word in all the phrases in which it occurs, I know not but I should be able to add a hundred more such occurrences in the Old Testament.

20. To all this it will be excepted, no doubt, that this word in the Old Testament, as in the New, is used catachrestically, and in a part of its signification applied to hills, mountains, covenants, priesthood, the land of Judea, etc. Grant it, for this is common to all words in every language. We use the word eternal, endless, forever, in the same catachrestic style every day: "You everlasting talker." "He is an endless declaimer." "She is a perpetual tattler." "He is an endless trouble to me." "He is forever seeking his own honor." I could fill pages of such common phrases. And would you not say that he who thence infers that this is the true and proper use of the word, and that we mean no more by it when we talk of God's existence, of heaven, of future happiness, is, to say the least of him, no very profound linguist and logician—we only add, and of future misery too!

21. To proceed in the same inductive style with aioonios: All the learned know, and many of the unlearned have heard, that from aioon, always being, eternity, forever, comes aioonios, eternal, everlasting. We have the word eternity only once in the common version, Is. lvii: 15. "The Holy One who inhabiteth eternity." Here it is aioon in the Septuagint. They might, indeed, have rendered the same sort of phrase (Micah v: 12) by the same word; for it is not only olem in the Hebrew, but aioon in the Septuagint: "Whose goings forth have been of old from everlasting"—literally, from the days of eternity."

22. You have conceded enough for me on aionios. You say, out of the seventy-one times in which you find it [some of which are, by the way, spurious readings] in the New Testament, it is in the common version forty-two times translated eternal, and twenty-five times everlasting, and once ever, leaving but three occurrences to dispute about. I venture to say you can not find another adjective of the same construction in the whole New Testament, that is so uniformly rendered by one word in all languages, as this is by the strongest word for endless duration. To confirm this I will only add that I find it more than ninety times in the Septuagint of the Old Testament, and only seven times representing any other word than olem in some of its forms! in English rendered as in the New Testament, by eternal, everlasting, forever.

23. What need have we, then, of farther witness? Look first at the general fact: the words aioon, aioonios, occur in the Greek Old and New Testament some six hundred and eighteen times, of which extraordinary sum they are properly and literally translated in the common version FIVE HUNDRED AND EIGHT TIMES BY THE STRONGEST TERMS IN HUMAN SPEECH INDICATIVE OF ENDLESS DURATION—such as "eternal," "everlasting," "forever," and in the judgment of the most numerous and learned critics, might as well in many of the others have been as literally translated by the same words. Then look, in the second place, at the special fact: These said terms occur in the New Testament alone, referring to the continuance of the happiness of the righteous, sixty-one times; and to the continuance of the punishment of the wicked fifteen times, translated "eternal," "everlasting," "forever." Now from the general fact, and this still more striking special fact, I emphatically, and with intense interest, demand why—for what reason—by what law of language or canon of criticism, shall the duration of the happiness of the righteous and of the misery of the wicked be as different as time and eternity, when they are thus so often, and in such various circumstances, set forth by the very same words! On the answer to this question must always hang the fate of Universalism, so far as the meaning of these words is concerned. I hope, then, this question will not be again slurred over but be clearly, fully, and rationally met and answered.

24. A specimen or two of the puerile evasions of their force, as a warning against similar manœuvring in future, will now be selected from your letter of September 25, paragraph 9. After your array of the figurative use of the word aioon, age, or world, under the literal representative of it, eternity, you make the following grave objections:—Because we have the plural of these words used for the singular, and the plural twice repeated, as tous aioonas toon aioonoon, used as the most intensive form of the word; you say, "this is a circumstance sufficient to prove that the word does not of itself, radically, legitimately, or properly imply endless duration." A profound objection, truly! A new law of criticism! A single glance into the Hebrew style, into the Bible language, will thoroughly scatter this mist. But I wish all our readers to understand your learned objection, and shall state it again in more familiar style. Because we have the phrases "ages of ages," "eternity of eternities," "forever and ever," to represent endless duration, therefore in the singular number, and without repetition, the words "age," "eternity," "forever," can not mean the same thing; but must mean less in the singular than in the plural, and less when once than when twice used in the same phrase. A few examples of Hebrew or biblical usage will settle this point. If our readers understood Hebrew, I would request them to read Ps. xvii: 6, 7, 8. lxi: 5. cxlv: 13. Isaiah xlv: 15. 2 Chron. vi: 2, where they will find olem in the plural signifying just what olem in the singular means. I would tell them to examine the word God, wisdom, dwelling, the wicked, Creator, etc. in the Hebrew, and see whether in the singular and plural forms in which they are frequently found, they have a different signification. Or if they understood Greek, I would refer them to Sabbaton and Sabbata, to ouranos ouranoi, the singular and plural of Sabbath and Heaven, so frequent in the New Testament, which mean the same in both numbers. But as they do not all read these, I will only invite them to examine in the common version such phrases as "the holy of holies," "a servant of servants," "the heaven of heavens," etc. to see whether this intensive form of expression made the words holy, heaven, servant in the singular to mean something less than holy, heaven, servant scripturally, etymologically, and properly! But if the plural form or a repetition changes the meaning of words, we are still sustained in the question in debate, if not in behalf of the righteous, at least as respects the doom of the wicked; for we are told that "the smoke of their torment ascendeth forever and ever," and "all the workers of iniquity shall be destroyed for ever and ever"!! for ages of ages, for eternities of eternities; and if this expresses not duration without end, language can never express an idea certainly and unequivocally.

25. To sum up this branch of the argument: We have, from your own display of aei. always, and oon, being, shown that no word etymologically or radically, can more naturally signify endless being or endless duration. 2. That ever, forever, evermore, and eternal, are its most common versions in both Testaments. You have examined the New and conceded this. I have examined both Old and New, and if it is disputed I will reinforce it; but I think you will not demand this.—3. When applied to God's being, you admit it means endless. 4. Also, when applied to his glory, it means duration without end. 5. Also, when applied to the praises to be offered to him. And, 6, you also admit that when it is applied to the future happiness of the righteous, it means endless. Now for your reasons why it signifies a limited time, an ending period when expressive of the continuance of the punishment of the wicked.

26. Our readers will doubtless remember that we told them long since that the English Bible enables any honest person of common sense to settle this matter as satisfactorily to himself as though he possessed the most perfect knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin—because, although the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans believed and taught future and eternal punishment, their words, like our own "eternal," "everlasting," "forever," etc. were used sometimes figuratively in reference to present things*—just as the most sacred words, God, Lord, Saviour, Redeemer, etc. etc. are with us. There is not, then, a single atom of relevance or propriety in all this Universalian talking about gehenna, hades, aioon, aioonios, etc. It is all fog to the eyes of their readers. But as they choose this untoward way, we shall give them messes of it to satiety.

27. My last letter, written on the Ohio, fell short of the stipulated length about one page. I am yet some words, if not arguments behind, if my compositor rightly informs me. Meanwhile, Sir, be assured that I will henceforth omit to notice any paragraph you write, in which there is any expression so grossly vulgar, undignified, and coarse, as in some paragraphs of your last communication. I shall set down such uncourteousness as an indication of your conscious want of argument. I have found some decent and veritable gentlemen among the Universalian laity; but such folks among their clergy are rare commodities.

28. Unless you can forward your replies in manuscript before you send them to Utica, it will be impossible, I judge, to receive them here in time for a monthly exchange. A. CAMPBELL.

* I never saw a Patent from any American Land Office that did not end with these words—"His heirs and assigns forever."—Does this prove that Americans have no other "forever" than such as a Deed or Patent conveys!

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 15.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Richmond, Va., December 21st, 1837.

MY DEAR SIR—Yours of the 6th instant, came to hand last evening. I am quite sorry to find my good friend in such ill humor. But, really, I know of no remedy, if you are angry at having your perversions and misrepresentations pointed out, but for you to break off from your sins by righteousness, and from your transgressions by adopting a candid and honorable style towards your opponent. And although you are determined henceforth to withhold from me "the usual compliments of personal respect," I am not so much grieved thereby as to cease bestowing them on you, in hopes of producing in you a salutary reformation. From present appearances, "I was in error in not believing those who told me I would never find a gentlemanly" opponent of Universalism in you. Still, I do not wholly despair. One favorable symptom is, your confession, that "to get into a passion and rail" at me, is not the best way. Who knows but the next step may be a practical lesson from the same text?

2. Though you say you "reiterate and stand to every thing" that I say you have misrepresented, like Goldsmith's village schoolmaster,

"For e'en though vanquished, he could argue still,"

yet, as you have not told when, where, nor how I ever made the concessions you say I did, respecting your syllogisms, etc., I am content to have pointed out the misrepresentations, and willing to leave the decision of the whole matter to the judgment of our readers, whom I request to review my last, and all there referred to. Their good sense will do the rest. Because I did not attempt to analyze and disprove each of your syllogisms, you conclude I "could not detect in them the slightest error or irrelevancy." Were you to assert that the Rocky Mountains were composed of saw-dust, I should deem it sufficient to say, that has nothing to do with our discussion, without attempting to show what they were composed of.

3. The phrases introduced in brackets, into the perverted "dogma," were sufficiently marked, and you appear angry at them, only because they preclude the possibility of future perversion. But you say, "to talk about Divine justice being satisfied with penitence and reformation, is placing it below our legal justice." No, Sir, begging your pardon, it is placing it far above. If our legal justice and its administrators, could invariably and certainly effect penitence and reformation in their subjects, and could know certainly when they were genuine and sincere, would capital punishment ever be inflicted? I trow not. Human justice often fails in producing repentance and reformation. Human tribunals know not when professed repentance is sincere, and hence sometimes deem the public safety to require capital punishment. Not so with Divine justice. That can see, and know, and reform the heart, and never be deceived.

4. In your 6th paragraph you complain of my making short work of your "recapitulation of the acceptations of gehenna." The work, my dear Sir, might well be short: for there was nothing to reply to but the quotation of a few texts, all of which, or their parallels, I had before explained, which explanations you had not set aside. You accompany the quotations with several unsupported assertions: but assertions are not arguments. In compliance with your request, I refer you to the Magazine and Advocate, of September 3, 1836, for an article from my pen, of six or seven columns, in which I argue future punishment. But because I believe and argue future punishment, does it hence follow, as you intimate, that I must "believe in after death gehenna punishment"? Would it follow that I must believe in after death State's prison punishment? or in post mortem bastinado punishment? Not at all. Though I believe in post mortem punishment, and would very willingly believe that gehenna referred to that punishment, if the Bible taught it, yet I say you have not even proved so much as this, much less proved from it the horrid doctrine of endless misery.

5. Accompanied with a number of doleful exclamations at my supposed temerity, you seem to think, paragraph 7, that future limited punishment would derogate as much from the Divine character, as endless. But can you be serious in such an idea? Any limited punishment, whether here or hereafter, that is emendatory, salutary, and results in the reformation and good of the punished, is not only compatible with, but an evidence of, Divine goodness. But endless punishment must be an unmixed and infinite evil, vindictive, unmerciful, and utterly malignant. If God "made his own Son an offering for sin," to redeem and save the world from its bondage, will he, nevertheless, perpetuate sin and misery to all eternity? Impossible.

6. To pronounce, as in your 8th and 9th paragraphs, a position "too ridiculous for grave reply," and to say the authors quoted in proof of it, "are perverted," although fairly and literally quoted, is doubtless much easier than to fairly meet and refute the arguments. I am willing our readers should judge and decide whether the authors whom I fairly quoted, support my gloss or not.

7. In your 10th paragraph you seem virtually to concede, but yet verbally deny, the fact so clearly proved by the scriptures I referred to, that temporal and physical punishments were both threatened by Christ and his apostles, and executed under the Gospel dispensation. You appear in great difficulty to know which way to turn, but finally attempt to crawl out by assuming that these punishments were merely the sanctions of the Jewish dispensation! Really, Sir, did the Jewish law point out the punishment of Ananias and Sapphira? Did that threaten bodily sickness and death to the Corinthians, for abusing the Lord's supper? Was it the law of Moses merely that Paul followed when he delivered Hymeneus and Alexander [not Philetus] to satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme? and especially when, "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ," he directed to deliver the incestuous Corinthian "to satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus."—1 Cor. v: 5. Verily you must presume greatly on the credulity of our readers, to suppose you can make them believe all this.

8. The truth is, temporal punishments, as well as rewards, were in existence and employed, in the Divine administration, long before, and independent of, both the Mosaic and Christian dispensations—coeval with the existence of our race—and recognized and more fully explained by both of those dispensations. These facts being indisputable, our readers can judge whether my quotations and arguments "reached within a thousand miles of the point," and whether your former assertion is not a point blank contradiction of the Bible. Temporal punishments being, then, indubitably threatened to transgressors, in the New Testament, and even gehenna fire (by your own showing in your note on Matt. v: 22) being threatened as a temporal punishment, is there any thing so very absurd in supposing that where gehenna occurs in other similar passages, the same thing is meant, or something analogous to it? But what analogy is there between temporal punishments inflicted for a benevolent purpose, and endless punishment, malignant in character, and utterly destitute of all goodness!

9. The "everlasting destruction" mentioned in one of your quotations, was a temporal destruction, long since executed on the transgressors mentioned, and which followed them for ages. I deny no sanctions which the Gospel reveals. The last struggle you make on the first proposition, is faint indeed—a feeble effort to sustain your sense of gehenna, merely by the antithesis which it sometimes forms to heaven! Your doctrine of antitheses, if fully carried out, would send David and Jonah, and many others, both to an endless hell and an endless heaven! They were once in hell, and you doubtless believe they are now in heaven. If one is endless, why must not the other be? It would make corruptible crowns endless, if incorruptible ones are, because they are used antithetically! 1 Cor. ix: 26. It would make vice and virtue equal in duration, because opposed in character. And, indeed, it seems to be your principal aim to eternize and immortalize sin, unless I will allow that holiness will come to an end! I see no way for you to avoid the adoption of Zoroaster's theory, and allow two Gods, the one good and the other bad, both alike self-existent and co-eternal! But I believe that as evil had a beginning, so it will come to an end. And thus has come to an end your first proposition. Amen.

10. I proceed now to notice what you say on the second proposition. You adopt a curious manœuvre, paragraph 11, to evade the force of my argument on the radical derivation and meaning of aion, from aei, always, and oon, being. You "appeal to the reader whether aei does not, in every" passage cited, "mean duration endless as the subject with which it is connected!" Endless as the subject, etc. Ah, there's the point! For it is not once connected with an endless subject. In every instance where it occurs in the New Testament, it expresses, and applies only to, temporal or limited duration. Is it not strange, Sir, if it naturally and literally mean endlessly, that it is never so used in the New Testament?

11. You are placed in a singular dilemma. You maintain that aion and aionios, "in their literal sense, are only applicable to God and that world which is itself eternal;" and that they belong, and are applicable to, time only in a figurative, metaphorical, or inferential sense! See your letter to Mr. Montgomery, and numbers 10 and 14, to me. And yet the word aei, the only root that imparts to these words the idea of perpetuity of duration, is eight times used in the New Testament, in reference to time, or the present state, and is used in no other sense! Verily, the public must form an exalted opinion of your philology and exegetical skill!

12. It may not only be conceded that aei, (always,) but also that aion and aionios mean duration as endless as the subjects with which they are connected. And thus virtually, though reluctantly and indirectly, you are at last compelled to allow, what we have all along contended for, that the precise sense of these words is to be gathered from the connection in which they are found, and that the subject they are applied to, gives important modifications to the meaning of the adverb, the substantive, and the adjective. Thus it devolves upon you to prove, and I again, for the third time, call on you to prove, from the nature and object of punishment itself, that it must be endless. For this must be done before either of these words can afford you the least aid in the support of your dark theory of endless wo.

13. You present our readers with an onerous mass of your lucubrations on the words aion and aionios, which will prove, in the main, as useless to your cause, as you intimate our whole logomachy will be uninteresting to our readers. I shall save myself the labor of writing, and them the task of reading, a formal reply to all you say; but shall notice all that has any weight or bearing on the subject in dispute. It seems we are nearly enough agreed about the number of occurrences of these words in the New Testament. I shall not dispute your account of the number of times they occur in the Old. For I have not time (wishing to send this immediately to the printer) to collate their occurrences in the Septuagint, nor that of oulem in the Hebrew. Nor is it at all necessary. You have conceded amply enough for my purpose, without this labor.

14. We are not in dispute whether aion and aionios are ever used to signify endless duration. I not only concede, but argue, that when applied to God and his perfections, they necessarily have this meaning—and that, from the very nature of the subject. And were you to find them 6000 instead of 600 times, in their various forms and flexions, in the Old and New Testaments, and out of that number, 5900 times applied to God and his perfections, yet if, in the other hundred, they were applied to a variety of things of short duration, and which from their nature could not be endless, you would not have gained one step towards establishing endless punishment from the force of them, unless you proved by something else, that punishment must be endless.

15. You are quite too prone to assume, without any attempt to prove, that the texts you quote, relate to the future state. You assume that the future state of the righteous is referred to in the nine texts cited in your 16th paragraph; whereas it is not certain that either of them has any such reference. The majority of them evidently refer to the spiritual life of the believer under the Gospel dispensation, without any reference to the endless perpetuity of happiness in the future state: the same as John iii: 36; v: 24, 25; xvii: 3; and their parallels. So, also, with the five texts referred to in your 17th paragraph, you assume that they all relate to the future state of the wicked, which is not conceded with regard to either of them. And until you make some effort to prove that they have that reference, they are utterly useless to you and your cause; and, let me add, equally so even if you do prove that reference, until you can show punishment to be endless, by some stronger term than aion and aionios.

16. You assert, paragraphs 19 and 22, that "there is no word of such frequent occurrence in the sacred dialect, of more definite or ascertainable import than aion," and that I "can not find another adjective of the same construction in the whole New Testament, that is so uniformly rendered by one word in all languages, as this (aionios) is by the strongest word for endless duration." And paragraph 23, you say, aionios in the Old and New Testaments, is "properly and literally translated five hundred and eight times by the strongest terms in human speech indicative of endless duration"! On these declarations I remark, in the first place, that everlasting, eternal, forever, etc., are not the "strongest terms in human speech (nor in the English language) indicative of endless duration." The word endless itself, is much stronger, more emphatical and definite. Why did not our translators use it? Evidently because they knew aionios would not bear it. In the next place I ask, are not the words God, Christ, man, woman, faith, hope, charity, peace, mercy, truth, and indeed, almost every substantive that occurs in the Bible, of more fixed, uniform, or definite import than aion? Has the meaning of any of them ever been as much disputed about? The phrase "same construction," above, was very artfully inserted; for I know of no adjective of the same construction as aionios. I have not time now to examine many adjectives of any kind. But I have just glanced at two—the two first that happened to come into my mind. I find sophos occurs in the Greek New Testament twenty-two times, and in every instance is translated wise. Nobody can mistake its meaning. Kalos, kalon, occurs ninety-nine times, and is rendered good in almost every instance. In a few places it is rendered goodly, meet, worthy, and honest; but in these places it means good, and might have been so rendered uniformly, with propriety. There can be no dispute about its meaning. Is it so with aionios? I allow that its meaning is easily ascertained by its subjects and connexions. But then its meaning varies exceedingly in different places, even by your own showing, paragraph 20 and note to your 26th.

17. You take much pains, paragraph 24, to parry my argument drawn from the use of the double plural, or the most intensive forms of aion, against its signifying, necessarily, an absolute eternity. You wish our readers understood the Hebrew—how readily you could convince them by the use of oulem! And yet, in some of the texts referred to, oulem does not occur! Perhaps your references are wrong. Well, no matter. For what you have said on the use of English words and phrases, will help me quite as much. And pray, Sir, does not "servant of servants" signify a person more degraded, or of lower rank, than an ordinary servant? Does not "holy of holies" signify more holy than common? Does not "heaven of heavens" signify a higher state of exaltation than simply the word heaven? But, Sir, are there common eternities and intensive eternities? i. e., longer than common eternities? I ask, then, again, if the double plural (tous aionas ton aionon) does not imply a longer period, naturally, than simply aion? But even in the double plural, or most intensive form, of aion, it is sometimes applied to mere temporal things and periods. Isa. xxxiv: 10—"It shall not be quenched, night nor day; the smoke thereof shall go up forever: from generation to generation, it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it forever and ever." Of this class, and evidently borrowing its phraseology from this very text, is Rev. xiv: 11—"The smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever," etc., and its parallel, Rev. xx: 10. For, that these all relate to time, is evident from the fact that time is here divided and marked by "day and night."

18. To sum up, then, the amount of this investigation thus far, on both sides, it is evident—1. That aion and aionios often signify endless duration, especially when applied to God and his perfections, which subjects necessarily fix this meaning upon them. 2. That where the subject does not determine the exact meaning, they signify a long but indefinite period, (when relating to duration at all.) Parkhurst, an Orthodox and standard lexicographer, (and with him agree all the best lexicographers,) says of aion, that it "seems to be much more frequently used for an indefinite than for an infinite time." 3. That they sometimes signify spiritual and continuous, without reference to duration, as in John iii: 36; v: 24: vi: 51; xvii: 3, and their parallels. 4. That they signify a very long duration, but temporal or confined to time, (as even you admit,) as when applied to hills, mountains, covenants, priesthood, possessions of lands, servants, etc., and, as I have shown above, even when used in their most intensive form, the double plural. 5. That they are sometimes used to signify a very short period when that seems long, as in the case of Jonah, (ii: 6,) where he calls three days "for ever." And permit me here to ask, may not the punishment of the wicked be sometimes connected, in Scripture, with these words, for this very reason—that it must seem very long, even longer than it really is? and thus these words would not necessarily, even in their most intensive forms, signify endless.

19. Having now answered your letter in every particular, except your repeated calls for my reasons for not allowing aion and aionios to signify endless when applied to punishment, I proceed to give some of those reasons. You having failed to prove the affirmative, I proceed, though properly the labor does not belong to me, to prove the negative. My reasons, then, are—1. That endless punishment would be useless. It can be of no possible advantage to any being in the universe—to God, angels, saints, devils, or the damned. The only supposable advantages any beings can derive from any thing, must be either pleasure, honor, or profit. But neither of these can accrue to any being in the universe, from endless torment. 2. It is not only useless, but absolutely pernicious. It must of course be pernicious to the sufferers themselves: it must also be pernicious to the happiness of saints, angels, and all benevolent beings that know it; especially if they are fit for heaven, possess the spirit of the Gospel, and "love their neighbors as themselves." It must be pernicious in its example and influence over all moral beings, exhibiting in the Father of all, the spirit of infinite malignity and revenge insatiable! 3. It is highly dishonorable to God. It supposes either that he could not prevent it, or that he would not; and therefore makes him either weak or malignant. 4. It stands directly opposed to the infinite benevolence of God. If God be benevolent at all, he is infinitely so, unchangeably so, endlessly so. Therefore he is, and eternally will be, good to every being he has ever created. Endless misery necessarily denies this. 5. It is opposed to the mercy of God, for the same reason that it is opposed to his goodness. God's tender mercies are over all his works; but they cannot be, if any suffer endless misery. 6. It is opposed to the wisdom of God. As it is opposed to his honor, benevolence, and mercy, we may reasonably suppose his wisdom would have provided means of preventing so great a misfortune to himself and his creatures, if it had foreseen and could have prevented it. If it did not foresee, or if it could not devise means to prevent it, his wisdom could not be infinite. 7. It is opposed to the power of God. Not only would his power, if omnipotent, prevent such a doom of his children, for the honor of his other attributes, but as he has revealed it as his will that all should be saved, it must be because he can not effect his will, if any are endlessly miserable. 8. It stands equally opposed to the justice of God. Man is a finite being in all his attributes and powers—all his actions are necessarily finite and limited. The justice of God, then, would be violated by the infliction of infinite and endless penalties for finite and limited transgressions. 9. It is opposed to the veracity of God. For he has declared that he will not contend forever, nor be always wroth; and that he will not cast off forever.—Isa. lvii: 16; Lam. iii: 31. 10. It is opposed to the general voice of revelation, and to numerous positive declarations of the Bible in favor of the final salvation of all men, as I shall show on the last proposition. Therefore, endless punishment can not be true.

20. In conclusion, can you assign as many and strong reasons why endless punishment must be true? If I count correctly, you have occupied more room than I have, exclusive of this letter.* Suppose you publish two in succession, without waiting for my answer, if you are so anxious to progress with the matter. I will answer without delay, and shall be willing to do the same with you, when I come to have the affirmative. I would trust my manuscripts and proof reading to you, had you shown a disposition to treat me with fairness and honesty; but as the matter now stands, I must be excused for wishing to have them first put in type by a friend. The mail goes from here to Utica, by steam, in from three to five days.

Yours, in all kindness, D. SKINNER.

*About one column and a third more, of our paper. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 1838.

MARK VII: 1-23.

We find the following letter from Mr. S.'s youngest son, while he was resident for a time in the city of New-York:—

"Dear Father—Dr. ——— has just returned from Europe, and like many others, I was led this day to his church chiefly by curiosity. He alluded to his recent travels, and told his hearers that he had found that the clergy in Scotland, and likewise some in England, were in the habit of giving their congregations expositions of Scripture, in the forenoons, in the manner of a running commentary, and which is there called a lecture, and in the afternoons they invariably give a sermon. He told us he had heard the far-famed Dr. Chalmers give an expository lecture one forenoon, and that in conversation with him and others in the ministry, he had been induced to regard this practice as highly conducive to interest and instruct a congregation. He told us he meant to give such expositions quite frequently hereafter, and on the present occasion he read from the 1st to the 23d, verse of the 7th chapter of Mark's Gospel, for lecture, as he called it. To show you, my dear father, that I was not an inattentive hearer, I will try to give you the outline and substance of his expository remarks.

He first spoke of the dislike and hatred with which the Pharisees and chief men among the Jews, regarded Jesus, and of their ever watchful scrutiny to find an occasion to accuse him. Fain would they have made him answerable not only for his own actions, but likewise for those of his followers. The accusation in this instance was for non-conformity to an usage, established not by Moses, but by the expounders of his laws.—He told us the Pharisees were so strict in the observation of this commandment of men, that the Talmud tells of a rabbi, who, being confined in prison with a small allowance of water, and having spilt a part, chose rather to suffer or die of thirst, than omit this washing of his hands with the remainder. This attempt to charge profanity upon him, Jesus answers by asking them why they neglected and transgressed the law of God out of regard to their traditions, and, as an instance of their setting aside the commandment of God for the sake of their traditionary rites, mentions a notorious breach of the fifth commandment. He told us that the Romish clergy had obtained immense estates and riches in England and elsewhere, by rich men deeding to them, chiefly on their death-beds, portions of their property that they might secure their priests' good offices for their sinful souls. The priests, scribes and chief Pharisees had practiced a similar delusion on the people of their day, encouraging the practice of devoting property to God and to the temple, as they said, that was, in reality to themselves. If at a rash moment, or in a transport of passion, any one refused any thing to a friend, or even to his parents by saying it was devoted or corban for the altar, this, their teachers taught them, was of binding force and validity: Better that they should continue to refuse relief to a parent than retract their dedication of a gift to the altar. Here I thought of certain priests in our own day about as famous for extracting money for the "Lord's treasury," that is, their own, as were their predecessors in either the Jewish or Roman churches. The Jewish doctors invalidated another commandment by the same superstitious observance, inasmuch as they taught that debtors might dedicate their property to God or the altar, and so defraud their creditors of their just claims. Thus were two divine injunctions set aside, and injustice and unnatural cruelty sanctioned by a lesson of priestly invention and authority. Here Dr. ——— very appropriately cautioned his hearers against any doctrines or observances which had not their foundation in the clearly revealed will of God. He did not expressly say, but what he said implied that, the will of God was to be discovered only in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. Here I thought the Dr. in an error, as on many points the Scriptures are altogether silent, and as, I thought, we are justly and logically entitled to infer God's disapprobation where punishment or infelicity follows any action, and his approval where satisfaction and happiness follows any course of conduct. Without any endeavor on their part to deceive others, however, I thought it was very easy for the clergy to deceive themselves on this point; as they are the professed messengers from God to man, and devote themselves rather exclusively to the interpretation of the Bible, it is natural that they should over-estimate the importance of their peculiar vocation, and magnify the book of Revelation at the expense of those of Nature and Experience.

Our preacher, or, in this case, lecturer I might say, now went on to observe, that our heaven-sent Teacher seldom allowed any occurrences to pass without employing them for the purpose of impressing the auditors or spectators with some lesson of profit and instruction. This method of instruction, he observed, had much to recommend it. Those who heard Jesus, when they saw this washing of hands, or a sower sowing his grain, etc., were likely to recollect the observation which Jesus made in reference to these things. He added, that were our minds fully fraught with useful truths, and were we earnestly desirous of being the instruments of disseminating good, we would find no method better adapted to our purpose, than this of employing common occasions and every-day incidents as the vehicles to convey good and appropriate instructions. He said that parents and instructors of youth might make the reading of history very useful to those under their charge, by copying this method. Here, father, without flattery I thought of you. In addition to the appropriateness of the occasion for the remarks which Jesus was about to make, Dr. ——— bade us notice the call—Hearken unto me every one of you, and understand. The useful lesson which Jesus meant that the people should carry away on the present occasion, was this: That they need not dread any defilement they could receive from unwashen hands or dishes, or from any food which could enter their mouths; that the defilement they should be afraid of was from that which proceeded out of their mouths. This saying Jesus thought worthy of acceptation and reflection, for this is implied in his call to those who have ears to hear, to attend.

It would appear from the narrative, that even the constant attendants on the instructions of Jesus could not penetrate the obscure and hidden sense of this saying, and that their imbecility of mind was surprising to him. Here our lecturer expatiated upon the unwillingness which the mass of men, in all ages, have manifested to undergo the exertion or labor of mental research and reflection. In his disciples this mental sloth and indolence was looked upon with surprise, and, no doubt, with grief by their Master.

The train of thought which becomes us as arising from this portion of our Teacher's recorded instructions, is different from that which the immediate hearers of it might have pursued to advantage. Let us be impressed said Dr. ———, that as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he. Let us bear in recollection that by our words we are to be justified, and by our words we are to be condemned. The tenor of our conversation showeth the state of the mind within, and what manner of spirit we are of. The heart is the fountain, and words are the streams; to have the streams pure and incorrupt, we must make it our business to purify the fountain. By conversation we not only show what we are, but we may, by the same means, operate upon others, very extensively, for good or for evil. For this reason, also, we ought to endeavor to be able out of the good treasure of our hearts to bring forth good things, and likewise to bridle our tongues lest we promote an evil rather than a good cause."

Our young friend concludes this summary of the discourse which he had heard, by saying, that although he thought the speaker had extoled, rather extravagantly, the Bible in a former part of his discourse, or rather undervalued other sources of instruction, yet he fully coincided with him when he told his audience that the best treasure with which their hearts could be furnished, was the word of Christ dwelling there richly in all wisdom. Of this treasure, he tells his father, he had that day resolved to acquire and possess more and more. May all such resolutions be prospered. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LIFE.

TO YOUNG MEN.

"For what is your life?—it is even a vapor, that appeareth for a little while, and then vanisheth away."

What is your life?—"Seventy years," says one; "I have yet fifty remaining"—Theories apart, is not this the language of the greater part of mankind? Alas! too true—but does the experience of mankind confirm it? do the bills of mortality respond in affirmation thereof? or, do they echo back the words of the text, "a vapor?" When we reflect that the life, the vitality of man is his breath; for when "God breathed into him the breath of life he became a living soul"—and that he can not lay by a single breath for an hour of need, will not every breath he breathes answer, "a vapor?"

It is natural for man to love life, and hope to attain to old age, and in the early part of life, to look forward impatiently to the future, and thus—

"Counting on long years of pleasure here,
Is quite unfurnished for the world to come"!

While looking forward to middle life and old age, and long before they have attained either, their "life vanishes away." Said the Bard of Ayr,

"O man! While in thy early years,
How prodigal of time!—
Mispending all thy precious hours,
Thy glorious youthful prime."

Said an American philantrophist, and it should be had in everlasting remembrance, "if you love life, do not waste your time." One thing is certain, whatever may be the convictions or theories of men, in their reflective moments upon the subject, they are practically infidel. Yet, notwithstanding their practice, the text, though poetic and metaphoric, is eternally true. Even if a few attain three score years and ten, with ten more added, yet their rapid flight has soon, ah! too soon, brought the time when their days are emphatically "labor and trouble"—they feel that their days have passed as a dream, and can respond to the sentiment of the Patriarch paraphrased,

"Our days, alas! our mortal days,
Are short and wretched too—
Evil and few, the Patriarch said,
And well the Patriarch knew."

How important, then, that we duly value life—that we appreciate our time—that we labor assiduously in youth, to lay up a valuable fund of ideas, which should we live, will profit mature years and comfort old age—and thus both by precept and example, to—

"allure to brighter worlds,
And lead the way." W. A. H.

Marcy, December 14, 1837.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 1838.

UNION OF THE HERALD OF TRUTH WITH THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

This event, long desired by so many brethren in Western New-York and elsewhere, has at length taken place, as will be seen by the following announciations relating thereto. The various particulars are all placed together, as it is HIGHLY IMPORTANT that the subscribers to the Herald should particularly notice, and carefully practice, the directions and requests there given.—EDS.

TO THE PATRONS OF THE HERALD OF TRUTH.

The time has come, when I must resign the situation, which, for nearly two years, I have occupied, as the conductor of a periodical encouraged by your support. I have consented to unite the Herald of Truth with the long established, and faithful co-worker, the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate. Subscribers to the Herald, will hereafter be supplied, it can not be said with another paper, but the same one, much improved, under more skillful hands, and with the means to do that ample justice to you, which we had anticipated to do—and supplied, too, on precisely the same terms.

The cause of this step, can be stated in a few words:—the want of capital, to enable us to wait on most of our subscribers as long as they seem to desire. Already have we been subjected to much and serious inconvenience, whereby we had neither peace nor rest, day nor night. Could we have commanded the half that is due us, these difficulties might have been avoided, and we encouraged to go on. Under existing circumstances, we feel unwilling to complain as much, as otherwise would have been just. The money pressure is, and has been every where severely felt; the state of things around us, in this respect, has been almost unparallelled. The non-circulation of small notes, has not been among the least of the causes, by which we have suffered. Thus, by law, we were prevented from receiving our subscriptions, unless in specie. Although usage has, to some extent, abrogated this law, still, all will allow that it has suppressed, to a considerable extent, the circulation of small notes in the country. We know it is not customary for publishers to apologise for delinquent subscribers, we however feel that our confidence in those that owe us, is not misplaced. It is not, then, from the want of patronage sufficient to pay the expenses of the Herald, that we have united it with the Magazine and Advocate, but from the want of capital to do business in the way that we should probably have to, if we continued. What is our loss by this union, is certainly a gain to the subscribers of the Herald. It would not become us to apologise for sending them this paper in lieu of the one they have been taking—the number and talents of its Editors and Correspondents, are a sufficient guarantee of what they may expect to receive; what we have to say particularly interests us, and we believe that when we speak to the patrons of the Herald, we are speaking to friends indeed, who are "friends in need." Of the liabilities we have incurred, by sending the Herald weekly to you, many yet remain to be paid, and unless they are, further efforts of ours in the cause in which we have engaged, will be to some extent paralyzed. It is partly in your power to prevent this, and that, too, without the least expense or inconvenience to yourselves—nay, more, you will, at the same time, be benefitting yourselves and the cause. Are you not willing to do this; and thereby assist me, benefit yourselves and the cause? Then continue your names as subscribers to this paper, recollecting that by each one that orders a discontinuance, we suffer loss, as it depends on the continuation of your patronage, whether we will be able to pay our debts or not.

In addition to the other original matter, the interesting discussion between Br. Skinner and Rev. Alexander Campbell, is in progress and is published in this paper, which is certainly no small consideration. This change will not absent us from you, as we intend to visit you as often as once a week over our usual signature. So you will not only hear from us for awhile, as often as ever, but from many others you will hear more "welcome news from Zion bearing."

We have one more request to make of you, especially our agents, which we wish to be particularly observed, which is, that all the names you have procured as subscribers to the Herald of Truth, be returned as soon as possible to me, at Rochester, N. Y.

And now I leave it for Br. Grosh to cater for you, and deal out to each of you, of that spiritual "bread of God, which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world." GEORGE SANDERSON.

Rochester, January, 1838.

A CARD.

We return our unfeigned thanks to the agents of the Herald of Truth, for their very friendly co-operation in our behalf, and to our editorial associates and correspondents, whose names will ever be remembered in love. Go on, brethren—do not relax your efforts, for it is your Master's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.

G. SANDERSON.

AGENTS OF THE HERALD.

We intend to immediately send you the bills of those who are in arrears in your vicinity. As it is absolutely necessary for us to adjust our matters, will you please collect, and deduct therefrom the usual commission, and accept our thanks? G. SANDERSON.

REMITTANCES FOR THE HERALD OF TRUTH.

All remittances for the 3d and 4th volumes (the two last) of the Herald of Truth, must be made to me, as heretofore, at Rochester, N. Y., unless in sending pay for current volume of this paper, it should be more convenient to remit at the same time what is due to Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson. G. SANDERSON.

TO THE PATRONS OF THE HERALD OF TRUTH.

Who are not, also, subscribers to the Magazine and Advocate.

Having frequently been solicited by many prominent Universalists in Western New-York, to strive for a union of these two papers, and finding that Br. Sanderson agreed with us, on general no less than on individual grounds, in the propriety and benefits of the measure, we have, with him, entered into the arrangements above named. The generous friendship of Br. Sanderson has been too partial to our merits, and those of our paper; and has left us nothing to promise for, but much to moderate in your expectations. What we can, we will do to merit your confidence and support, and promote the common cause of universal benevolence. But we beg you to remember, that we are yet deeply indebted for the Magazine and Advocate, to Br. Skinner, its former proprietor—that if our list is large, it cost us more, and our expenses are, also, greater, on that very account—that the "pressure" has the more severely affected us, because a considerable portion of our subscribers are in the Canadas, the Western and Southern States, where the pressure was and is heaviest, and the notes of which are at an enormous discount here. To all this, add the fact that we, too, are destitute of capital—dependent wholly on receipts from subscribers—that to our former burdens we have now added the debt of this purchase—consider all these facts, and we feel certain of your sympathy in our cares and labors—your forbearance and charity for our errors and short comings, and your aid in procuring what new subscribers you can, and especially in making to us as prompt payments as possible for the present and future volumes. We know there is yet much room for improvements in our paper, and as rapidly as you furnish us with the necessary means, we will do all that in our power lies to make them, and thereby merit your confidence and support.

To the Editors and Correspondents of the Herald—in whom we have always seen friends, and to whom, generally, we are already indebted for much aid and many favors—we prefer the humble request that they will continue to the united papers, the valuable aid and support they have rendered to the Herald.

The Agents of the Herald are affectionately entreated to continue to us the aid and influence by which they so generously benefited Br. Sanderson. Like him, we will endeavor to prove ourselves grateful for it, by using it for the furtherance of the same good cause.

In conclusion, may we not congratulate the Universalist public, that the supporters of these two separate papers, will now be more closely and endearingly united by the union thus formed? We believe such will be the effect—that communicating with each other in, and receiving information of each other from the same paper, they will grow in the knowledge and love of each other, and of the Gospel in which all are co-workers with God. If so, the union will prove, as the proprietors of both papers believed, a great public benefit—exerting a social religious influence, which, though unseen, can not but be felt, and be productive of much good wherever either paper was taken and read in the love of the truth.

Thus looking forward with joyful hope—and back with much gratification at the harmony of feeling subsisting between both the papers, in time past—we greet our new patrons, agents, and correspondents with an affectionate spirit, and tender them the right hand of brotherly love and fellowship.

A. B. GROSH,
O. HUTCHINSON.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

The following excellent, sensible remarks on this subject, are taken from the Message of Governor Vance, of Ohio, to the present Legislature of that State. I rejoice to see them, and hope they will meet a ready response from the body to which they are addressed. I can conceive no sound reason for retaining this barbarous feature in our criminal code—or its kindred feature of imprisonment for debt, in our civil code. Both are relics of darker and less humane, just, and politic ages—both can easily be superseded by means far more effective to attain the ends for which they were established—and both are subversive, in a greater or lesser degree, of the very justice and morality they are intended to support and advance in community. My experience, though brief and limited, enables me to endorse the statements of the first paragraph—it is a fact that the certainty rather than the severity of punishment, prevents crime, and that this certainty is continually subverted, set aside, by the severity of the laws and the humanity of the jury. No person of excitable mind has ever read Confessions, and accounts of executions, in his youth, without having felt the seductive influences of the enterprises narrated in the one, and being led to make a hero or a saint of the executed. It is high time, then, to do away these evils, and to institute moral processes for the reformation rather than the destruction of criminals. A. B. G.

"The certainty of punishment is one of the greatest restraints upon the commission of crime. In cases where our laws affix capital punishment, it is believed that many escape, from the repugnance we all have to the taking away of the life of a human being. That public executions, and publications of confessions made by culprits—generally exaggerated, and at all times of doubtful authenticity—have a most dangerous and pernicious influence upon society, I have long believed. The pomp, parade, and circumstance that accompany them, by heroizing their subjects, instead of being a terror to the vicious and the lawless, such is the vanity and frailty of poor human nature, that in place of shrinking from the spectacle, they seek the notoriety and thirst for the distinction.

"From the security and excellent discipline now in our State prison, no danger is or can be apprehended from the confinement for life of this grade of culprits. I therefore respectfully submit, whether it would not comport with the public feelings, and give equal security, to do away capital punishments by substituting confinement for life in our State prison.

"Imprisonment for debt appears to have attracted the attention of the benevolent and humane portion of society throughout every government advanced in the scale of civilization. That it is a relic of barbarism, that ought to be struck from the code of civilized nations, is what I have long believed. In the observations that I have been able to make upon this subject, I have never discovered that it has been carried into execution but on two principles of action: the first, to gratify malice, and the second, to force the debt of the unfortunate out of some humane and benevolent friend, that would not see an old acquaintance, who, perhaps, had seen better days, incarcerated in the prison house. Your attention is earnestly solicited to this subject, under a full belief, that the year 1837 will close the period in our State history, when to be unfortunate and in debt, is a criminal offence."

THEORY AND PRACTICE.

In our researches after truth, we shall very probably find men teaching one thing and performing another—or, from a ground-work of pure and righteous principles, deducing wrong systems of action. In such cases, we should carefully avoid confounding principles with men, and we should be strict and candid in separating the wheat from the chaff.

The infidel has made the practices of Christians, one point of sneering and attack upon Christianity. We acknowledge it to be a humiliating fact, that there have been many deeds committed by professors of Christianity, which illy comport with the precepts and requirements of sound morality. Yet the infidel has committed a great error, in thus attacking these as though they were the principles, or the effect of the principles of the Gospel itself. Truth is eternal—"Principles are eternal"; the truths and the principles of Christianity are handed down to us on record, and such as they were at their first promulgation, they are now. To the record, then, let the infidel go—on the principles of the record let him make war, if he can. He will there find the pure morality of Jesus. However beclouded and mis-reflected it may have been by the creeds and the actions of men, there it blazes forth, undimmed and unchanged, in all the brightness of its heaven-born lustre.

By this illustration we should be taught, whenever a theory is advanced, to go directly to the principles of that theory, and there examine their tendencies and their truth. Men are fallible mediums of truth, and through them it is liable to be misrepresented and perverted. "Principles, not men," is a motto worthy of universal adoption. Prejudice, misunderstanding, and wrong practice, will obscure the teachings of truth's best missionaries, and render them the sources of error, unbelief, and scorn But with the theory itself, plain and palpable before us, and with the aid of God, we may hope to arrive at truth as it is.

We should also learn by this, to let our practice correspond to our theory. Were this the case, we should stand in the place of the theory itself—"living epistles, known and read of all men." Then an attack upon us would be an attack upon our theory, and all the good influences of that theory operating in us, would furnish powerful weapons for our defence. Unbelievers do not generally attack our Master, but his followers—our Master was the living representative of the Gospel—and they hardly wage direct battle with that. Let us more closely imitate our great Exemplar, and the glory of Christianity will shine forth resplendent as the sun, and the nations will behold, and acknowledge, and feel the power of its truth and its brightness. E. H. C.

SUBSCRIBERS TO THE HERALD—It will require some time to get our mail books regulated, especially by the addition of your names thereto. Hence some delay may occur in sending you our first number, as the transfer was not made until after this volume was commenced.

If any of you must discontinue, and can not get some good subscriber in your stead, notify us immediately, free of postage. Postmasters, generally, or our agents, will give such notice.

Of Agents for the Herald, we request what we requested of our original agents—that they will please regulate their lists as early as possible—taking papers sent to discontinuers, and giving them to new subscribers, until they can learn, pretty nearly, the number of copies wanted for the year. Then, noting carefully all the transfers, who are old, and who are new subscribers, send us the names of subscribers and Postoffices plainly written. In sending pay for either past or present volumes, be careful to state on what volumes, and to whom it is to be credited. This is very important.

N. B. All new subscribers obtained after this date, and all payments for the present volume made after this date—in short, all business relating to either paper, from and after the present time, must be sent to, and transacted with us, in this place. Address

GROSH and HUTCHINSON.
Utica, N. Y.

 The Book store and Office of the Magazine and Advocate is in Catharine-street, a few doors East of Genesee-street. Catharine-street is just below the Canal, between it and the Rail Road. G. and. H.

TO READERS.—The entire Letters of Brs. Skinner and Campbell and the notices connected with the transfer of the Herald, necessarily crowd out many articles intended for this paper, and among the rest Br. Rayner's Essay. We would have given notices in an Extra, but this increase of business at this very busy season, rendered it impossible. We will make amends some other time. Till then excuse us. A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Until the crowd of business is past, let religious notices be here by Monday, and obituary and hymenial notices at least a week, before publication day. A. B. G.

PAPER MONEY,

It is a fact that of the remittances received for a few weeks past, not more than one-fourth of the money is bankable here. Will not our agents be careful and send us this State or United States bills, if possible. If not, Eastern money is next best to us. Southern and Western money we are compelled to sell off at a heavy discount, and Canada money we can not dispose of at all. In such cases we must charge the loss to the subscribers. We are frequently inquired of, if Eastern small bills will answer our purpose? We answer Yes, if it is not convenient to send this State money. G. and H.

NEW AGENTS.

Will J. H. Smith, Chestertown,—M. W. Jenkins, Marengo,—Nelson Coleman, East Richfield, A. Mills, Manlius, and Stillman H. Harvey, New-Port—Josiah Wright, Constantia—Edward Lindsay, Fort Plain—Luke Baldwin. Ogdensburg—Ezra P. Church, South Bainbridge, N. Y.—O. Eaton, Brockville, and B. D. Austin, P. M. Le Ray, O.—Levi Harris, Troy, Wisconsin Territory, please act as agents for this paper.

☞ For a list of agents see number 33, 34, 35, and 37.

UTICA—UTICA.

We believe our list in this city can be increased by our friends, and that now is the time to do it. We believe that every copy taken by new subscribers, will do more good to them, and more for the cause, than its cost.—What say our friends—will they try, each one, to get us more subscribers? A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. WAGGONER at Eatonville and at Esq. Snells in the evening—Br. BRITTON at Burrvilie—Br. FRENCH at Brownville—Br. J. T. GOODRICH at Norwich village—Br. C. B. BROWN in Jenning's Corners, Palermo—Br. SIAS at Tug Hill and on the West Road in the evening—Br. DOOLITTLE at Big Brook meeting-house, South New-Berlin.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. BROWN at Caughenoy—Br. WAGGONER at Middleville and at Cold Brook in the evening—Br. BRITTON at Lockport at 11 A. M. and at Carthage in the evening—Br. SIAS at Potsdam, and as friends may appoint in the evening.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in February, by Br. BRITTON at Plesis, and at Theresa in the evening—Br. SIAS at Perch River and at Pamelia Four Corners in the evening.

Br. WAGGONER will be preach on the evenings of January 22d, near Esq. Bates—23d at Lasselsville

Br. DOOLITTLE will preach on the evenings of 26th inst. at the Mayhew school-house.

Br. BRITTON will preach on the evenings of January 23d, at Fox Creek—24th, at Cape Vincent—25th, at Lyme, near Br. Halloway's—26th, at Pillar Point—29th, at Wilna, Sandhill—30th, at New-Philadelphia—31st, at Person's Corners—February 1st, at Alexandria Bay—2d, Thompson's school-house.

Br. SIAS will preach on the evenings of February 1st, as Br. Comstock at Alexandria may appoint—2d, near Anthony's—3d, near Zuller's in Parmelia—5th, at French Creek—6th, on Pillar Point, near Br. Stone's—7th, near Br. McWain's.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Cooperstown, for J C, L C D, J W and A T—P M, Nineveh, for A B—P M, Cazenovia, for M W—P M, Moscow, for J W—J S, Clyde—P M, Sheshequin, (Pa) for J T—S C, Sugar Creek, (Pa.) for self, J M and W F—J P 2d, Massena, for self and A C—J W C, Theresa, for J A K and J L B—H C, West Edmeston—P M, Winfield, for self and I C C—S M, Fort Ann—Rev. M L W, Bath, for self and D B—Rev. W H W, Eatonville, for self, A W, J W and F C—H F, Central Square, for self, S W and L G—P M, Ames, for B G—P M, North Easton, for self and S C—P M, South Hartford, for B M and C T—S B, Delphi, for self and J B—R P, Canajoharie, for self, D D and A V P—Rev. J L, Boston—A P, Grafton, (Vt.)—L B, Springfield, (O.) for self and G H—W C T, Valparaiso, (Ind.) for W M, I M, R R and G C—J L, Wolcott, for J W and N C—A W, Barre Centre—P M, Victor, for J W and J C—P M, Dunkirk—P M, Marcellus, for J M C—J D, Almond, for self and W U—T B and L C, Williamstown—B S K, Newport—P M, Booton, (Mich.)—Rev. A R G, Henderson, (Ills.)—A C, Columbia Lake, (Mich.)—G C, Louisville, (Ky.) for S S G. I B, J L S, S L, L B, H S H, A W and J P Y—T A P, Paines Hollow, for C D, D D P, I F and A B F—W K C, Ctsduwa, for self, J H and N R—P M, Pultneyville, for A W—E T, Harford, for M G—W W, Camillus, for self and J H W—R S, Wethersfield, (Vt.) for self, H S, H F and N W—P M, Montrose, (Pa.) for E B—J McC W, Manningham, (Ala.) for sundry subscribers—W S, Gilboa—R A, Livonia, for self and J P T—S D, Coffee Creek, (Pa.) for self, J M, E D, S C, E P, M W, W C H, B B M, B F P, R C, B D and J C—B A, Kelloggsville, (O.)—P M, Marion, (Mich.) for D P—A M, Saginaw, (Mich.) for self, A W B, W G E, S S C, H McL, A W and S B—P M, Homer, for M B—P M, Euclid, for S G L—P M, Cooperstown, for H T P, O W, D C C and M L—P M, Ridgeway, for P E.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

NEW YEAR'S ADDRESS.

The year hath fled—the dim, old time-mark'd year,
Clos'd are the pinions of its swift career.
Its deeds will now the Poet's skill inspire,
And link'd with chords that thrill on mem'ry's lyre
Will speak in song. And Hist'ry's muse will twine
Its wreath'd memorial 'round her classic shrine—
And Eloquence, when of the past it tells,
Will blend "the old year" with its magic spells.

The Past, the mighty and the mystic Past!
What records lie within its portals vast!
What bloody crimes, dark sorrows, vanish'd fears,
Seared hopes, forgotten pleasures, smiles and tears,
Throng in its pathway, Time's deep chariot track!
Nor all of human power can call them back—
Can bid the by-gone as the present rise
And its dim shades be life before the eyes—
Rebuild its temples, tune its broken lyres,
Uprear its shrines and light its smoulder'd fires.
How like a brilliant and a fleeting thought,
Is the best glory man hath ever wrought!
Oh, when we make mere earthly things our trust,
And lean on hopes as fragile as the dust—
When Pleasure's notes their tempting music breathe—
When Fame hangs out to view its dazzling wreath—
When mad Ambition urges us to crave
Some record on a column or a grave—
Whenever human passion, human pride,
Bids us from right or duty turn aside—
Seek where the torch of History appears,
(That light within the sepulchre of years,)
Go by its guidings and amid its glare
Trace out the deep mementoes sculptur'd there!

Or, through the vista of old ages, scan
All the achievements and the pomp of man.
Look where tam'd slaves have bow'd to tyrant-power,
Or haughty conq'rors triumph'd for an hour—
Or where soft Luxury hath her viol strung,
And raptur'd vot'ries on its breathings hung—
Or where the aspirant for a name, hath won
The people's plaudits or the [illegible]
Where thrones have on their tottering bases stood,
Or awful fields of battle glow'd with blood—
Where the lamp flicker'd in the student's cell,
Or the pale dreamer sought the golden spell:
Look, look, wherever man hath sought to claim,
Wealth, pleasure, honor, or a deathless fame,
How vain they were!—and let the Past impart
Lessons of truth and wisdom to the heart.

Good is it, also, for us that we tread
The paths where were the lov'd and worthy dead.
That from example, we should gather cheer
In all our sorrow—courage in our fear—
Strength 'gainst temptation—trust amid our gloom—
And light divine that gilds earth and the tomb.
To mark how merit from the dust arose—
How virtue conquer'd all its many foes—
How kindness cheer'd the sick—the pris'ner's bed,
Succor'd the needy and the hungry fed—
How patriotism by the altars stood
And bath'd the thresholds with its richest blood—
How love hath smil'd 'mid dungeon, block and shame,
And the chain'd Martyr triumph'd in the flame—
And how blest faith, by "cloud" and "pillar," trod
The lonely desert, heav'nward to its God.

Patrons, upon this op'ning of a year,
Whose magic light has just begun to cheer
Our eyes with radiant visions—and which wreathes
Hope's budding garlands, and around us breathes
Its festal joy and beauty—it is well
To pause, and, with the aid of memory, dwell
Upon the year just fled—now woven fast
To the great chain which links that "mighty Past."
Pardon the writer, then, that thus he tries
On the past times and things to moralize.
Trite though his language and his theme may be,
If they prove useful, well content is he.
We know the old year's changes—its bright hours,
Its darken'd times—its sunshine and its showers—
We see its train of circumstances rise
In billowy light and shadow to our eyes—
Each heart its own griefs and its gladness knows,
Or thrills for public joys or public woes.
And we must gather from these, in their turn,
Deep wisdom and instruction—we must learn
To walk and profit by the guiding ray,
And gird us up to journey on our way.

And so, while Time, like a skill'd charioteer,
In this new race has started his career—
While his wing'd coursers, nerv'd by his control,
Are pressing to another annual goal—
While he upon our path each passing hour
May cast a thorn or drop a fragrant flow'r—
When heav'n's own azure arch is o'er us bow'd—
Or the bright rainbow spans the stormy cloud—
Or storms themselves sweep round us—let our day
Prove bright or gloomy—be it what it may—
Read a pure moral from this oft-told theme:
Shape to right ends that course which right we deem.
Guided by duty—looking on the past,
With all its strange and varied hues o'er cast,
Gain lessons for the future—learn to scan
The worth and objects of the deeds of man—
Let each heart be an altar glowing pure
With principles that ever shall endure—
"Take the whole armor"—'mid the desert, night,
Storms, trials, temptings—trust the "arm of might."
God will be with us in the battle-shock!
Fresh streams will gush in fountains from the rock—
Branches of heav'n, with pleasant sweetness rife,
Will heal the Marah waters of our life—
A pure, a fadeless and a changeless ray
Will guide our feet upon our pilgrim-way—
Time will bring blessings in his fleet career,
And this will prove to all, A HAPPY YEAR.

E. H. C.

PAUL ON MARS' HILL.

Had the fact that Paul preached at Athens been mentioned without particulars, how great would have been our curiosity to know how he conducted himself who eminently ranks as a philosopher among the apostles, when he stood alone, an apostle among philosophers!—This was the noblest arena on which he had ever struggled; he had fought with beasts at Ephesus, but at Athens he contended with the master spirits of mankind. He was at once in the very palace of intellect, and the sanctuary of idolatry. All that his writings and recorded actions have unfolded of his character, rush upon our minds, and deepen our interest, and exalt our expectations, as we behold him, impelled by the fervor of zeal, and armed only in the simplicity of truth, advancing to glorify Jesus of Nazareth as the Lord of faith, in the awful presence of this world's wisdom.—Well did he acquit himself, in a speech where reason lays the broad basis of a spiritual theism, and revelation rears the lofty structure of judgment and immortality.—He spoke, as apostle should speak at Athens, in language worthy of himself, and his illustrious character, and heavenly commission;—worthy of the dignified auditory before which he pleaded; worthy of diffusion and transmission to remotest countries and ages, for reverential study; and worthy to be the shrine of those fundamental and everlasting principles which constitute religious truth, and are Christianity. Nor is it to him alone that our interest clings; for, from the dawn of intellect and freedom, has Greece been a watch-word in the earth. There rose the social spirit, to soften and refine her chosen race, and shelter, as in a nest, her gentleness from the rushing storm of barbarism—there liberty first built her mountain throne, first called the waves her own, and shouted across them a proud defiance to despotism's banded myriads: there the arts and graces danced around humanity, and stored man's home with comforts, and strowed his path with roses, and bound his brows with myrtle, and fashioned for him the breathing statue, and summoned him to temples of snowy marble, and charmed his senses with all forms of elegance, and threw over his final sleep the veil of loveliness: there sprung poetry, like their own fabled goddess, mature at once, from the teeming intellect, girt with the arms and armor that defy the assaults of time, and subdue the heart of man: there matchless orators gave the world a model of perfect eloquence, the soul the instrument on which they played, and every passion of our nature but a tone which the master's touch called forth at pleasure: there lived and taught the philosophers of bower and porch, of pride and pleasure, of deep speculation and of useful action, who developed all the acuteness, and refinement, and expansiveness, and energy of mind, and were the glory of their country, when their country was the glory of the earth.

But, although such associations as these work powerfully on our feelings as we turn to the page where what is most brilliant in profane and important in sacred history come in contact, we must remember that Athens appeared to the apostle under a very different aspect. There are sufficient indications that to the splendor of its name, and the charms of its literature, he was no stranger, nor insensible. The intellectual superiority not only of its sages, but of its inhabitants, must have been to him a welcome congeniality and a strong excitement; but it was something else which stirred his spirit in him, and stimulated the moral daring of the effort, through which the historian has enabled us to track his course, or rather to watch his flight. Athens was the very focus of idolatry. Its altars, statues, and temples were multiplied beyond parallel, and reckoned more numerous than those of all the rest of Greece together.—Petronius, the satirist, who was living then, said, "that his country was filled with gods, so that it was easier to find a god than a man." Athens was called the altar of Greece; and that "the city was wholly given to idolatry," or more correctly, was so full of images, roused the apostle to come forward as the champion of Jehovah, and demand the restoration of their homage to its rightful object, the only God, the Father of Christ.—Rev. W. J. Fox.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, December 28th, by the Rev. William D. Williams, of Steuben, Mr. Robert W. Roberts, to Miss Jane George, both of this city.

In Hannibal, Oswego county, December 25th, 1837, by Mason Pierce, Esq., Mr. Robert F. Butcher, to Miss Louisa Lowel, both of Victory, Cayuga county.

In Richmond, Va., December 23d, by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. Charles Gentry, of that city, to Miss Eliza Stagg, of Charles city, Va.

On Christmas Eve, in the Universalist church in Duanesburg, by Rev. Henry Belding, Rev. Marcy B. Newell, of Amsterdam, to Miss Marcia Ann Burton, daughter of J. Burton, Esq., of Burtonville, Montgomery county.

In Macdonough, November 12, by Rev. C. S. Brown, Mr. Samuel W. Niles to Miss Julia Benson—and Mr. William Sweet, to Miss Eunice Sly, both of Triangle.

In the Universalist meeting-house in Upper Lisle, December 3d, by the same, Mr. Alva Landers, to Miss Betsey Ingersoll—and on December 21st, Rev. Albert G. Clark to Miss Mary Giguet, both of Upper Lisle.

In Cincinnatus, October 29th, by Rev. A. G. Clark, Mr. Samuel McGuire, to Miss Dolly C. Totman.

August 30th, by Rev. H. P. Sage, Rev. J. E. Holmes, of Roscoe, Ill., to Miss Ruth A. Hawley, of Milan, Ohio.

DEATHS.

In Preston, on the 4th of December, Susan Amanda, daughter of Alford and Susan Clark, and sister of Rev. A. C. Clark, aged 5 years.

Her funeral was attended on the 6th, and a sermon from the words—"for we must all needs die," (2 Sam. xiv: 14) delivered by the writer to a numerous audience of relatives and friends. May all that mourn be comforted by the thought that God wounds but to heal, kills but to impart a happier life. J. T. G.

In this city, December 31st, of measles and inflammation on the lungs, Mary Ann, youngest daughter of Moses and Elizabeth Blakeman, aged one year, six months and nineteen days.

In Charlottville, Schoharie county, December 27, W. D. Stillman, Merchant, in the 30th year of his age.—He lived and died a firm believer and consistent advocate of God's impartial grace.

In York, December 7th, Adaline Matilda, daughter of William and Polly Hull, and grand daughter of Rev. C. G. Persons, aged ten years and five months.

This is the third child taken by death from this family, in five years. They are deeply afflicted—particularly in this last bereavement—but they sorrow not as those who have no hope. The funeral was attended at her late residence on the 8th, by Br. O. Roberts.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months: $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH.

Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1838. NUMBER 3.

PRIZE ESSAY.

Written for the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

"On the best practical means of promoting the knowledge and practice of Universalism:" or the "best method of teaching the principles of the Gospel, not only to the adult, by the preacher, but to the young, by the parent."

BY REV. MENZIES RAYNER, OF TROY, N. Y.

It is here, we presume, intended to be understood, that the principles of Universalism, and those of the Gospel, are synonymous. We think they are so, essentially and emphatically. Is the Gospel "good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people"? This, also, fully characterizes the doctrine of Universalism. It is impossible to imagine more joyful tidings than those which this doctrine communicates to mankind. It teaches the ultimate and utter destruction of all evil, of all sin, and of all suffering and sorrow, and the enjoyment of perfect felicity, uninterrupted, universal, and unending. How is it possible to imagine a state more excellent, a consummation more desirable, than this? This, the Gospel teaches as true, and this is the fundamental principle of the system of doctrine called Universalism.

Its advocates claim that this doctrine is agreeable to human reason, and the best affections of human nature; that it harmonizes with all just conceptions of the divine attributes; that it was explicitly taught by Jesus and his apostles, and is, therefore, fully contained, and without contradiction, in the scriptures of the New Testament. It is moreover claimed, that the doctrine of universal salvation was inculcated by some of the most distinguished Fathers of the Christian church in the age immediately after that of the apostles, and in several succeeding centuries; that its prevalence and influence declined only in proportion as Christianity became corrupted, and as the traditions and commandments of men were substituted for the authority of Christ, and the simple doctrines of the Gospel.

During the dark ages, (as they are justly denominated,) in which the Papal power predominated universally, both in civil and ecclesiastical matters, over the whole professedly Christian world, but little was known or heard of the doctrine of Universalism, and nearly as little, it is believed, of the pure principles and doctrines of Christianity. Ignorance, superstition, and clerical domination, every where prevailed over the understandings and consciences of the degraded vassals of ecclesiastical tyranny and oppression.

At the Reformation, when light began to beam through the thick darkness, and spiritual despotism was compelled to abate its rigor; as individual inquiry, the exercise of reason and private judgment, and free access to the holy Scriptures, began to be claimed as a right, and enjoyed as a common privilege, then, also, did the doctrine of Universalism again make its appearance. Individuals of the first talents and character, both clergymen and others, avowed their faith in it, as the most prominent feature, and the crowning excellence and glory of the Gospel.

Although traces of the doctrine may be found earlier, yet the commencement of its progress in the United States, is generally referred to the early labors of the distinguished Murray, with whom is commonly, and very properly, associated the excellent Winchester. They were, emphatically, angels, (i. e. messengers,) "flying in the midst of heaven, [the professedly Christian church,] having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, saying, with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment [or reign of righteousness] is come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of water."—Rev. xiv: 6, 7. In the appropriate and symbolic language of prophecy, these two heralds went forth proclaiming, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make straight in the desert a highway for our God; every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain; and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

Since that auspicious era, the cause of Universalism has prevailed with a constantly increasing and widely extending influence—astonishing to its opposers, and more than answerable to the fondest anticipations of its friends and advocates—sufficient to excite the grateful exclamation, "This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes." The accession of public preachers of the order, (a considerable proportion of them being converts from other sects,) amounting to nearly four hundred, and nearly double that number of societies, within the space of about sixty years, exhibits an accellerated progress, and a constantly accumulating energy and influence, rarely equalled in the annals of any other denomination.

This rapid increase is not, indeed, of itself, conclusive evidence that the distinguishing and fundamental principle of Universalism is true; for, other sects, embracing very different principles, have sometimes rapidly increased, and then again as fast declined. But there are some circumstances relative to the advancement of the doctrine of universal grace, and the "restitution of all things," which, it is believed, may be fairly stated in its favor. One is, that its advocates, in urging its claims to attention, make their appeal, not to the passions, but to the understandings of men. Another is, that while they direct them to the holy Scriptures, as containing a full and sure revelation of the divine will and purposes concerning mankind, they teach them to consider the sacred Records as addressed to their reason and common sense, and not subversive of either; and, moreover, that in consulting them, and endeavoring to ascertain their true meaning, they should lay aside human creeds and articles of faith, of every name and description, and all opinions derived from tradition, clerical prescription, or common consent.

By adopting this course, thousands have become convinced of the truth of the doctrine of Universalism, and have relinquished their partial creeds—and many, also, who by the contradictory and abhorrent doctrines of what goes under the name of Orthodoxy—claiming Scripture authority for its support—had been driven to deism and utter infidelity, have, by the above rational and judicious course, of consulting and examining the sacred Records, become satisfied of their authenticity, and have rejoiced in the truth as it is in Jesus, with unspeakable joy.

A large proportion of the converts to Universalism, have been made in this way—that is, by careful individual inquiry; so that they are able to give a consistent and satisfactory reason for "the hope that is in them." They are therefore, not likely to turn again to the "beggarly elements" of human creeds and "commandments of men," to which they had before been in bondage; but they commonly "hold fast the profession of their faith without wavering, knowing that he is faithful that promised." Hence it is very rarely that persons abandon Universalism for any other, or any contrary faith; whilst conversions from limitarian creeds to the doctrine of impartial and unlimited grace, are all of common occurrence. Indeed, it is impossible to ascertain, with any tolerable degree of accuracy, the extent of the revolution which, within a few years, has taken place, and which is still going on, in the Protestant Christian community, on account of the numbers in the different sects, who have lost, and are daily losing confidence in the contradictory and unmerciful dogmas of the systems to which they still nominally adhere, whilst, in reality, they are in sentiment Universalists, and which they frequently admit, with more or less caution and reserve, according to varying circumstances. An Episcopal minister, (whose name I forbear to mention,) some time since, made the frank acknowledgment, that he believed more than half of the communicants of his church were Universalists.

The charge of infidelity, so long made against Universalism, is fast losing credit, together with that of the licentious tendency of the doctrine. The injustice of the former is made manifest by the appeal which the professors and advocates of the doctrine constantly make to the holy Scriptures, as well as by frequent publications in defence of revealed religion, against the cavils of skeptics; and the latter, it is believed, is fully disproved and shown to be slanderous, by the general integrity and uprightness of its avowed believers and patrons, and the honorable comparison, with respect to morality, which, as individuals and societies, they will bear with those of other Christian sects.

It will scarcely be denied, that the doctrine of universal salvation and happiness, meets the earnest wishes of every benevolent mind, and is constantly embraced in the prayers of all the pious; which we think is no small argument for its truth. The voice of reason is obviously in its favor, and, above all, the inspired Records of unvarying truth, fully attest the holy and heavenly principle, and in no instance, when fairly and correctly interpreted, do they contradict it. So, at least, all sincere and well-informed Universalists believe, and thus believing, they, of consequence, devoutly desire its promotion, and its universal prevalence, as pre-eminently calculated to promote individual and social peace and happiness.

The important inquiry, then, is—What are "the best practicable means of promoting the knowledge and practice of Universalism?" or the "best method of teaching the principles of the Gospel, not only to the adult, by the preacher, but to the young, by the parent?"

The answer, it is apprehended, is not difficult; it may be comprehended in a few plain directions or specifications.

Let it be premised, then, in the first place—and the position will not be disputed—that the Gospel system is one and immutable. What the apostle declares of Jesus Christ, is true of the Gospel—it is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." And it is not a mysterious or complex system, although it has often been so represented in the mystifying creeds and platforms of human contrivance. The Gospel being the same that it originally was, the same means of teaching its principles and propagating its doctrines, which were employed by Jesus and the apostles, are unquestionably the proper ones, and the best. Varying circumstances may require a variation in some particulars connected with those means, but the general course of proceeding should be the same, and it should be that course which has the sanction of divine authority, and of primitive and divinely directed example. New plans and measures, of human device, with the ostensible object of promoting religion, but in fact for the interest and advancement of a party or a sect, as may often be the case, should not be sought or countenanced. Popular excitements may thus be effected, and sudden, and even violent emotions be produced, to a considerable extent, especially upon the minds of the young, the ignorant and unreflecting, the sanguine and the nervous—which may seem to promise a salutary result. But such excitements are usually of brief duration; and their ultimate and real utility is, to say the least, extremely questionable. They may (to use a borrowed figure) be fitly compared to "a flash from a dark cloud, which quickly disappears, and generally in proportion to the violence of the effulgence, is the succeeding gloom."

Public verbal teaching, or preaching, has, from the commencement of the Gospel revelation, been employed as a means or method of inculcating its principles; and it is fully warranted: "Go ye," said Jesus to his apostles, "into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." St. Paul, in his epistolatory directions to Timothy, after commending his early knowledge of the Scriptures, and noting that "all Scripture given by inspiration of God, is profitable for doctrine, instruction," etc., solemnly, and with strong emphasis, charges him as follows: "I charge thee, therefore, before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and dead at his appearing and his kingdom, preach the word: be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine." I will quote the apostle still further in this place, because the reason he assigns for this charge, is, I apprehend, applicable to the present circumstances of the Christian community. "For," says he, "the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts [desires, fancies] shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables." He then renews his admonition to Timothy: "But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions, do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry."

"The pulpit" may still be justly considered the "defence of virtue's cause," and of Gospel truth. Its abuse and perversion is no just argument against it, or against the public preaching and inculcation of the principles and doctrines of the Gospel. It is an important method of teaching and promoting the truth as it is in Jesus. But great prudence and caution are here necessary. I speak now, especially, as to Universalists: "Judge ye what I say."

Brethren, we need more ministerial labor: the fields are white, and in many places they are more and more whitening unto the harvest: the laborers are yet comparatively few; "pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest." But we want none, we need none, but such as the Lord of the harvest shall send forth. Possibly we could spare some that we now have, for it may be doubtful who or what thrust them into the field.

Great caution and prudence should be exercised in admitting persons into the fellowship of the ministry of reconciliation, that none be received but such as give satisfactory evidence of the correctness of their morals, the purity of their motives, their aptness and competency to teach, sufficient to elevate them above contempt or just reproach, and to give promise of, at least, some degree of usefulness. Especially it should appear that, as the apostle directs, their "loins are girt about with truth; having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and their feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace": the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, should also be their's. They should be clad in this "whole armor of God, that they may be able to withstand in the evil day"—that they may successfully wrestle against the "rulers of the darkness of this world—against spiritual wickedness in high places"—or in low places.

There is another passage so appropriate to this point—that is, the caution to be used in admitting persons into the fellowship of the Gospel ministry—that I must be indulged in quoting it. It is in St. Paul's second letter to Timothy, whom he had left in charge, as overseer, of the church of Ephesus. He says to him, "Thou, therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus; and the things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also." This, in relation to the character and qualifications of a Gospel teacher, is a full description in few words. The preacher, then, must be competent to the duties of the sacred office; and he must be sincere, upright, and faithful in the discharge of them—studying, as Timothy was admonished to do—to "show himself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

Timothy was exhorted to give attendance to reading, to meditation, to study. It can not be supposed less necessary that ordinary preachers, since the apostolic times, should give attendance to those things. Such attention is, indeed, indispensable, "that the man of God" may be thoroughly furnished—that the preacher, like a scribe well instructed, may be able to "bring out of his treasures things new and old"—rightly expounding and correctly applying the word of truth, so as to instruct and edify the sincere and well-disposed, and also, "by sound doctrine, both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers."

Such is the competency and the fidelity required in the Gospel minister. Such, the cause of universal grace urgently demands; and let me add, in a borrowed sentence, with little variation—Universalism "expects every man" (and especially every preacher of the order) "to do his duty"—and the issue, the glorious issue is not doubtful: VICTORY! must crown the united effort—when it may be triumphantly proclaimed, as in the loud voice which St. John heard from heaven, saying, "Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ; for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night. And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony."

Especially should the preacher be aware, and be deeply impressed with the sentiment, that the Gospel of universal grace and salvation, can be defended and promoted only in the influence and energy of its own spirit, the true spirit of its own doctrine; and this, we know, is a spirit of universal love and kindness. The Gospel breathes peace and good-will; it should, therefore, never be attempted to be defended, or its interests advanced, in a spirit of wrath or bitterness—"for the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." The apostle James ascribes to the Gospel its true character, and its genuine influence, when he illustrates it under the title of wisdom, "the wisdom that is from above;" which (says he) "is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy; and the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace, of them that make peace."—James iii: 17, 18.

This does not imply nor require, that the preacher, in his labors for the promotion of Gospel truth, should shun to declare "all the counsel of God"—that he should fail to expose error in all its inconsistency, and vice in all its deformity. The mischievous effects of both should be faithfully and fearlessly pointed out; and there are sometimes cases in which rebuke may be administered sharply. But this should be done reluctantly. Instead of seeking occasions for it, it should appear that the preacher regrets its necessity. Persuasive arguments, urged from those high and endearing motives which the Gospel so richly furnishes, should be his choice and his delight. "I determined," says St. Paul, "not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." To the Romans he says, "I am sure that when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ." And above all things, he gloried in the grace given unto him, that he should "preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."

Thus should the preacher labor to teach and promote, according to its true principles, and in its true spirit, "the Gospel of our salvation"—"the glorious Gospel of the blessed God." On all necessary occasions, he must be ready, also, according to the ability he possesses, and can possibly acquire, to defend the Gospel—to defend it from the attacks and the ridicule of infidelity—from superstition and wild fanaticism—from hoary, but unauthorized tradition—from the creeds and commandments of men, which have, in a great degree, made void the law, and perverted the Gospel.—Defend it, he should, from the malice and intrigue of its enemies, and from the no less injurious and deplorable corruptions of its professed friends and advocates. Ah, it is from this quarter that Christianity suffers most, that the Gospel is most reproached, namely, by false and hypocritical professors, who are destitute of its spirit, and practically opposed to its holy teachings. Of such the apostle speaks, and says, "Their mind and conscience is defiled. They profess to know God; but in works they deny him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate." It is against the deleterious influence of such, that the preacher should labor to preserve the pure priciples of the Christian religion. And let it be added here, it is against such characters, and the blighting effects of their example and spirit, that Universalism, as a system—embracing, as we fully believe, the entire substance and heavenly glory of the Gospel—against such false-hearted professors of the doctrine, (such there doubtless are, for such there were in the purest state of the primitive church,) who make it an excuse for their vices, who know nothing, and who care nothing about its sacred character, and its sanctifying energy—against the contaminating influence of such pretended friends, but in reality, worst of enemies, the principles and the whole system of Universalism, should be guarded with the utmost vigilance. That its foundation may stand sure, and that its superstructure may be duly proportioned, firmly cemented, and beautiful, it should have enstamped upon it that divine seal, thus described by St. Paul: "The Lord knoweth them that are his; and let every one that nameth the name Christ"—as a universal Saviour—"depart from iniquity." So will the blessed doctrine, founded in eternal truth and righteousness, appear in all its heavenly beauty, excellence, and perfection, "and fill the world with loudest praise."

Such are our views as to the "best practicable means of promoting the knowledge and practice of Universalism:" or, "of teaching the principles of the Gospel to the adult, by the preacher."

[To be concluded next week.]

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 1838.

JOHN IV: 1-26.

One of Mrs.——'s sons about the age of 18 thus writes to his father:—I have been supposing myself a superintendent of a Sabbath-school, or a teacher of the most advanced class in such a school, and I think the following are the principal remarks I should make in either capacity, in explanation of the passage of John which I have been studying to-day.

Verse 1-3. I should, on these verses, require of my class to specify as particularly as they could, the cause why Jesus left Judea and went to Galilee. I should not expect them to know more than the mere fact that the Pharisess bore a very remarkable degree of malice towards Jesus, that they frequently laid plans to destroy him—and that it was altogether likely that it was to avoid an attempt of this kind that Jesus now fled from the region where their power was the greatest, to one where it less prevailed. To enable my young students of the Bible, to conceive more definitively of the circumstances to which there is an allusion in these verses, I should ask them to suppose that any one of the sects now existing was the predominant and popular party in the religious world. I would leave them to take any one at their option. I, for myself, would fix upon the Presbyterians, as bearing perhaps, the nearest resemblance to the most ambitious and hypocritical sect among the Jews. I would then desire them to suppose that a great teacher had appeared among us, remarkable for the purity and simplicity of his manner of living, and for the soundness, clearness, and profundity of his views of divine truth, and, farther, that in confirmation of his views being accordant with truth and approved of Heaven, this teacher should have the power of working miracles. I would have them suppose farther, that we were now living before the days of our political independence, and that in consequence of some firmly believed though vague prophecy, we had been expecting earnestly for some time, some great man to appear, perhaps to emancipate us from provincial or colonial bondage, perhaps to deliver us from mental delusion and thraldom. In such circumstances it would be readily perceived, that immense crowds would wait upon the steps, and hang upon the lips of this great and wonderful being who had appeared among us. I would ask them now to suppose that the sect of whom they had made choice as the representative of the Pharisaic among the Jews, held a great many errors in the same veneration with sacred truth, and a great many silly and unimportant observances in still higher estimation than they did the most essential of the laws of God. These, every word and action of this Heaven-sent teacher would go to discountenance, by showing that his views were different; and occasionally, I would have them suppose that these corruptions and mummeries did not escape his holy indignation and open invective. I would have them endeavor to realize one of his rebukes for their sanctimonious observation of Sabbath-days, fast-days, prayer-meetings, religious contributions, etc.; and for their almost total neglect of true love to God; of the duties of benevolence and justice, and for their diabolical oppression and robbery of the widow, orphan and defenceless under the mask of zeal for the Lord, the Lord's house, and the Lord's treasury. They would readily perceive that just in proportion as the influence of the views of our new teacher or preacher prevailed, in equal proportion would the power, and influence, and means of these reverend leaders and lordlings be circumscribed and curtailed. As they loved, we suppose, these things more than truth, virtue and God, they would also hate him who deprived them of them, and openly assailed their doctrines and characters too. I would then ask them to conceive that John Murray had been this teacher, and that the predominant sect, had there been one in his times, had possessed the power of life and death, and to say if the party or church whom he thus had assailed, mutilated and "shorn of its fair proportions" and revenues, would, with the power in their hands, have left any means unattempted by which they could have stopped his mouth, and his influence, and blotted out his very name from among us.—Nay, verily! As far as their jurisdiction extended it would have been found too full of plots and "inductions dangerous," to that messenger of good tidings of great joy, to secure his effectually proclaiming his great message. From the scene of pious (?) power, hatred and persecution, we have been supposing, he would have had to flee, for his life and message's sake, to one where these could not reach him. Thus it was with Jesus when he fled from the Pharisee-and-priest-ruled sons of Judea to the more hardy and stubborn friends of independence in Galilee.---See article Galilee, Robinson's Calmet.

Verse 4. All that is necessary to illustrate this verse, is merely to look at the map, in which Samaria is seen lying between Judea and Galilee, as New-Hampshire lies between Massachusetts and Maine. I would tell them, however, that some of the Jews were so strict, so intolerant, so full of contempt and malice, that they would not set their feet upon such unhallowed ground, and on a journey to Galilee would make a circuit and pass through Perea on the right of the river Jordan.

Verse 5-7. I could not interest my young hearers more, than by reading the passage of Dr. E. Clarke's Travels which refers to this place and this transaction, nor could I better illustrate these verses. I would tell them that the city near which Jesus rested was the capital of Samaria, and that this well lay at the end of the valley in which that city, now called Napolose was built.—I would tell them that the well yet remains, and has been visited by many travellers. I would make them turn over to Gen. xxxiii: 19 and xlviii: 21, 22, and Josh. xxiv: 32, where the purchase of this Amorite valley and its gift to Joseph and his children is recorded. I would tell them that the hour named was noon, and that being the hour of extreme heat, and the usual time of halting and dining, it is quite a picture of Eastern travelling, a well and a shade being sought for the noon-day repose and repast. I would refer them to Gen. xxiv: 11, and other passages which show that drawing water and watering cattle was the business of the female department of a family.

Verses 8, 9. I would here explain the origin of the deadly hatred which the Jews bore to the Samaritans, and as an instance of its extent quote to them the Jewish saying—"That he who receives a Samaritan into his house and entertains him, deserves that his children should be sent into exile." That Jesus allowed his disciples to buy victuals from them, was a proof that he did not conform to every Jewish custom—that he was superior to national prejudices, for the Jews were not allowed by their spiritual guides, (well accustomed to lay on heavy burdens,) to purchase food from the Samaritans. I would also explain to them that intercourse would be a more appropriate word, here, than dealings:—no kind of communication.

Verse 10. I would here say I considered this kindness of God a better translation than the gift, etc. The fortunate meeting with the Messiah, they would thus be better enabled to see, was what is meant by the phrase, however translated. I would take occasion, here, also to remark how Jesus seized upon ordinary, every-day events to make them vehicles of spiritual instruction, and how suitable his remarks were to the occasion and circumstances in which they originated.*

Verse 11-15. I would ask my young class if, from this conversation, they supposed that the Samaritan woman understood the saying of Jesus. I would expect that they would easily perceive that she thought he had discovered some other spring or running brook, with which she wished to be made acquainted. But this I would also expect them to know was not the meaning of Jesus. I would say to them that I apprehended that Jesus had two objects in this address to the woman. Firstly, he seems to have intended to excite the woman's curiosity, and to lead her by insensible steps to the admission and belief of his being the Messiah; and, Secondly, it seems to me equally clear that as the first intention might have been served by some unambiguous discourse, the ambiguity of his present address was meant to keep her thoughtful about the dark saying, until by her own experience in Christian progress and the new life she should come to feel the truth and beauty of the proposition, that the germ implanted by Jesus yielded always more and more of satisfaction, composure and peace—so that the ardent thirst for happiness which no other fountain can quench, is fully allayed by the imbibing of his spirit and sentiments.† I would say to them that they might hold the saying of Jesus and this view of its meaning and intention in memory, and their future experience of the Christian life would enable them at some future day, better than at present, to decide upon the truth and value of this opinion.*

Verses 16-19. Jesus here changes the subject of conversation, and I would expect my youngest scholar to perceive the object of this part of it.—Of course, it was to lead the woman to the conclusion which she announces as an inference from it in the 19th verse—that Jesus was a prophet.

Verses 20-24. The use which the woman makes of the knowledge she had arrived at of the prophetical character of Jesus, I would scarcely expect my young class to understand without my informing them of the dispute between the Jews and the Samaritans about the proper place of worship. I would have them turn with me and read Genesis xii: 6, 7, xxxiii: 18, 20, and xxii: 2. Deut. xi: 29, and xxvii: 4. A good map might explain the phrase this mountain: they were standing in the valley at the foot of mount Gerizim. On Gerizim the Samaritans had their temple, on mount Sion the Jews had theirs. Jesus decides that the Jews knew more of God, and that from them was to come the Saviour; but as to the place of worship, gives no decision, as that was a matter of little importance. I would let the class know that in about 40 years from that time, worship ceased in these mountains. I would explain the phrase in spirit and truth, as meaning devotional and rational, or, perhaps, sincere. I would entreat them to walk up to the light and the convictions of duty they had, as the best way to insure their understanding, so much the sooner, 'the deep things of God,' such as this passage is. The more we walk in the Christian course, the better are we able to understand the things of the spirit!

Verses 25, 26. I would say that the Messias was expected by Samaritans as well as Jews, and that he would discourse upon just such subjects. Jesus now implants the germ of all future progress to perfection, even the belief of his divine mission. I would inculcate it upon them, that it was the great object of Jesus and his apostles to obtain credence for this proposition, as it, thence, necessarily followed that his doctrines were true, his precepts divine, and his whole message a revelation from a Supreme Parent to his weak, erring, benighted and unhappy family."

We may add, that in our days it is difficult to conceive of the importance of this single belief in primitive ages and of the consequences which it involved. Hence the many attempts at the explanation of a very simple affair, the meaning of the word faith. Hence also many of the improper uses of this word. P. P.

*This was also noticed in last Sunday's Mail. P. P.

†We do not find any similar view of this passage in any commentator or other author whom we have consulted; but we think the opinion of our young friend ingenious and worthy of consideration. P. P.

*We think the period alluded to is arrived when any one feels communion with God, or that "conscious harmony with God and the universe" which the reader may find eloquently expounded by Dr. Channing in the No. 43, volume of this paper. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

INTRODUCTION.

The condition of woman, and the estimation in which she is held by the other sex, is a true index of the state of civilization in every country. Wherever Christianity diffuses its divine influences—wherever the pages of literature, of science, and of the arts, are unfolded for the perusal of the great mass of the people, there woman is honored, her rights are respected, her value appreciated, her worthiness assented to—there she is the companion of man, and not his slave; the object of his confidence and love, and not the instrument of his despotic pleasure—there she is acknowledged an intellectual and moral being, capable of competing with the masculine mind in the acquisition of those attainments that adorn and elevate human nature. But in those lands where the light of Christianity has never shone—where the arts and sciences are known only to a small extent, and where mental and moral darkness cover the people—woman is a degraded menial, looked upon by man as only fitted to perform the drudgery of life, and to do his bidding.

To perceive the truth of these remarks, it is only necessary to survey the present condition of woman, in different portions of the earth. In Europe and America, where Christianity, civilization, and science diffuse their mingled influences, woman holds her highest rank, the native purity and loveliness of her qualities shine out, and her talents and capabilities are developed to a degree hitherto unknown in the annals of time. But contemplate her condition in other sections of the globe. Wherever the darkness of ignorance reigns in its most complete triumph, there woman is plunged in her deepest degradation. In Persia and Hindostan, in Turkey, in Georgia and Circassia, in China and the Loo-Choo Islands, while her condition is better than in many other parts of the world, it is still far inferior in every valuable consideration, to her station in Christian nations. She is worshipped, it is true, as an idol, in some of those countries; but the emotion arises no higher than admiration of personal beauty; she commands no respect for virtue, intelligence, and well-developed intellect. The immoralities of Mahometanism and Paganism, together with the unnatural institution of polygamy, unjustly rob her of her rights, her influence, and the dearest enjoyments of life. She is made the subject of barter and sale, "and her beauty, and sometimes her ability to labor, are made to contribute to the purposes of avarice and gain." In the islands of South America, in the Indian Archipelago, in Australia and Polynesia, in the Pelew, Society, Friendly, and Sandwich Islands, among the savages in the two continents of America, and in all Africa, woman is the servile dependent and slave of man—the object of his tyranny and oppression—compelled to perform the severest labors, and to drag out a miserable existence, subject to the caprice and whim of her lord and master.

Such is a brief survey of the condition of woman, throughout the world. The fair daughters of America can not be too thankful, that a kind Providence has cast their lot in this favored hemisphere, where they are blessed with privileges, and surrounded by advantages, of inestimable value.

The circumstances of the female sex, in what are termed civilized countries, have experienced material changes, at different periods of the world. In the first ages of the Roman Republic; the condition of woman was little better than that of a slave. She was confined exclusively to the labor of the household, and was subject entirely to the rule of her husband, who held even her life at his command. In after ages, however, as civilization advanced, the Romans estimated the female character more highly, and conferred many superior advantages upon the sex. But when the deep ignorance of "the dark ages" enveloped the civilized world, and enveloped in its murky folds, religion, literature, and science, the rights of the female were involved and lost in the common ruin. Her condition again became as deplorable as at any former period of time. But, after a lapse of many centuries, when Christianity emerged from the long night of darkness, and civilization once more began to polish society, a most remarkable change in the condition of woman commenced. From a state of abject servitude and bondage, she suddenly became exalted to the highest degree, under the influence of that romantic chivalry, which then reigned throughout Christendom. She was considered a being scarcely pertaining to earth, but was worshipped as a superior spirit; and haughty knights and brave cavaliers, devoted their lives to the defence of her character and honor. Poets celebrated her praises in strains of admiring enthusiasm, and the wandering troubadour sang of her dazzling loveliness and the witchery of her influence. This chivalrous devotion to woman, which elevated her as far above her real merits, as she was before depressed beneath them, continued for several centuries. But at length it began to wane under the influence of advancing knowledge and information, until it finally received its death-blow in the immitable caricature of Don Quixotte. This celebrated work, held up the knight-errantry of those ages, in a light so surpassingly ridiculous, that it vanished as by enchantment.

From that time, woman began to be viewed in a proper light, and her real value to be appreciated. While the beauty of her person had lost the enchanting power it formerly possessed, the beauty of her intellect, the purity of her heart, the kindness of her disposition, the depth of her affections, and the valuable attainments she began to develope, gave her an influence, not so dazzling, but far more extensive and enduring. It was perceived that females possessed minds as well as men—that they had been endowed by the Creator with the same faculties, and that they were capable of high attainment in every department of human knowledge.

This well-grounded respect for the real excellences of woman, has continued to increase to the present day; and the female sex in Christendom, now holds a higher and nobler rank than at any former period. Females are now justly celebrated as authors, musicians, and artists—they have become distinguished to an extent that would formerly have been considered impossible, in every branch of science and general literature. As the capabilities of their minds are more and more developed, the higher do they rise in the estimation of the other sex, and the more are they deemed worthy to become, not only their companions, but their assistants and counsellors. And although the matrons of our country, have not chosen representatives to assemble in conclave at Washington, to be consulted by Congress on the affairs of the nation, as was once proposed by an eminent female writer, yet, that their station in society is an honorable one, and that their condition and advantages are immensely superior to those enjoyed by females in other portions of the globe, can not but be acknowledged.

It is true, there are men to be found who think lightly of the whole female sex, and who pretend to doubt their virtue and their ability to acquire extensive knowledge. But such individuals, it will invariably be perceived, are either of an ungenerous, selfish, misanthropic, cynical disposition, or have mingled only with the degraded and abandoned of the sex. These men should have lived a few centuries past, rather than in the present age, to have their views comport with the general sentiment. It is not reasonable to look for perfection in woman. There are those of her sex, who are unprincipled and dissolute, precisely as there are such among men. But females seldom, if ever, become depraved until made so by man's superior depravity. It is as inconsistent and ungenerous to contend, that the entire female sex should be suspected on account of the frailties of some of their number, as to condemn the whole male race as thieves and robbers, because a few of them, comparatively, have been guilty of these crimes. The sneering inuendoes in which some men indulge, respecting female virtue, should be met by the frowns of every individual of honor, as a base attempt to calumniate the better part of our race—especially should ladies themselves discountenance such men, and avoid all connection or association with them. Compare the females of this country, as a body, with the males, and every candid mind will acknowledge, that among the former there is to be found far more purity, virtue, and modesty, far more kindness, benevolence, and loveliness of disposition, than among the latter, Those who decry the purity of woman, should be aware of the influence of such conduct. They should know that female virtue is the standard that regulates public morals, to a great degree, and that the efforts which they make to destroy that virtue, is a blow struck at the welfare of the whole community; for the purity and morality of both sexes, rise or fall together. The degradation of woman involves the corruption of man, and is the fruitful source of wretchedness to both. Instead, therefore, of deriding the morals of woman, every enlightened and honorable man, who values the improvement and exaltation of his race, will rather approbate, encourage, and cherish female virtue and excellence—will be pleased rather to observe it obtaining extension and stability, than to exert himself to destroy it! "When man shall be just to her nature, then will he have less cause to censure; for woman will have fewer faults to deserve censure. Her moral taste, refined and elevated by the perceptions of her intellect, will then present her to his view, as a manifestation of a superior nature—a copy worthy its original—worthy his confidence, companionship, and love."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LETTER.

To Rev. Thomas Castleton, Methodist clergyman at Springfield, Erie county, N. Y.

Sir—You will doubtless recollect that some time last Fall, (Saturday evening, November 11th, as I have it,) while attending a protracted meeting in Lodi, you, by way of illustrating the position that Universalism leads to suicide, inasmuch as the fear of endless misery is the chief circumstance that keeps people from it, related a story to the following purport:—That a young lady in Genesee county, had lately put an end to her existence, and left a letter, setting forth that she believed, (to use your own language,) "that when people die their spirits go right to God and are happy;" that she was tired of living in sin and enduring its consequent miseries; and that she had therefore concluded to kill herself, and thus enter into that state of holiness and happiness which she believed is to be the portion of all mankind, etc. You will also recollect that on the succeeding Monday, I called on you for information respecting the particulars of said event as narrated by you; and that, in answer to my inquiries respecting name, date, place, authorship, etc., you informed me that you knew no more about the affair, than that it happened in the town of Attica, and that you received the story from some one, you knew not whom, living in the town where I reside. You will also remember that you promised me you would endeavor to learn the desired particulars, and acquaint me therewith; and that subsequently when I saw you in Boston, you assured me that you would have the matter "fixed out" for me before you left town. But as many weeks have since elapsed, and I have received no communication from you, although you have been in the town of Boston a number of times, I therefore consider myself called on to remind you of your promise; and I sincerely and earnestly hope that you will see fit to pay some attention to the subject, immediately. I think, and I believe that an impartial public will think with me, that it is incumbent on you, either to prove the story true, or else acknowledge it to be a fabrication. I am free to say, as heretofore, that the story may be true, but still I consider it extremely apocryphal. I have heard a great many stories of that stamp, told for the purpose of injuring the cause of Universalism; and when inquired into, they have been found, for the most part, and sometimes altogether destitute of truth.—Again—the cause is anomalous. The annals of suicide do not shew that mankind destroy themselves under the impression of hope. When suicide is committed from any religious cause, that cause is commonly despair. "Hope keepeth the heart whole."

I subscribe myself yours in the love of truth,

Boston, December 18, 1837. Jason Lewis.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PHRENOLOGY ON ACCOUNTABILITY.

Br. Chapin—I am pleased with your brief defence of Phrenology, (Vol. viii, No. 49,) against the objection that it tends to exonerate the thief or murderer from guilt; and as your article is short, perhaps it would not burden the reader if I should add a short supplement. It is obvious to all who are accustomed to reflection, (or, in Phrenological language, to all in whom the organ of Causality is active,) that the vast system of cause and consequence, is as universal in the moral as the physical world—in fact, those who say most in defence of that indefinable free agency, by means of which, they suppose mankind capable of practicing good or evil independently of the motives and inducements which prompt to either, do still, "by their works, show their faith" in the connection between cause and consequence, in the operations of the human mind and the moral conduct of men; for without such faith, the preacher would no longer suppose himself doing good by his teachings and exhortations, and the father would deem it useless to instruct or chastise his wayward son. And, indeed, where is the man who, when asked what led a miserable neighbor to ruin himself with intoxication, is ever known to give as his only answer, "the man is a free agent"? Every one knows the most common answers to such a question: "He had an ungovernable appetite for spirits from a child"—"He was trained to it by his drunken father"—"He was enticed by his intemperate associates, or foolishly betook himself to the bowl to drown his troubles." And if we inquire the cause of any other of the vices or virtues of a well known individual, we commonly find an answer ready, referring either to his original disposition, or to some of the circumstances of his life. It is plain, therefore, that the Phrenologist does no more than others, to screen from guilt the drunkard, thief, or murderer. Others trace wickedness to the real or supposed cause, and he does no more.

But be all this as it may, if the science has its foundation in truth, as I verily believe it has—if it is sustained by facts which lie open to the inspection of all—then it is manifestly vain to raise objections against it, on account of its real or supposed discordance with the preconceived opinions of mankind. At any rate, it is rapidly gaining the confidence of the most enlightened and influential portion of the community; and I pray, and pray in faith, too, for the approach of the day when its soundness shall be as little questioned as that of the Newtonian system of philosophy now is. I do not thus pray because I wish to gratify public curiosity, but because I see a beautiful harmony between the feelings which Phrenology is calculated to inspire, and the true spirit of the Gospel. Jesus teaches that sin is moral sickness—that its subjects need a physician: that benevolent Phrenologist, G. Combe, says, that those who have an unfavorable development of the moral organs, "should be treated as moral patients"—and I say, Amen. And when this subject shall be more generally understood, the world will practically respond to such mild and humane doctrines, and the spirit of cruelty and revenge, as well as that of cold, unfeeling neglect of the miserable victims of sin and transgression, will be left to starve for want of food on which to live. J. FRENCH.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Br. GROSH—We feel it our indispensable duty to send you the following report for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, with a request that the Glad Tidings and Union will copy the same.

In behalf of the committee,

SOLOMON DUTTON.

TO THE PUBLIC.

We, the undersigned committee, being duly appointed by the First Universalist Society of Columbus, Warren county, Pa., for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of certain evil reports which are in circulation, and which tend to defame the moral character of Rev. Judah Babcock; Do report—That upon a full investigation of the subject, the reports appear to be wholly groundless—that they have been framed, and put into circulation by some evil designing person or persons, for the purpose of gratifying their malevolent feelings towards a Brother's family, with whom our Rev. Brother visited.

We would further state, that we have been blessed with the ministerial labors of Br. Babcock, in our society, one-fourth of the time for nearly two years, and that he has labored, both in word and deed, to good acceptance.—We would therefore recommend him, as an engaged, able, and worthy Brother—one well calculated to do much good in society; and, as we verily believe, an instrument in the hand of our heavenly Father in spreading the truth.

SOLOMON DUTTON.
BENJAMIN DEAN.
SETH S. RAYMOND.

Columbus, Warren county, Pa., December 28, 1837.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1838.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF DIVINE JUSTICE.

There is probably no subject in theology, which so much occupies the thoughts of religious persons, and which overwhelms their minds with such awe and terror, as that of divine justice. Its retributions are the continued dread of believers, and are by them as constantly denounced against all evil-doers. And they are nearly always supposed to relate to some penal infliction, of greater or less intensity—of temporal or eternal duration. The intolerable wincings of the wicked under the consciousness of guilt, the melancholy mopings of many a good and upright soul, are the common result of terrific apprehensions, of the suspended visitations of the justice of God, For it seems to be a general and well settled rule with most persons, to forget, if they ever knew—or not to know, when the evidence is both abundant and at hand, that while the operations of eternal equity render punishments in one instance, they may, at the same moment, and by the same means, administer the most distinguished and desirable rewards in another. So that there is at least, as much to hope, as there can be to fear, from the full and impartial exercise of unerring justice.

With a view to the promotion of truth, as well as the advancement of human happiness, by relieving the minds of the apprehensive from unnecessary fears, a few illustrations of the processes of divine justice are here presented. Instances might be adduced from common life—and it is believed that many will occur to the recollection of the reader; but as Scripture authority and examples are always final, such, only, are introduced.—1.—The history of Joseph, recorded in Genesis, is familiar to all persons who read the Bible. Its successive developements of the operations of the system of eternal justice are no less clear, interesting and impressive, than are its multiplied and affecting incidents. And why the former should be so uniformly overlooked, while the sympathies of every reader are excited and kept in full exercise by the latter, is a fact for which it is not easy to account.

It will not be doubted, that the unnatural brethren, who maliciously and cruelly sold Joseph to strangers—to be employed, or disposed of they knew not how—who, in the most wanton and tantalizing manner, could impose the story of his death upon their unsuspecting and affectionate father, were in all respects proper subjects of the visitations of retributive justice. This they evidently feared, and this, the story furnishes abundant evidence, was in due time and in proper measure inflicted. We have but to notice the windings of providence, and the compunctions which, from time to time, they betray, to be fully satisfied that justice was performing its inflexible work. Witness the strong feelings—the mental agonies which wrung their very hearts, when the stern governor retained one of their number as the pledge of their return. This trial forced from them the utterance of the deep-and long smothered guilt, which had, for a series of years, been gnawing at the vitals of every earthly enjoyment. And they acknowledge that they were "verily guilty concerning their brother—when they saw the anguish of his soul," and regarded it with indifference. Nor can it be supposed that this was the first touch of the finger of condemnation upon the chords of moral feeling. The very anxiety they manifest respecting the fate of their younger brother—the deep, noble and truly filial regard which they felt for their aged father, show that penitence—genuine repentance had, long since, been performing its salutary and its trying work. Neither was this the last instance, in which the smitings of guilt overwhelmed their souls with apprehension. When the patriarch, their father, went down to the chambers of death—their worst fears were re-awakened that their wrongs would be visited upon them, with unrestrained and unmitigated vengeance.

Now let it be observed, that while all this retribution was in progress on one hand,—the same divine justice was performing a very different work on the other—and was loading the subject of human injustice, with honors, and distinctions, and peace of mind. The persecuted but unoffending Joseph, steadily and uniformly rose from suffering and degradation, to the enjoyment of human confidence, and the highest prosperity and honor. But his reward consisted, not alone in temporal favors—always actuated by the purest principles of integrity and virtue, he was always at peace with himself. He enjoyed what the wicked never enjoy, the approbation of his own conscience, and the conviction of the favor of Heaven.

But divine justice, in this instance, was performing still another work. It was not merely punishing the wicked, and rewarding the good and innocent—it was successfully reforming and purifying those whom it chastised. No man can read the truly eloquent and feeling address made by one of these offending brethren to the lord of all Egypt, in behalf of their father and their deeply implicated younger brother, without being satisfied that they were, indeed, sorry for their offence, and solemnly determined to sin no more. Indeed, this is observable in every step of the history, from the moment of their first arrival in Egypt. And though constantly haunted with fears of the severest retaliation at the hands of him whom they had injured, they appear never once to have contemplated the least injustice, either to him or to one another.

Let any person read the story of Joseph, with reference to the actual operations of divine justice, and we must greatly err, if he does not find much more to hope than to fear from its application and influence.

2. Passing by a long train of events in Jewish history, where rewards keep even hand with punishments, as in the protection and final emancipation of the Hebrews, while their oppressors are chastised—in the continued success and honor of David, while his persecutors one by one were humbled or removed—we notice, more particularly, the dealings of eternal justice with the Jews for their rejection of the Saviour.

It is, perhaps, not singular, that in this remarkable instance of retributive justice, we should see little besides mere sufferings and punishment. For, as Christians, we very naturally allow our feelings to take an interest in the cruelties practiced by the unbelieving Jews, upon Jesus and his followers. And doing so, we at once perceive the equity of that providence, which measured to them in obvious strictness, "according to their works." But we should do well to embrace several other considerations in our view of the subject; and, while we regard with astonishment the severe measure of retribution dispensed to the wicked, recollect the blessings which that event tended to bring down more speedily upon the persecuted believers. Nay—we should look forward to the developments of the influences which have been in progress for ages—and which are declared to be salutary and redeeming to those who suffer chastisement.

The actual wretchedness of a wicked disposition—where no overt or direct act of sin has occurred, should always be taken into the account in our estimation of punishment. But it is more than probable, that this is generally overlooked by the great body of Christians. They might learn to correct their error in this respect, by noticing more carefully what is passing among mankind. On this principle, punishment always commences at precisely that point of time, in which the design to commit sin is conceived. Hence, there is a long period of chastisement endured by the persecutors of Jesus, before they consummated their wicked purpose by putting him to death.

It were useless to detail that series of sufferings which finally ultimated in the destruction of the Temple, and the dispersion of the Jews. They were plainly as numerous, and as aggravated in character and intensity as were ever endured by any people on earth. But their punishment is not to be estimated by their physical calamities—nor may we suppose them terminated by their dispersion. To the protracted persecutions of about eighteen centuries must also be added the enormous amount of mutual anguish, in feeling themselves cut off from all the privileges common to Christians, and from the best enjoyments allotted to man—the full and free enjoyment of their religion. All this is the just punishment of their national ingratitude, corruption, hypocrisy, and cruelty.

But while all this is transpiring, there is a work of a far different character, in constant progress. The Jews were the original persecutors of the Christians—and where they could not effect this object directly, they carried it on, by stirring up the Gentiles to acts of violence and oppression. The suppression of the power of the Jews, and their consequent dispersion, produced an immediate and corresponding change in the situation of the Christians. One, and the most inveterate class of persecutors, now ceased to annoy or afflict. And a few years comparatively, left the believers in Jesus, to the undisturbed enjoyment of all the blessings of their religion; and the free use of all the means at their disposal, for its diffusion among mankind.

When it is recollected, that the primitive Christians were in all respects, unoffending, patient and unresisting under all their severe trials; it will appear consistent with the awards of impartial justice, that something more than the self-approbation which the good enjoy under all circumstances, should fall to their portion.—And in their deliverance from persecution, this was actually brought about. Not merely and alone in exemption from sufferings—but in the new and universal respect, influence and distinction to which they attained. We do not mean, that fictitious eminence, to which they were raised by a doting emperor, and which consisted in places of power and emolument—but that honorable place in the public esteem, which was earned by their exemplary virtues. These things were their reward—and they were as effectually and as obviously bestowed by the hand of equal justice, as were the chastisements of the persecuting Jews.

Let us now return to those, who have been so long the subjects of severe chastisements. Their punishment is not only allowed to be just—but we can perceive no way by which divine justice could be vindicated, had they not been punished. But while all this is plain—it should be asked, whether any object, save that of mere sufferings, is to be obtained by their punishment? Is it an allowable supposition, that a benevolent and holy God who administers the affairs of the moral universe, has no further design in the infliction of punishment, than the production of a given amount of misery? To us, it seems impossible that any sane mind can either make, or allow of such a supposition. All our better feelings cry out against it—all parental government, even among the rudest of mankind, rejects it—and all revelation contradicts it.

No attribute of God, can possibly have for its field of legitimate exertion, the simple misery of sentient beings—because all his attributes are good. It is the province of diabolical natures, alone, to riot and expatiate in wo—and it savors of such a nature in him who can seriously ascribe it to the Deity. And fearful and abiding as are the sufferings of the Jews, there is still a door of hope open to them—a hope, which, under some form, has never, for a moment, been taken from them. That hope is not merely allowed by the reasonings of the mind—it is authorized by the Christian revelation. For the well instructed author of the epistle to the Hebrews, in full view of the impending storm of sufferings which was about to fall on them, assures them God chastised them that they "might be partakers of his holiness."—Justice, then, in its most trying and protracted inflictions, always has in view, the reformation of the punished.

In view of the considerations and facts disclosed in the foregoing illustrations of divine justice, it may be safely assumed that, under every form of its operation, there is something to hope—as much, at least, to hope, as there can be to fear. For in every situation of trial and chastisement, it may be, and it certainly ought to be remembered, that justice has higher ends to answer, than those of mere misery and wo. It is indeed true, that we may not immediately perceive what these are, or how they are to be brought about—but arguing from the past to the future, and from the uniformity of the moral providence of God, we should in justice to ourselves, and for the credit of divine and impartial equity, infer a latent good in all our chastisements. We may, and ought to suffer for our offences—but even this should never induce despair. We must, and we shall receive adequate rewards for every act of duty which we perform, but we should not vainly and pharisaically assume, that because the wicked are punished and the obedient rewarded, therefore the difference between them is absolutely eternal. Both have the same ultimate end—to render mankind good, and consequently happy. Let us thank God for his justice—not because it chastises, but because his chastisements "afterwards yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby."

S. R. S.

REV. J. B. PITKIN.

A neat volume of 352 pages, 12mo., has just come to hand, bearing the following title:—

"Sermons by Rev. J. B. Pitkin, late Pastor of the Independent Christian Church in Richmond, Va., with a Memoir of the Author, by Rev. S. G. Bulfinch. Boston: Published by David Reed. 1837."

This work was long since promised to the public, and for a number of months has been anxiously looked for from the press, especially by the Society and friends in Richmond, who had formerly sat under the ministry of, and became so strongly attached to, that amiable and excellent young man, and devoted and faithful servant of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The volume before us, consists of the memoir of the author's life, filling about forty pages, and fifteen sermons, on the following subjects, viz.: Christ Crucified, the New-Year, Divine Justice not inconsistent with Divine Love, True and False Religion, Resignation, On copying the Character of God our Father, On the Proper Manner of Preaching, On the Duty of Mercy, the Doctrine of Election, God the Father of all, Human Guilt without excuse, On Contentions in the Christian Church, Godliness Profitable to all Things, On the 4th of July, 1833, and On the Future Destiny of Man.

Since receiving the work, we have found time to read about one half of the sermons, to glance hastily over the other half, examining them, however, so far as to perceive the general drift and scope of them, and have attentively perused the whole of the Memoir. The sermons breathe a deep and fervent piety to God, a warm and expansive philanthropy to man, an ardent love and charity towards all mankind, a desire to render himself useful in the cause of his Master, and an earnestness in impressing on the minds of his hearers, the great moral principles and practical duties of the Gospel, rather than a zealous defence of, and attachment to, the speculative opinions or controverted dogmas of any particular creed.

Mr. Pitkin, however, was far from being indifferent to the influence of opinions, or devoid of a well-defined system of faith in the leading and distinguishing doctrine of the Gospel of Christ. He was a firm and consistent believer in, and zealous advocate of, the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. He believed in future rewards and punishments, as a doctrine alike sanctioned by reason and revelation. But believing that probationary means to man, and the mediatorial office and reign of Christ, would extend beyond the narrow isthmus of time into the future world—that means which had failed in the salvation of many individuals in this life, would, by being continued, prove efficacious in accomplishing it in another—he doubted not that, at last, every knee should bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father—that Christ would see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, and a ransomed universe forever bask in the sunshine of Jehovah's omnipotent and changeless love. Such being his views, he faithfully and honestly preached them to his people, from the commencement to the end of his public ministry. And although a large part of the volume now before us, is devoted to practical subjects, yet these sentiments seem to imbue and pervade the whole, and to appear directly or indirectly in almost every sermon.

The memoir, prepared by Rev. Mr. Bulfinch, is, for the most part, well written, and instructive to every attentive reader, let him be of what party he may in religion. It exhibits, in striking colors, the native dignity of human nature, and the strength of a lofty genius, beating its way up from the humble obscurity of orphan childhood, to dignified manhood and an honorable and useful station, despite of untoward fortune and feeble health, and sour and cold-hearted bigotry watching his opening buds of genius but to blast them, and throwing her arms around him, not to protect, and bless, and encourage the poor orphan, but to crush and destroy him. It seems almost a miracle that a youth like him, of such susceptibilities, should not have utterly fallen under such influences as were brought to bear upon him. Indeed, he most evidently would have fallen, had he not fortunately found when he did the healing balm of Gilead, the true Gospel of universal grace, and peace, and love, that soothed his anguished spirit, and healed his bleeding heart.

There is one particular mentioned in the memoir, respecting the correctness of which, we must acknowledge ourselves somewhat skeptical. Mr. Pitkin died of consumption, at St. Augustine. On his way thither, and but a few days before his death, he called at Charleston, S. C., where he became acquainted with Mr. Bulfinch, the author of this memoir, who was then, by exchange, supplying the desk of the Unitarian church in that city. He says of Mr. Pitkin:—

"Among his directions to the writer, at this time, was one which he can not forbear to fulfil, though in so doing, he may weaken that tie which connected Mr. Pitkin with some of his brethren, who were undoubtedly worthy of his cordial regard. Mr. Pitkin requested that it might be distinctly made known, that his views of the future state differed from those of the Universalist connexion, even from the doctrine held by Restorationists. It was his conviction that the human mind, created free to choose between good and evil, would retain that freedom hereafter;—that as some resist all the means of good here, so in the future state some will resist all the means employed by divine love and justice for their correction and restoration to happiness, and continue obstinately impenitent. Such depraved spirits must at length become so miserable that annihilation will be mercy to them, and in mercy, he believed, God will blot them out of existence. The final destruction of the hopelessly impenitent, he regarded as indicated in Scripture under the name of the second death. With the exception of those thus annihilated, he believed that the human race would at length be restored to purity, and raised to everlasting glory. A venerable member of his society in Richmond, recalls the conversation in which an idea of this description was expressed by himself, and commented on by Mr. P. as something new to him. His friends in Barrington, (his native place in Mass.,) mention that once while among them, in 1833, he spoke of the annihilation of the utterly and hopelessly impenitent, as something within the range of speculation; but it is not remembered that he had ever expressed a full belief in this doctrine in his sermons or otherwise."

Although we would by no means wish to impeach the honesty or integrity of Mr. Bulfinch, the respected Unitarian clergyman who prepared the memoir of Mr. P., yet, as before remarked, we can not but be somewhat skeptical in regard to the foregoing statement—and for the following reasons:—1. It is utterly at variance with all the writings and public labors of Mr. Pitkin, and with the fundamental principles distinguishing him during his whole ministry. Mr. Bulfinch himself admits that he never expressed a "belief in this doctrine [annihilation] in his sermons or otherwise." The whole tenor of all the fifteen sermons published in this volume, is utterly at variance with the doctrine of annihilation. Take for a sample the following, from the fifth sermon: "I thank my Creator, that he neither permits a cold philosophy which would terminate my existence with the grave, nor the fear of never-ending misery to disturb my peace. Can any part of the creation of God be indifferent to him—out of his control or care? Can man, man whom he created in his own image, ever cease to be the object of his love? If there is a Creator of all things, will he create virtuous hopes, holy expectations, a longing after immortality, on purpose to disappoint and annihilate them? To believe this is to impeach his wisdom and goodness. Is it not improbable that an allwise, good, and all-powerful Being should create an intelligent, thinking, sensitive being, like man, and then so constitute him that his existence shall be a curse to him? Yet this must be the case if we eventually suffer more than we enjoy." [And this must be the case, too, if the wicked after suffering protracted misery, shall be at last annihilated.] Numerous other quotations might be made, of similar import to the above.

2. At this very visit, Mr. Bulfinch says, Mr. Pitkin "spoke of the value of his sentiments to him, and his earnest wish for their diffusion. The inquiry was made, whether he found that those sentiments sustained him in the prospect of death. 'Yes,' he said, 'they have supported me hitherto, and I have no doubt my death will be triumphant.'" Now the question occurs, What were the sentiments that had supported him hitherto? Were they the new views of the annihilation of the hopelessly and utterly impenitent, which he had embraced on his journey from Richmond to Charleston! or were they the long cherished sentiments of the benevolent and parental character of God, the doctrine of life and immortality beyond the grave, the disciplinary character of all chastisements, and the final holiness and happiness of all mankind? Which could he have referred to, in saying, "they have hitherto supported me, and I have no doubt my death will be triumphant"? We leave every candid reader to judge.

3. Mr. Pitkin never communicated any information of a change of his sentiments on this subject, or of his holding the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked, to his own kindred and friends—not even to his own tenderly beloved mother, with whom he held such frequent epistolary correspondence, whom he had been instrumental in converting by his letters, from Calvinism to his own cheering views, and whom he had but recently visited; nor to his own society in Richmond, to which he preached till within a few weeks of his death; nor to a single member thereof, nor to any confidential friend, of whom he had a number, and many with whom he (see pp. 1 and 2) was doubtless on quite as familiar terms as he could have been with Mr. B. But to no person in the universe does he lisp a syllable, but to him! and to him only just before his death! It is hard for us to believe so strange an event. If ever an honest man lived, we believe John Budd Pitkin was one. And we think, had he believed, or been strongly inclined to the opinion, he would, as an intimate friend, have named it to some in Richmond, hinted something of it in the pulpit, or in some of his writings, and especially communicated it to his beloved mother.

4. The "venerable member of his Society in Richmond," who had mentioned the subject first to Mr. P., and to whom reference is made above, we have seen since the publication of the book. He informs us that he well remembers the conversation, and that he mentioned the annihilation of the wicked, not as a doctrine that he believed, but as one that to him appeared altogether more rational and consistent with the character of God, than the doctrine of endless misery—that if there were any that should prove utterly and hopelessly impenitent and irreclaimable, he should think it would be mercy in God to annihilate them, rather than prolong their existence for no other purpose but to torment them. And, indeed, any Universalist or Restorationist, would concur in the remark. But this venerable member said he did not believe it; for he did not think it Scriptural; nor did he think there were any so utterly and hopelessly impenitent that they could not be reclaimed. For Christ says, all things are possible with God. Nor did he ever suspect Mr. P. believed in annihilation. Many of the members of the Society in Richmond, are far from giving credit to such a report. They also think Mr. B. has not made the best selection that might have been made. Though the sermons here published are valuable, they think he left many manuscripts still more valuable than most of these.

In conclusion, we would ask, taking all the above facts into consideration, is it not possible, and even probable, that Mr. B. misapprehended the meaning and design of some of Mr. P.'s remarks on the subject?—that an incidental remark that annihilation was more probable than endless misery, or that if there were any utterly irreclaimable, it would be mercy to annihilate them, was construed into an avowal of belief in annihilation? Or is not such a supposition altogether more probable than that such a remarkable change as that narrated, and under such circumstances, should have happened? We think so. Again: Mr. P. is said to have avowed a difference of sentiment from Restorationists. He might have differed from some: for there are some Restorationists who believe in the Trinity. But Mr. P. was Unitarian on this point. But we have no idea that he ever renounced the doctrine of the Restoration, or embraced that of annihilation.

The volume before us we cheerfully recommend, as a source of instruction to the inquiring mind, of consolation to the afflicted, and of spiritual food and encouragement to every devout and pious Christian under heaven. D. S.

Richmond, Va., December, 1837.

THE RECORD.

Having surmounted the principal difficulties attending the commencement of the volume, we commence our weekly record of news.

Conferences.—A Conference was held in Oxford, on December 27th and 28th. Discourses were delivered by Brs. Clark, Landers, A. Williams, T. J. Smith, and Whiston. The attendance was very good, and a pleasant season was enjoyed. An ordination took place, as will be seen below.

New Preachers.—We have the pleasure of recording two more conversions in the ministry. Rev. Levi Chase, of Fall River, Mass., a preacher of the Christian denomination, attended a meeting held by Br. A. Case on Cape Cod, for the purpose of replying to him: but at the close of the services of the day, avowed his faith in the doctrine of universal salvation. Rev. Mr. Harris, pastor of the Calvinistic Baptist society in Malden, Mass., has lately avowed his faith in God's impartial grace. Both these converts are men of good standing in their respective denominations.

Ordinations.—Br. A. G. Clark was ordained on December 28th, at the Conference held in Oxford. Sermon by Br. ———. Br. W. S. Cilley, of Chatham, Mass., was ordained at a dedication in Dover, N. H., on December 8th—Brs. Moses Ballou, Gilman and Mandell took parts in the services.

Removals.—Br. T. D. Cook, having removed from Wolcott, Wayne county, to Gaines, Orleans county; Br. William Andrews, removes from Gaines to Wolcott. These excellent young men have proved themselves workmen that need not be ashamed, and while they gain some relief from incessant study, neither society will lose anything by the exchange. Br. Andrews labors three-fourths of the time in Wolcott, and the remaining quarter in Manchester, Ontario county.—Br. J. G. Adams of Claremont, N. H., removes to Malden, Mass.

New Societies.—A new society was formed in New-Gloucester, Me., December 23d. They talk of building a meeting-house next season.

Dedications.—A new meeting-house, erected by Universalists, was dedicated in Weare, N. H., on the 11th inst.—Another was dedicated in Clarendon, Vt., on December 27th. Sermon by Br. K. Haven. The house was crowded. Sermons were delivered in the afternoon and evening by Brs. W. Skinner and R. Streeter. The house is of brick, 52 by 38 feet, and contains 54 slips. The Universalist house in Dover, N. H., was dedicated December 8th. Sermon by Br. M. Ballou. The house was filled with ladies. Br. T. F. King preached in the afternoon. A union house of the Christians, Methodists and Universalists, was dedicated at Randolph Centre, Vt. December 7th. Sermon by Br R. Streeter. The three denominations are united in it with great harmony.

Br. Price, please credit Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Cooperstown, and U. Sawyer, Brimfield, O. each $2, and charge G. and H.

Br. Tompkins, please credit Abigail T. Peake, Canajoharie, N. Y. $2, and charge G. and H. Also direct J. B. Covey, Caledonia, to Livingston, instead of Genesee county.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on third Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. Smith at Clinton, and in Hampton in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. Brown at Caughenoy—Br. Waggoner at Middleville and at Cold Brook in the evening—Br. Britton at Lockport at 11 A. M. and at Carthage in the evening—Br. Sias at Potsdam, and as friends may appoint in the evening—Br. E. E. Guild at Jacksonboro, at 11 A. M.—Br. A. C. Barray at Genoa (and, if the friends desire it, for three or four succeeding Sundays)—Br. Goodrich at Norwich village instead of the third Sunday.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in February, by Br. Britton at Plesis, and at Theresa in the evening—Br. Sias at Perch River and at Pamelia Four Corners in the evening—Br. C. B. Brown in Onondaga South Hollow, (and once every four weeks thereafter until further notice)—Br. Guild at Worcester at 11 A. M.—Br. Goodrich at New-Ohio, and at Nineveh in the evening.

Br. E. E. Guild will preach in the evenings of January 26th, at Colliersville—29th, Worcester—February 5th, Jacksonboro—7th, in the Lutheran church, South Worcester—17th, Roxbury, as Br. Follet may appoint.

Br. Goodrich will lecture at Paige Brook on the evening of February 3d.

☞ A Conference will be held at Springport, Cayuga county on the 24th and 25th inst.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

B F H, Brownville, (Mo.) for self, J H McF and J I—Rev. W Q, Bristol for J A, L H, A F, A G, G P and E W—P M, Lavanna—P M, Johnson's Creek, for D A—I T H, Clintonville, for self, M M and R T—L J, Boonville, for A I M—Rev. J W, Ohio City, (O.) for U S, O S, S O and G C—A M T, Carroll, for P M—Rev. A D, Hornelsville, for S D—P M, Wethersfield, for S F F——J R, Marietta—P M, Jacksonville, for self and E E—P M, Stockbridge, for J P, J Y, A G S, C S, F S and G G—P M, Erieville, for W J A, A M, M P and C J—P M, Portageville, for G W, J G S and J D S—Rev. T P A, Perry—P M, East Pembroke, for self, T C S, S W and B L—S J E, Pine Plains—P M, Kendall, for F A and I S—J B, St. Johnsville, for T B—B T, Newbury—O T, Churchville, for E B, N F and L L—P M, Perrinton for J P—P M, Greenwood—Rev. J H S, Centreville, for N J, S W jr. J C, N B. A E C and O P—P M, Factoryville, for A S and D B H—E H, Evans' Mills, for J C and E V—P M, Moscow—S B L, Oil Spring—P M, Royalton, for H B and W J—P M, Sippican, (Mass.) for B H G—P M, Meig's Creek, (O.)—Rev C S H, South Lyndeboro', (N. H.) for R M D and D W H—R C, Scipio, (O.) for A B, A C R, J S and E W K—C S, Huron, (O.) for self, L G H, I B W, H W S, I L B and C S—L W, Penn Line, (Pa.) for self and B B—P M, Huntington, (O.) for self, C B and M H—I A, Bennington, (Vt.)—S P S, Allensville, (Ind.) for I P—D B, Harpersville, for B W, T K, A and R B, A and A B, E K and C H—P M, Clockville, for self, J I, E R and S G—P M, Cooperstown, for J C, O L W and C C—P M, Scipio, for D P V and W C—J S, Byron, for E E, F J, B C, R M, G L L, I S, M A and J F—W H S, Poughkeepsie, for self and J C H—D K, Newark, for self, E L, E O P, A L V, S L, R P, C A S and J F—E W, Moravia, for self and J I—P M, Genesee Valley, for F F—P M, Watervale, for R S jr—P M, Benton, for D B.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate

THE SPIRIT TO HER INTERPRETERS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Dark traitor of my deeds, Oh, false and faithless eye!
I little deemed of all, that thou wert most untrue;
Of all my confidants, thou chosen one; Oh why,
Why must I still be doomed to chide, yet love thee too?

In vain do I upbraid, in vain rebuke thy speech
Thy glances will be fond, and full of tender light;
I strive to hide my thoughts—but 'tis in vain I teach
Thy soft betraying darts to stay their rapid flight.

Thou wilt not o'en forbid the melting tear to steal
Upon thy soft, dark fringe, in language full of love;
And every hope and fear, and every joy I feel,
Thy trembling flashes tell, thy downcast glances prove.

I shut my casket up—but lo! thou hast the key;
Thou hast stolen all my gems, and scattered them abroad;
I dreamed not when I taught my language unto thee,
That thou wouldst be the first to break thy plighted word.

False sentinels, ye lips! how treacherous of your trust!
I bade ye guard my thoughts—but ah! your telltale sighs—
Your soft, betraying smiles! How fickle, how unjust,
To tell the scoffing world how deep affection lies!

Thou voice! oh I could chide—and chide thee harshly, too,
That all thy tones should flow, so fraught with sympathy!
Because another speaks, and I feel the language true,
Thou'rt sure to tell the tale, whate'er the subject be!

And yet why should I chide? why wish to hide my deeds?
'Tis only guilty thought can have a cause for fear;
The giddy world may scoff—but many a spirit bleeds
To hear another's sigh, and mark another's tear!

'Tis sweet for me to know how deeply others feel—
Then why conceal my thoughts so daintily secure?
Dear ministers of love! 'tis well that ye reveal
The secrets of the soul, so long as they are pure.

PAUL ON MARS' HILL.

[Concluded from our last.]

On many minds the effect would have been different, for idolatry there put on a most fascinating and a most formidable shape. It had much to impose on the senses. Probably no scene of mortal creation was ever so enchanting as that presented in a walk through Athens during its splendor. From the [illegible] and disjointed fragments of its beauty, our artists draw their noblest inspirations; and in them our country boasts a treasure of which all civilized nations may envy the possession. Oh! to have seen them glittering in their own sunshine, in proud harmony with the temples from which they have been torn: to have passed through those streets which were but long galleries of godlike forms in marble, and ascend that Acropolis which was the citadel, not only of their safety, but their fame; to have witnessed the living magnificence of their worship, and especially of their festivals; the gorgeous attire of their priests; the solemn pomp of their sacrifices; the interminable variety of their processions; the multitudinous concourse of their citizens; the clouds of fragrant incense that alone could obscure their transparent atmosphere; the thrilling delight of music resounding from roofs whose beams had been the masts of Persian fleets; the majesty of their theatres, which inspired the sense, not so much of pleasure as of sublimity; the agonizing excitement of their games, and the distribution of those simple prizes of the palm branch, or the crown of olive, pine, or parsley, for which Europe has no sceptre or diadem that the victor would have taken in exchange must he have bartered his Grecian glory too; to have seen these, and idolatry pervading them all as their vital spirit, and reigning by them over hearts and minds, might rouse the zeal of a Paul; but a feebler faith would have dissolved in the enchanted cup, and been incorporated with the profane libation.

Athenian idolatry had much to charm the imagination. It not only had been adorned by the most gifted hands; it not only had a rich stream of song ever flowing through its consecrated grounds; but it was essentially poetical, the very child of fancy; and its Pantheon the vision of genius made visible and palpable to all. Its deities were the beings whom the poet sees in his day-dreams on the shores of the ocean, or by the bubbling fountain, or in the recesses of the grove, or on the mountain's summit. They were not the original product of the pallet or the chisel, nor their original abode the marble temple; for their first creator was poetic enthusiasm, and their first shrine the poet's soul. Nor did it want for means to seduce the judgment, for in their mythology was many a noble truth, which some might deem the lovelier for its graceful veil of allegory; and they had a philosophy, which has indeed obtained in most ages, teaching to think with the wise and act with the multitude; and the example of their most venerable sages sanctified an outward conformity with detected superstition; and their countless divine persons, might be resolved into one divine essence, as easily as a smaller number; or as even now the philosophic Brahmins of Hindostan profess to adore but the one God in whom they believe, in the homage they pay to their deified thousands, whom they account the personifications of his attributes.

With all this fascination to attract, idolatry had also terrors to strike with awe. Bloody penalties had vindicated its insulted altars. Nor was philosophy allowed too contemptuously to curl the lip even at its most childish ceremonies. The martyrdom of Socrates was a memorable lesson. With all social enjoyments and occupations; with all the actions of private, and forms of public life, was idolatry incorporated. Patriotic recollections and paternal education gave it all the strength and fury of prejudice for its protection. There were yet the laws which imperiously and capitally prohibited the introduction of a new religion by individuals—there was yet, though shorn of some of its powers, the dreadful tribunal of the Areopagus. And there was, still more formidable, the zealous attachment of the multitude, soon roused in such a cause to rage, and the ready executioners of any sentence dictated by their own mad passions.

Why did Paul not waver, nor shrink—nor his mind feel any impulse but to the bold assertion and demonstration of the sole Deity of Jehovah, the God of Moses and of Christ? What nerved him against so much to entice the unstable, and confound the timid? He knew that, under this specious outside, there lurked a system of falsehood; that an idol was nothing in the world; that they were the creatures of men's hands or fancies, and not the creators of heaven and earth; that, however adorned, the whole was but a monstrous pile of delusion and imposture; he knew that, to a great extent, it was both the result and the source of criminality; that its basis was fabulous, its oracles mere tricks, many of its ceremonies licentious, and its tendency degrading to heart, mind, and character. He knew that God was one; so to be traced in nature, so revealed to the patriarchs, and by Moses to the Jewish people; and so declared by Christ, the divinely commissioned and universal teacher: that worship is his due alone, and rendered to others at the peril of the worshipper. He knew that acceptable homage consisted not in the victims they offered to placate, or the exhibitions they framed to please their deities, but in the language of the heart, in contrition, resignation, and filial love; an adoration in spirit and in truth. He knew that a corrupt religion entailed a corrupt morality, and had relaxed the bonds of duty, and bent its standard to their passions, and obliterated its sanctions, and led them far from the rule of right, and the prospect of retribution. He knew that, however such deviation might be palliated in times of ignorance, God had now introduced a new and universal dispensation, and commanded all men every where to repent. He knew that Christianity would conduct even the best and wisest of them to a nobler wisdom, and more exalted virtues, and richer privileges, and sweeter enjoyments, and the otherwise unattainable dignity of being the conscious sons of God, bearing his image and possessing his blessing. He knew that Providence, by the foolishness of preaching, saved them that believed, confounding things that were wise and mighty, that no flesh might glory. He knew that truth, religious truth, so all-important to man, brings with its knowledge the obligation not only of consistent conduct, but of manly profession and zealous propagation. He knew that, as a chosen minister of Christ, his apostle to the Gentiles, and so honored after being a deadly persecutor, there was a wo upon him if he preached not the Gospel; and he knew that whatever earthly inducements there were of blandishment or terror; whatever he might incur of self-denial, loss, disgrace, or peril, all was trifling in the prospect of that appointed day when God would judge the world in righteousness, by Jesus Christ, and all receive according to their deeds. On these convictions he acted: and he did well and wisely, for humanity, for Christianity, for mankind.—Rev. W. J. Fox.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 9th inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. JOHN RICHARDSON to Miss FRANCES TALCOTT, both of this city.

In Manheim, December 27th, by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, Mr. JOHN D. DIEFENDORF to Miss MARY ANN LOUCKS.

In Salisbury, same day, by the same, AARON BARTLETT, Esq., to Miss DELIA DIBBLE, daughter of Nathaniel Dibble, Esq.

In Brownville, January 4th, by Rev. J. Britton, Jr., Mr. JOSIAH BONNY to Miss MINERVA PECK, all of that place.

In Clinton, December 28th, by Rev. D. Biddlecom, Mr. FREDERICK PUTNAM to Miss MARY ANN MAYNARD, both of Augusta.

In Preston, December 27th, by Rev. N. Doolittle, Mr. MOSES STEWARD to Miss OLIVE BROWN.

In Plymouth, December 28th, by the same, Capt. WILLIAM CHURCH, of Oxford, to Miss LAURA BARNES.

In Guilford, December 31st, by the same, Mr. WILLIAM WESTCOTT to Miss MARY SHELLON.

In Bath village, July 20th, 1837, by Rev. M. L. Wisner, Mr. LEWIS GREGORY, of Ithaca, to Miss MARTHA GAGE, only daughter of Reuben and Azubah Gage, formerly of Benton.

Also, November 13th, by the same, Major HENRY GOFF, of Howard, to Miss MINERVA SMITH, of Bath.

Also, December 21st, by the same, Mr. JEREMIAH MURPHY, of Illinois, to Miss CLARISSA ANN VEILY, of Bath.

In South Bristol, in December last, by Rev. W. Queal, Mr. SAMUEL BUSH, to Miss ESTHER BRACE.

DEATHS.

In New-Berlin village, on December 16th, Mrs. CHARLOTTE BRIGGS, consort of Thomas Briggs, aged 30 years.

Her death was unexpected and sudden, and took place under circumstances peculiarly calculated to aggravate affliction and to call into action all the tender sympathies of human nature. She has left behind an affectionate husband, a young daughter not yet sensible of the irreparable loss she has sustained, and a numerous circle of relatives and friends. Her funeral was attended on the 18th, at the Episcopal meeting-house, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered by the writer, to the bereaved friends, and a respectable and attentive audience, from Matt. v: 4. I. HAYWARD.

In Tioga, Pa., May 20th, 1837, of consumption, ROSABELLA, consort of Stephen Saxton, aged 59 years.—She embraced Universalism in consequence of being enlightened by reading the Magazine and Advocate, and especially Mr. Skinner's Letters to Aikin, and lived and died rejoicing in its most holy consolations.

In Concord, Geauga county, Ohio, November 4th, of inflammation on the lungs, Mrs. MARY CURTISS, consort of Ransom Curtiss, late of New-Hartford, N. Y., in the 32d year of her age. She lived beloved and died lamented by all who knew her, rejoicing in the faith of a world's salvation.

In Monroe, Ashtabula county, O., October 11th, Mrs. LYDIA NILES, consort of David Niles, Esq., in the 78th year of her age. They lived happily in the marriage union 59 years. She was a firm believer in Universalism, and was sustained by its consolations in her long illness and dying hour. She has left her aged companion, and lineal descendants to the number of about 60, to mourn her departure, and to follow her, in due time to the heaven and home of all.

In Vestal, October 2d, CHESTER S. ROBBINS, aged 2 years. Sermon by Br. C. S. Brown.

In Salisbury, December 12th, of inflammatory rheumatism, Mr. PHILO SMITH, aged 66 years. For several years he was a class-leader among the Methodists, and used all his powers to destroy the doctrine of impartial grace; but previous to his departure, his faith enlarged—his hope increased—his charity was gratified—he became a believer in and advocate of the faith he once destroyed, and exclaimed with his dying breath, "I DIE A UNIVERSALIST!"—and his end was joyous and glorious. He has left a widow and several children, who were directed to the fountain of consolation, at his funeral, on the 14th, by Br. W. H. Waggoner.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months: $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH.
Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, JANUARY 26, 1838. NUMBER 4.

PRIZE ESSAY.

Written for the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

"On the best practical means of promoting the knowledge and practice of Universalism:" or the "best method of teaching the principles of the Gospel, not only to the adult, by the preacher, but to the young, by the parent."

BY REV. MENZIES RAYNER, OF TROY, N. Y.

[Concluded from page 18.]

It is also an important inquiry, "What is the best method of teaching the same principles to the young, by the parent?"—that is, in families.

An enviable character is divinely given of Abraham, in this respect, as recorded Gen. xviii: 19: "For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him; and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment." Parents can not, indeed, compel their children to be upright and pious, but they may restrain and preserve them from many evils and vices; and they may incite them to the practice of virtue and goodness; and their influence, if judiciously exerted, will be great, and generally salutary and effectual, agreeably to that oft-repeated aphorism of Solomon, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." In the second book of Samuel, ii: 23, there is an account of the prophet Elisha going up from Jericho to Bethel, and the history says, "as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald head; go up, thou bald head." Job also says, with respect to himself in his affliction, "Young children despised me; I arose, and they spake against me." Those must have been naughty and perverse children, whose parents, unlike Abraham, had not commanded their children and households, nor taught them to keep the way of the Lord.

St. Paul intimates, that Timothy's early attention to the Scriptures, as well as his embracing the Christian faith, and his firm attachment to it, was in a great measure owing to the careful attention and the religious education he received from his mother and grandmother, with whom the apostle appears to have been acquainted, and who were probably among the early converts to the Christian religion. In writing to Timothy, St. Paul addresses him as his dearly beloved son—invokes on him the divine benediction, and then says: "I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers with pure conscience, that without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day; greatly desiring to see thee," etc.—"when I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice, and I am persuaded that in thee also." Those excellent women had doubtless taken care to imbue the docile mind of the young Timothy with useful knowledge and religious sentiments—to have him instructed in the sacred records of the Old Testament; and after their conversion, they were, no doubt, solicitous to instil into his opening understanding, the pure principles of the Gospel of peace and salvation. And their maternal exertions were crowned with the divine blessing. What a worthy example is here exhibited for the imitation of mothers, in the religious instruction of their children—especially when, in consequence of removal by death, or from any other cause, such instruction may not be furnished by the other parent.

But although in impressing religious principles upon the minds of children, much, very much depends upon the early and patient attention of the piously disposed and the pains-taking mother, yet the government and discipline, and providing for the proper education of children, are duties devolving especially and imperatively upon the father. Appropriate here, and sufficient, though briefly expressed, is the direction given by St. Paul, in his epistle to the Ephesians, v: 4, 5. After admonishing children to obey and honor their parents, and urging obedience to the duty by the consideration of the special promise annexed to it, he turns his admonition to fathers, and to the duties incumbent on them towards their children: "And ye fathers," says he, "provoke not your children to wrath, [to the Colossians he adds, "lest they be discouraged,"] but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

Dr. Adam Clarke's commentary and remarks upon the above passage, we consider judicious, and quote them with entire approbation: "Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath—avoid all severity; this will hurt your own souls, and do them no good: on the contrary, if punished with severity or cruelty, they will be only hardened in their sins," or perverseness. "Cruel parents," says he, very truly, "generally have bad children. He who corrects his children according to God and reason, will feel every blow, on his own heart, more sensibly than his child feels it on his body." He then very justly remarks further: "Parents are called to correct, not to punish, their children. Those who punish them, do it from a principle of revenge; those who correct them, do it from a principle of affectionate concern." Query—Would the Doctor have been willing to apply this reasoning to the disposition of the Creator and Father of all, in his proceedings in another world, with his erring and disobedient children?

Again: in reference to the duty of fathers towards their children, the commentator remarks upon the apostle's direction as follows: "Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Nourish them in the discipline and instruction of the Lord. The mind is to be nourished with wholesome discipline, as the body is with proper food. Discipline," says he, "may refer to all that knowledge which is proper for children, including elementary principles and rules for behavior, etc. Instruction may imply whatever is necessary to form the mind, to regulate and purify the passions, and necessarily includes the whole of religion. Both these," continues he, "should be administered in the Lord, according to his will and word, and in reference to his eternal glory. All the important lessons and doctrines being derived from his revelation, therefore they are called the discipline and instruction of the Lord."

Although this would seem to be all that is necessary to be said, with respect to the duty of parents in the religious instruction of their children, yet some few additional remarks and observations, it is hoped, may be acceptable and useful.

The particular inquiry now is, as to the best method of teaching children the principles of the Gospel. That this may be done to good effect by the parent, it is necessary that the parent should possess some correct views of the Gospel, and should understand, at least, its most important principles.

The Gospel, as noticed in the beginning of this essay, is "good tidings of great joy," and to this is added, "which shall be to all people." This is a concise, yet full and beautiful description of the nature and design of the Gospel. If another definition may be allowed, in perfect accordance with it, we would say, the Gospel is a revelation of the favor and goodness of God, to the world of mankind. And here we would remark, that it is only a revelation of what was equally true before. The supreme Being, in his nature and perfections, and in his disposition and purposes concerning the human race, is invariably the same. He was equally good and benevolent before the revelation of the Gospel, as since—the Gospel has only revealed the divine character, and his will concerning mankind. This revelation expressly declares, that God is love. This is his nature: it always was, and always will be so, without increase or diminution; and we thence infer with certainty, that the divine nature can possess no attribute or quality contrary, or in opposition to love, or which shall prevent or counteract it, in its objects or its exercise. Love, then, divine love, embracing the whole human family, is the fundamental and governing principle of the Gospel. And this should be early and deeply impressed upon the minds of children. The Almighty should never be represented to their tender minds, as a wrathful, revengeful being, full of hatred and fierce indignation towards his frail and erring offspring—easily provoked and hard to be appeased—and who has prepared a hell of inconceivable torments, in which to punish his enemies, in company with frightful and malignant beings, called the devil and his angels to all eternity. Such representations have often been made to little children, even by their own, doubtless well-disposed, but mistaught and greatly misjudging parents. Yes, and by public teachers, also, most improperly denominated preachers of the Gospel—the Gospel of the grace of God.

Instead of terrifying children with such fearful exhibitions as above described, they should be taught to reverence, adore, and love their great and good Creator, as their Friend, and who will always be so, and who can not be otherwise, because he is love—who, in all his dealings with them, and in all his providential visitations, seeks and intends their best good. They should be taught that if he afflicts and chastises them, it is always in mercy—not for his pleasure, but for their profit, "that they may be partakers of his holiness." Especially they should be taught to regard the Almighty in the endearing character of a Father, far more benevolent, tender, and affectionate, than any earthly father, towards his dependant children. Thus the Saviour taught: "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven, give good things to them that ask him?"

Such amiable and affecting representations of the supreme Being, will have the best tendency to lead children to reflect upon their Creator with pleasure, to reverence his name and character, and to love him supremely, both as the greatest and the best of beings.

And this love to God, is another principle of the Gospel, naturally flowing from the first, great, and all-pervading principle, the love of God towards us, agreeably to which St. John says, "We love him, because he first loved us."

Universal benevolence, is another principle strongly inculcated in the Gospel, and it will invariably accompany sincere love to God. "Beloved," says St. John, "let us love one another; for love is of God, and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us. If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God, love his brother also." Brother, here, includes all mankind; for all men are brethren, children of one common Father. As such we are to love all men, and though they may be enemies, and injurious to us, still we should love them—should wish them no manner of evil, but all possible good. This will be imitating the great source of love and benevolence, our Father in heaven. Hear the divine Teacher upon this subject, the benevolent Jesus: "Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you, that ye may be the children of [may be like] your Father which is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust; he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil." O divine Benevolence! O heavenly charity! fulfilment of of the law—perfection and glory of the Gospel, and source of every excellence—may our hearts be fully possessed of the sacred principle, and may we teach the same to our children, that they also may know and keep "the way of the Lord."

Obedience, universal obedience, is every where enjoined in the Gospel, and may be considered either as a principle or as the result and effect of those already noticed. The love of God will invariably lead to Gospel obedience, in all its branches; for this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments. And when the heart is fully imbued with the principle of divine love, then God's commands will not be grievous; his service will be perfect freedom; and it will be our delight to "walk in the commandments and ordinances of the Lord."

Parents, as ye love your children, teach them early the true principles of the Gospel. Their influence will be most salutary in every succeeding stage of life—will tend to preserve them from the beguiling allurements of the world, attendant on prosperity, and will shed a heavenly lustre amid the gloom of adversity, and point to regions of ineffable delight—

"In fairer worlds on high."

Let your instructions to your children be derived principally from the holy Scriptures, and especially from the Gospel, the last and best revelation of God to man; containing the wisest counsels and the most worthy patterns for imitation; and wherein, also, are many "exceeding great and precious promises"—promises "to you and to your children, and to all that are afar off." Administer your instructions and admonitions with mildness, condescension, and affectionate tenderness—"provoke them not to anger, lest they be discouraged." And particularly you should bear in mind the great importance of accompanying your good instructions and counsels to your children, by the exhibition, in your own disposition and conduct, of the good principles and virtues which you teach and commend to them. So will your counsels be heeded, and commonly effectual: you will be "blessed of the Lord, and your children with you"—and when your earthly pilgrimage shall be ended, and you shall have been "gathered to your fathers," your children will rise up and call you blessed.

Finally: the Gospel, in its principles, its consolations, and its heavenly hopes and prospects, is adapted to people of all ages and conditions—an inestimable gift from our heavenly Father, the God of Love. Appropriate, therefore, is the pious and pathetic address of the Psalmist, with which we close: "Kings of the earth, and all people; princes, and all judges of the earth; both young men and maidens, old men and children, praise the name of the Lord: for his name alone is excellent; his glory is above the earth and heaven—praise ye the Lord." Amen.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 1838

MATTHEW VI: 1–18.

The passage which we have selected for consideration this week, seems to have been a very frequent subject upon which my revered friend had exercised the understandings of his family, and the spirit and sentiments of which he had endeavored to have them imbibe. Accordingly, I find many observations and exercises illustrative of our present study. I select from these a paraphrase by the son who was intended for the ministry, chiefly because it is continuous. We think some of our young friends might easily rival it, if they would only try. Whether they do or do not, of one thing they may be assured, the attempt to understand these sayings of Jesus, to express them in language of their own, and to conform their conduct thereto, will not be useless nor unrewarded. The passage suggests one exception to this remark, however. If in these actions and these endeavors they are stimulated merely or chiefly by a desire to secure the notice, the applause of man, there will be a reward truly, but not the reward which flows from a consciousness of nobler motives—not the reward of a full-souled satisfaction with which our indulgent Father rewardeth those who work in the way He would have them—who look off from man and up to Him. But if the essays referred to arise from no love of display, no desire of applause, but from a sincere and pains-taking desire to apprehend the true sentiments of the best Teacher of wisdom to man—from a desire to improve the powers 'richly bestowed' upon us for the advancement of the Redeemer's influence and dominion over the world—from a desire to be daily becoming more and more like our Elder Brother—then every one who thus makes the attempt shall be rewarded, not by man's vain, unsatisfying applause, but by the Author of peace, and joy, and conscious harmony with himself.

Here follows the substance of our young friend's commentary, using that word as synonymous with paraphrase.

"I perceive in operation among men, a most prolific source of vain pursuit and vexation of spirit. I see men struggling, above all things, to obtain the notice, the admiration of their fellows. No deed, in itself, however worthy and required of God, do they consider of consequence enough to perform, unless the eye of man is upon them, unless they will thereby secure a name or a wreath of fame from their fellow-men. This principle of action deserves the severe reprobation of every one who professes to teach wisdom's ways, and specially doth it deserve the censure of him, whom God hath sent forth to teach to his erring and unhappy children, the paths of peace and the road to happiness. I entreat you, therefore, my hearers, to abjure this principle of action, because it is a destroyer of your welfare, a bar to your progress heaven-ward, and because it bringeth to your bosoms only debasement and degradation.—Instead of it, adopt this resolution, as the principle to guide you in all those actions which conscience and God seem to require of you—'This will I do, not because those who see or hear of it, will admire and speak of me, but because my kind Parent, who consults in all his arrangements the felicity of his children, has placed a monitor within my breast to tell me of the propriety of it.' Yes, what conscience bids you do, that perform, solely because it is the will of your Father in heaven—because the voice of your best Friend calls you to it. You know how poor are the rewards ye have reaped from the former course—try now the course which your Father hath commissioned me to inculcate, and ye will inherit a richer, a purer, a more satisfying reward.

"Let me take an example or two in illustration of this principle of action. Look around you and observe. You can see numbers who, if they do anything bearing the semblance of a deed of charity, can not refrain from talking of it—from trumpeting it forth to the world in every possible way—that they may be applauded as men of great liberality. Ye yourselves know somewhat of the vanity of their recompense. How insignificant when compared with the consciousness of rectitude and the approbation of Heaven! This is the reward of him, who desires no notice from men of the deeds of charity which he performeth, and who would continue to do them though certain that men should never hear of them, yea, though they should bring him blame instead of praise.—Yes! he who will do kindnesses which the world can never know, solely because he loves his neighbor, and would do to him as it would please him to be done to by a neighbor, is the man whom God will reward, and that neither sparingly, nor in secret.

"Again, look around, and you may observe many who love to pray before men—who take pains to let the world know that they do pray. Such men may be admired, and under the cloak of piety which they endeavor to wrap around them, they may more securely practice injuriousness and unkindness—but this is all their reward. But if ye would secure to yourselves the benefits of prayer, ye will shun rather than court the multitude. In retirement and secresy the soul best holds communion with its God, and can there best present the sincere and fervent desires of the heart. I would not be understood to condemn prayer with your families, or with your brethren who love the house of prayer—but if the thought of them excludes the thought of Heaven, if theyinterrupt your intercourse with God, your prayers will be a vain oblation, and will bring down no blessings on your heads. From private prayer ye will chiefly reap the benefits of prayer. There will you draw closest to God, and thence will ye derive the greatest assistance in your upward progress, in your approximation to high and holy aims. This is the reward which your Father above bestoweth on sincere and fervent prayer.

"In regard to prayer, there is another error against which I would guard you. It arises from the principle I have been condemning—a desire to gain the applause of men. Many of your most public pietists use in their prayers a most extraordinary multiplicity of words. This vanity they have copied from the heathen nations, who know not the true God, and who think that their divinities will listen the more readily for their much speaking. But you ought to know better than think so of your Father. Ye pray not to change Him, but to change yourselves—to bind yourselves more closely to those high purposes to which your life and its pursuits should be devoted.—Therefore, let your words be few, and your desires be expressed in some comprehensive form like this:—

"Heavenly Parent, Father of the spirits of all flesh, we approach Thee, as children, with filial reverence; we most sincerely desire that every means by which we may become better acquainted with Thee, may be earnestly and reverently inquired into, and that the holy and benign influence of those excellencies, which may thus be discovered, may have the predominating sway in the bosoms of all thy children. May we, in obedience to and acquiescence in thy plan of Government, approach more and more near to those of thy children who are nearer unto perfection. Grateful for thy bountiful provisions for our wants, we would wish to avoid all anxious solicitude about the future, and to be well contented with a competent supply for the present. As fervently as we desire forgiveness from Thee, so readily may we be disposed to forgive any who have offended or injured us. Thy parental indulgence and long-suffering we would wish ever more and more to imitate. We desire not to dally with temptation, for that too often leads to our fall, but to furnish ourselves more and more with the whole armor of God, that we may be able to resist the power of evil. These things we desire, knowing that they are consistent with the objects of thy government, that Thou hast provided means for their accomplishment, and that the result will be a further manifestation of thy glorious perfections. Therefore, so may it be.

"Let me dwell for a moment on the forgiveness of offences. If ye cherish resentment towards your brethren, can ye look up to your Father and their's for indulgence towards your offences?—No! until ye practice charity and forgiveness towards your neighbor, ye can not know the blissful feeling of reconciliation with your Father in heaven.

"Again, you may observe around you those who hypocritically put on dismal airs, and make long faces, in order that they may be supposed to be mourning for sin and imperfection. If notice is taken of them that is all their reward. But if ye would secure the benefits of godly sorrow, seek not to let men know the state of your feelings.—Let not your dress or deportment differ from what they are at other times, nor let there be any outward semblance of grief or mortification. If ye are truly repentant—sorry with soul-felt sorrow—your Father above will bless you with a sense of forgiveness and peace. This is the reward that cometh from God—how infinitely superior and more satisfying than that which cometh from man!"

I think the above very nearly expresses the sentiments of our Heaven-sent Teacher. May these sentiments sink deep into our hearts, and there work a much needed reformation. May many who read, find themselves, henceforth, more regardless of the notice of man, and more observant to secure the approbation of conscience and of God! P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate

LETTER.

Sheridan, November 16, 1837.

To Rev. Zechariah Eddy:

Dear Sir—There are reports in circulation, some of them touching the interests of the denomination of Christians to which I have the honor of belonging, and they are considered by some to be false—others undoubtedly suppose them to be true. These reports are traced directly to yourself, and you are declared to be their author.

Now, as "certain strange things have come to our ears," and much inquiry is made respecting them, and they are universally ascribed to you as their author, it is perfectly right that the world should know whether they are true or false—"we would, therefore, know what these things mean." As a minister of the Gospel, I can not remain silent, and do my duty to God, nor justice to myself, the cause of truth, and the respectable Christians who have employed me to labor with them in doctrine, and dispense to them the word of life. To ascertain the truth is my object in writing you; and as you are represented as being the first inventor and circulator of these reports, you are the man to appeal to for evidence of their validity, which you can readily furnish if, as Paul did, you "speak the truth and lie not." These are my only apologies for thus publicly addressing you. If you are not the originator of these sayings, you can at once repel the charges alleged against you, by adducing evidence, clear and conclusive, which I will engage shall be published to the world. If, on the other hand, you are the true author of these reports, you must perceive that you can not maintain a character for veracity, if you withhold the evidence thus publicly called for, while there are so many who have no confidence in them, but believe they are false and slanderous stories, circulated from evil motives, to prejudice the people, and especially the young and unsuspecting, against a respectable and rapidly spreading denomination of Christians, who, in point of moral worth, Christian virtues, kindness and charity, would lose nothing by comparison with their Presbyterian neighbors. And you can not but discover, that the direct tendency of a belief in them, (the false reports,) would be to induce the opinion that Universalists do not believe in the divine authenticity of the Bible, and are unworthy the Christian name, etc. And you will also allow that it will not be a violation of Christian charity to publish this letter to the world, should you consider it unworthy a reply. It would be an act of justice to the denomination of Christians to which I belong, and which is "every where spoken against." This will be done, providing you do not deem it worthy your notice, with suitable and appropriate remarks, and there the subject will be left with an enlightened and discerning community, to judge between truth and error, and to decide whether it is probable that there are any in this vicinity who will have a "part in the lake," as unalterably described by the revelator, John, Rev. xxi: 8. I shall now proceed to introduce the reports alluded to, which I believe to be false; nevertheless, my mind is open to conviction, and I now call upon you, in behalf of the Universalists in this county, as a man and a Christian, to prove them true, or retract the false assertions, or show that you did not first circulate them, and consequently are not their true author.

1. I am credibly informed, that you stated in public, while holding a protracted meeting in Carroll, that you called in at the tavern in Sheridan, last August, at the time the "Universalist Association" met there, to hold its annual meeting, and there you "saw the leading Universalists drinking and carousing, cursing and swearing, praising the preachers, and telling what d——d good preaching they had"! Now, Sir, if you made this statement in your meeting, as the people in Carroll informed me you did, then it is your duty to inform the public, who these "leading Universalists" are, that they may be held up before community as the proper objects of just censure and exemplary correction. I know of no such Universalists, nor did we hear of any such conduct, until you made it known about forty miles from this place. On the contrary, it was allowed by our Methodist brethren, that they never saw people conduct with greater Christian propriety, than was manifested by the Universalists during their annual session in Sheridan. Should you fail to point out the "leading Universalists," according to this request, they, and the public in general, will continue to believe as the people did in Carroll, at the time you made the statements, that they were slanderous and false, designed to cast reproach on that denomination, and to enable you to produce a greater effect in proselyting in your meeting.

2. You stated in private and in public, while in Carroll, that "the Universalists were all infidels, disbelievers in divine Revelation." If you made this statement, Sir, you made it knowing it to be false; for you told me, last July, that you were "acquainted with their writings and opinions, principally," and although at that time, you undertook to inform me that they were infidels, I told you it was ungenerous to make such statements in public or private, for they were not true—that they were made either ignorantly or wilfully; and in either case, they were inexcusable who made them, since there were such a variety of means for ascertaining our views. I then informed you that more had been written against infidelity by authors belonging to our denomination, within the last four years, than had been produced by any other order in Christendom, in the same length of time—that three volumes had already appeared—that the fourth would soon be completed and sent forth to the public, and that you nor any other man, after knowing these things, could make the statement again that we were infidels, without branding himself with the name of deceiver and slanderer. Esquire Eacker heard these truths when presented to your mind—and yet, in view of all this knowledge, if I am rightly informed, you stated in Carroll, that we were "all infidels, and that you knew this to be a fact." I sincerely hope you will extricate yourself from this unenviable situation, in which you appear before the people in this vicinity, as a retailer of falsehood, and a deceiver!

3. On your return from Carroll, wonderfully elated with your success, you stated in your meeting, that "about thirty Universalists had been converted during the protracted meeting in Carroll," etc. I have been to Carroll since you were there, and find this statement also entirely untrue! Not a single individual belonging to that Society, or any other in the vicinity, has renounced the truth of Heaven—that "Christ is the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world"—for the unscriptural, unlovely, and peace-destroying doctrine of endless and immortal pain, the very thought of which, your benevolent Br. Saurin, a French divine, said, was a "mortal poison, and rendered life a cruel bitter."

4. You also stated in your meeting, that the "Universalists in Carroll became very much alarmed at the great work of the Lord that was going on, and fearing that their whole number would be converted," (and consequently have the delightful anticipation of feasting upon the pains, and tears, and groans of some of their fellow-beings throughout the countless ages of eternity!) "therefore they sent off after a preacher, fifty miles, to prevent them from becoming Christians." This, too, is an erroneous statement, in every sense of the word. Several of our preachers did call there during your meeting, but not one of them was sent for. One had regular appointments, if I mistake not, (Mr. Babcock,) and came there at that time to fulfil one of his appointments—and Dr. Adams, a clergyman whom they have since employed to labor with them, came into the place an entire stranger, without apprising our friends that he intended to make them a visit. What you made these two last statements for, in Sheridan, we shall know when you explain yourself. It is now generally believed, however, that you made them with a view to rouse your brethren, and prepare them for a protracted meeting in your Society, and to induce them to believe that you would have the same triumphant effect here, among the Universalists, that you had in Carroll. Oh, undoubtedly you will, Sir!

5. I was furthermore informed, that you challenged all the Universalists in the world, and defied them to come forward and meet you, and prove their doctrine true. You recollect, undoubtedly, Sir, that I proposed to investigate the subject with you, last Summer, at the house where we met—but you were in a great hurry. I then expressed a wish to investigate the subject publicly, if you were so disposed. I still hold myself in readiness (if you make it appear that you intend "to do justly" and walk uprightly, and speak the truth) for a public interview. And as you told me you did believe that Christ died to save all mankind, and that he came into the world for that object, I am ready to discuss the following question with you, at such time and place as shall hereafter be agreed upon, viz., "Do the Scriptures teach that God will introduce a course of providence and punishment into his moral government, that will prevent Christ from saving those for whom he died?"

An answer to this letter is respectfully solicited as early as possible, and all the light you can impart to set this subject right, will be duly appreciated. If I am in error, I am ready to receive the truth at your hands. With all due respect, etc.

T. C. Eaton.

Rev. Zechariah Eddy.

P. S. If you can not answer this letter now, and give all the necessary information called for, respecting the different inquiries, a letter addressed to me, to that effect, and forwarded to Esquire Eacker, between this and next Saturday evening, with the assurance when you will give a full reply, will be entirely satisfactory to me. If you should not comply with this last request, this letter will be forwarded immediately for publication.

T. C. E.

The foregoing letter was written to Mr. Eddy about six weeks since. He has not seen fit to answer it. The cause of truth demands its publication. It shows the despicable means this professed minister of Jesus will resort to, for want of argument to overthrow the truth of Heaven; and if he expects to be saved himself, and supposes God's pardoning love can blot out his transgression, and cleanse him "from all iniquity," he ought to know that it furnishes one of the strongest arguments in favor of that doctrine which Paul declared to be the truth of God—"who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." I have just received a letter from some of the most respectable citizens in Carroll, testifying that Mr. Eddy did report against the "leading Universalists" in Sheridan, even worse things than are alleged to have been stated by him, in my letter, and that he did repeatedly affirm that we are all infidels.

I may have occasion again to notice this man, and his unhallowed proceedings against Universalists, for this seems to be his great theme. For the present I leave him to his own reflections, and in the hands of an enlightened community, who will do him no injustice. Believing he will have no grounds for complaint, I publish this letter, as I informed him I would do, if he neglected to answer it. T. C. EATON.

Dunkirk, December 28, 1837.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

UNIVERSALISM IN MAINE.

BR. GROSH—What shall I say unto thee? I have promised, again and again, to write something for your paper, as a compensation for the copy you have very kindly sent me. I have looked at your columns, and asked myself what I should write? There is a long list of able correspondents, who write about almost every thing; so that I have no subject left for me to discuss, provided I could find time to devote to it, which is a doubtful case. Thus I have been laboring under two very serious difficulties: but now I have found time, and for my word's sake, I suppose I must write. But what shall I write about? this is the question, and a hard one it is to answer. Let us see—I will first tell Br. G. about our cause in this part of our Master's vineyard, and my situation; and then, perhaps, I may think of something to write for the paper, which he may do just what he pleases with.

You remember, Br. G., I left Vermont and came to this place in April, 1836. This village is situated twenty-eight miles from Augusta, due north, directly in the great bend of the Kennebec river. It is one of the most pleasant and beautiful villages in the State, and the town one of the best for farming, and in a state of high cultivation. This whole region is very fertile, and equal to any of your New-York lands for wheat; and, with all, easily tilled, as you may judge from the fact that many of our farmers have already ploughed and ready for sowing, from fifty to a hundred acres each—so that we have a prospect of raising our own bread another year, as we have done this. Such is the country by which I am surrounded, "away down East," so much despised by our western brethren, and which, by the way, is one of the best places to live, for the comfort of living, I have found yet, when we take into the account society and its institutions.

When I came here, there were not a few Universalists in this region, but there was little organization, and less preaching. I made my stand in this place, where they employed me a part of the time. I soon succeeded in organizing societies in the neighborhood, and found abundant employment, and have been generally well paid, at the rate of $500 per annum. There are now four new societies already organized where I have preached, and two others to be organized in a few weeks, together with an Association, confined to the limits of this county. There are but two ministers within its limits, Br. Russel, who was formerly a Free-Will Baptist, and myself. We hope, however, soon to see room made for another.

There is but one thing to prevent our having the greatest number of societies and preachers in this county, of any denomination, and that is, the want of a deeper sense of their duty and obligation to sustain the preached word in every town, to the extent of their ability, among our friends. Public mind is decidedly liberal, and there is not a town in the county, but affords more or less Universalists among the most prominent and influential citizens. If these would do all they are able, to support preaching in their respective towns, we might now have three or four additional preachers here, and thus, in a few years, a permanent footing might be secured in every town, for most of the people are willing to hear and judge with candor.

There is another favorable circumstance. As a general thing, the respectable portion of community is religiously inclined. We do not have to combat a spirit of general skepticism, in addition to religious errors, nor open and gross infidelity. An infidel is a rare animal among us, as I wish was the case throughout our whole country. The reason of this state of things, so different from your State and the West generally, as I apprehend, is to be found in the proceedings of the various religious sects among us. This community has never been afflicted with a tribe of reckless revivalists, or scourged by their impious ribaldry and unprincipled system of proselytism. True, we have had revivals, but they have been of a moderate and decent character, compared with those with which your State has been afflicted. There are a few local exceptions to this remark, and there skepticism and infidelity is making progress.

Thus, you see, this is a field which offers peculiar inducements for zealous and persevering exertions in behalf of our cause; for you know, Br. G., that a skeptical community is one of the worst fields for us to labor, although we are so often called infidels. Infidels, as all our experience proves, have no sympathy with our faith or labors. So may it ever be. But where infidelity has prevailed, our faith has had some signal triumphs over it, and delivered its victims from their worse than Egyptian darkness. I trust such may be the result in your section of country; though it will be found no business of a day. As I view it, our brethren have a fearful responsibility resting upon them, in reference to this subject. We have to stand the brunt of the battle with infidelity, and defend our holy religion from their assaults. We have little to hope from the aid of the believers in the doctrine of endless wo. Indeed, almost their whole influence is thrown into the scale of infidelity, not designedly, I am aware, but in effect. In their publications against us, in many instances, for the sake of an argument against our faith, they join the infidels in arraying the Bible against the very first principles of Natural Theology, which the wisest and best men in the Christian church, in past ages, have labored with zeal and success to prove consistent. Such examples are more frequent and gross in the publications of the American Tract Society, than any where else. A most gross instance of this, may be found in Tract No. 224, pages 45–6.

Br. Grosh—May we all, who are "set for the defence of the Gospel," ever bear our most decided testimony against infidelity and error, irreligion and vice, and so faithfully discharge our duties to our race. Yours, in the bonds of the Gospel,

DARIUS FORBES.

Norridgewock, Me., December 8, 1837.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PROPRIETY OF CONFIDENCE IN GOD.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

It is related of Alexander the Great, that he had a famous, but indigent philosopher, in his court. This adept in science was once reduced to the most straitened circumstances in pecuniary matters. He knew not to whom to apply for relief, but to his patron, the conqueror of the world.—His request was no sooner made than granted.—Alexander gave him a commission, to receive of his treasurer whatever he wanted. He immediately demanded in the name of his sovereign, ten thousand pounds. The treasurer, surprised at so large a demand, refused to comply; but waited upon the emperor, and represented to him the circumstances, adding, withal, how unreasonable he thought the petition, and how exorbitant the sum. Alexander heard him with patience; but as soon as he had ended his remonstrance, replied, "Let the money be paid"—adding, "I am delighted with this philosopher's way of thinking; he has done me a singular honor; by the largeness of the sum which he requests, he shows the exalted idea he has conceived both of my superior wealth, and my royal munificence."

Reader, here is a lesson of moral instruction, worth treasuring up. God is the infinite sovereign of all worlds; we are poor, needy, and dependent creatures; let us, therefore, never be afraid of looking to God in perfect confidence, for the unbounded favor of immortal life and glory.—Though the pretended treasurers of God's spiritual wealth and fulness, may turn us away, on account of the greatness and the presumed unreasonableness of the demand; yet, when appeal is made to Jehovah, it will be granted; and he will manifest his pleasure in perceiving that we have the fullest confidence in his greatness, goodness, fulness, and munificence. "Is his ear dull, that he can not hear; or his arm shortened, that he can not save?"—"Ask, and ye shall receive."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

KNOW THYSELF.

BY REV. J. G. M'ADAM.

"I say through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but to think soberly."—ROMANS XII: 3.

The doctrine of the above passage, presents itself so plainly to the apprehensions of men, that any attempt at explanation, would only cumber its simplicity and dim its brightness. It also strikes so even-handed at a very prevalent error, that any attempt to ward off the blow, would be equally useless.

To over-estimate ourselves is very natural, but it is, also, very foolish. No species of self-conceit can ever deceive others into the belief of our assumed superiority; and it is, certainly, an unprofitable business to deceive ourselves. Wealth never appears richer than when robed in simplicity—nor wisdom more beautiful than when crowned by modesty—nor virtue more divine than when it shines forth from the unpretending. If all the devotees at the shrines of wealth, wisdom, and virtue, were guarded by fair and correct views of themselves, "seeing themselves as others see them," what a vast step would be taken toward that happy state of perfection after which the world is sighing! But you think yourself wiser, and I think myself better than others can possibly believe—consequently, you allow much useful knowledge to pass along as something which you do not need; and when righteousness utters her mandates, I look for others to obey. Let us awake from these illusions, and think soberly—view ourselves in the glass of genuine reflection—and criticise our own faults as strictly as we would those of others—the benefit will be all our own.

Familiarity with our own minds, with the thoughts which play in our own hearts' fountains, will give us a knowledge of human nature, which can not be acquired from any other source. It is this knowledge which gives depth to reasoning, power to eloquence, and inspiration to poetry. The man who reads nothing in himself but beauty and perfection, reads not the lessons which God has written there; for thoughts of good and evil blend in every heart, and display themselves in the unfoldings of every character. Herein consists the wisdom of the wise—not that they are free from error—not that, by any course of life, they can gain exemption from the weaknesses of human nature—but feeling their weakness, knowing their liability to err, they seek for strength and support from higher influences, and throw around their faults a mantle of modest concealment, which not merely hides these faults from the common gaze of the world, but also tells those of deeper observation, that they, themselves, esteem them faults. While the less wise, from an overweening love of self, esteem their vices virtues, their weakness strength, and thus fall before those shafts of wit and sarcasm, which are ever issuing from the watch-towers of a jealous world. He who protects himself under the shield of self-knowledge, finds an invulnerable safeguard against the shafts of ridicule.

To know one's self, is the first lesson of all sound philosophy. To act upon that knowledge, is the first step to greatness. Look along the line of human exertion, and see who are advancing toward the goal of their ambition. Are they those who, insect like, stretch out their gilded wings to every ray of light? or those who, bee like, gather contributions from every balmy flower, to feed upon when winter comes? A child could answer our interrogation, for all well know that painted butterflies and self-conceited men, are in their efforts futile, as in their exhibitions vain—wasting in fleeting show, the same sunny hour in the warmth and light of which, the industrious bee and sober-minded man secure the honey of lasting good.

An over-estimate of self, affects our ability to judge correctly of other men, because it leads us to measure them by the standard of our attainments, to weigh them by the weight of our excellency—while, very often, those around us rise as far above our standard as the heavens are above the earth—often out-weigh all our conceptions of mental worth. Is blindness to these displays of character, to these bright exhibitions of mental power, to these rich developements of moral grandeur, no loss? And those only who have sober views of themselves, can reap the full benefit of these exhibitions—can appreciate the merit of others. Seeing, then, that a blind devotion to self, gives us a false view of ourselves—a false view of others—let no man think more highly of himself than he ought to think, and when, by one moment's reflection, we discover that our highest knowledge is ignorance—our greatest strength, weakness—let that reflection determine our course to be one of prudence, wisdom, and moderation—our conduct the result of meekness and humility.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Middlebury, O., December 11, 1837.

TO OUR BELOVED FRIENDS IN BAINBRIDGE, CHENANGO COUNTY, N. Y.

In accordance with the wishes of my family and my own feelings, and in compliance with your many requests, this is addressed to you. The fond recollection of our separation, is painfully pleasing; having spent nearly six years among you, during which time our intercourse was uniformly amicable, and we richly enjoyed each others' confidence and friendship. Your faithfulness and kindness to us and our good cause, is gratefully and cordially acknowledged, a remembrance of which we shall doubtless retain till we descend to the tomb. It is our prayer that you will not long remain without a God-like and faithful pastor. May God bless you with one. It is seldom that so able and well united a society as yours, remains long without the preached word.

When we left our "sweet home," endeared by many tender recollections and fond attachments, which had accumulated and strengthened with succeeding years, and parted with our numerous and warm-hearted friends, our thoughts lingered among the hills and valleys where so many esteemed ones reside, and in whose society we had enjoyed so much. O what a satisfaction it would have been, if we could have taken you with us! But we must be separated, perhaps through life. Let no pensive feeling weigh down our hearts, for we shall meet again in heaven, if not on earth. But we acknowledge, when we were wending our way over the hills, and receding from the pleasant valley where we had resided for nearly six years, and leaving behind a long cherished circle of true friends, that a pensive feeling crept over us, and our silent prayers ascended to heaven for your welfare, prosperity, and happiness. We proceeded to Canastota, where all but myself went on board a canal-boat, and in four days landed safely in Buffalo, to which place I travelled by land, with my horse and wagon, and arrived there in half an hour after my family did. A week after we left Bainbridge, we went on board the steamboat Commodore Perry. After being on Lake Erie twenty hours, and all of us suffering by lake sickness, we landed safely at Fairport, in Ohio, which is 163 miles west of Buffalo. Here I will not forget to mention, that Captain Wilkinson, commander of this boat, is a Universalist, and does not charge our ministering brethren for their passage.

By the blessing of God, our health has been spared, and we have enjoyed much in social intercourse with our kindred and friends, and have generally met with a more welcome reception than our fondest anticipations had pictured. Since having arrived in this State, I have been almost constantly travelling and preaching, while my family remained with our kindred in Bradville. We are now on our way to Springfield, Clark county, where we expect to remain through this Winter and the following Spring. In the place to which we are going, our friends are building a brick meeting-house. It is a large village, containing nearly 4,000 inhabitants—is a county seat, situated on the national road, 43 miles west of Columbus. A rail-road from Sandusky city to Cincinnati, passes through it. The village and country around, appears rich and flourishing, and the climate is mild and healthy. Soon after we arrive at Springfield, you may expect to hear from us again; when I intend to give an account of my tour through this State.

Yours, in the best of bonds,

GEO. MESSINGER, Jr.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

G. S.

Circumstances now render it necessary that I should adopt the above signature instead of S. the one over which I have heretofore written. G. SANDERSON.

THE CAUSE IN WESTERN NEW-YORK.

During my residence in this State, my observations have been chiefly confined to the western sections of it. The impressions of my mind remain unaltered, in regard to the condition of our cause in those parts. The hills and valleys abound with friends, and can furnish materials sufficient to array gigantic strength against the puny forces of those, who by their systematic co-operation, have done more against the truth, than its friends have done for it. There must be system and harmony in our operations, and in them we must be united, or we shall be always advancing at a sluggish pace. Why stand we idle, while our foes, the foes of humanity and truth are already in the field? Is it enough that we have loosed the bonds of the oppressor from ourselves, and feel no deep attachment; no soul-stirring emotions for others? In a cause as high and holy as that of ours, every man of us, should not only give precept, but should act, as if their souls were drinking the gladdening rays of the Gospel; it is culpable in the extreme for us, while debtors by the Gospel to all, that we decline paying; especially since we might thereby not only confer an imperishable blessing on others, but be ourselves "blessed in the deed." Something must be done, and that speedily, or the promising fertility of these gardens of the West, will be blasted by the tares of error. These must be plucked up, root and branch, and a way must be there, none other than "the way of holiness." I am heartily sick of these still-born resolutions. They have proven to be too ephemeral. We have spoken long enough, let us act. There is scarcely a town in all our western counties, but can support preaching a part or all of the time; and yet in some of these counties, there are only one or two preachers; while with half the ability, from twenty to fifty times that number, are sustained by other denominations. What if others do act from the fear of an incensed God, ought not the nobler motive of God's love, lead us to a nobler work? They condemn themselves, who expect to be justified by condemning the motives which govern the errorist. As it regards our ability at the West, it is no longer problematical. I have, from what I have seen, and to a considerable extent know, made up my mind on this subject. Pecuniary causes, not inability, are what hinder our progress, and that too in the very houses of its pretended friends. Is human happiness to be estimated in dollars and cents—are the pearls of the Gospel to be trodden under foot? When I enter the house of a friend, and hear him, while reveling in wealth, for the sake of a few dollars attempt to excuse himself for not doing his duty, I can not refrain from looking on his friendship as rather suspicious. I am sanguine in the opinion, that with proper exertion, a more favorable state of things can be brought about: but not until we have more systematic and effectual exertions, to keep alive the interest of the cause.

An object of the first importance is, to establish stated preaching in all the towns, where now they have it not. To do this we must have a much larger number of preachers, than we now have, which can not at present be got, and even if they could be obtained, who of them would venture so much, with so little hope of even a scanty subsistence? These difficulties are insuperable, and at once annihilate all expectations of succeeding in this way; but shall we let this important project rest here, and with faint hearts wait a more, and yet still more convenient season? I say no, if the work can not be done in one way, it can in another, and until a better course is suggested, I will propose one.

In all the towns that I have visited, I have met with one or more lay brethren, good and true, ornaments of the cause, and who I have no doubt can be procured, under the direction of a body organized for that purpose, to read one or two sermons, each, on alternate Sundays, and perform the other services extempore or otherwise. Next to the stated preaching, and pastoral services of a clergyman, this course suggests itself as the best. It would, almost with certainty, lay the foundation for societies, in all the places where this measure is adopted, and ultimately lead to the support of a clergyman.

To carry this, as well as other important objects into effect, I would suggest that a conference of the western and southern sections of this State be immediately called at some central point—that committees be appointed to wait on, or correspond with suitable lay brethren in each town, for the purpose first proposed—and also, that the conference supply the sermons to be delivered, and take the general charge of the work.

Let the conference be appointed, and our brethren both clergy and laity attend, with full purpose to act with energy, and not merely pass resolutions, and my word for it, they will find business enough to do, and such as will be done.

A better understanding, and more uniformity of action among our clergy, are very essential to the more successful advancement of our cause, and an important reason why this conference should be called. I will defer the further consideration of this matter for another number. In the meantime will our brethren, if they deem the measure above mentioned advisable, suggest some place and time for the conference? G. S.

D. D.

How supremely ridiculous, are the pretended honorary titles, conferred on those who profess to be the followers of one, who would not receive honor of men, for his "kingdom was not of this world"!

When did Jesus ever flatter the vanity of his followers, or stimulate them by the promise of empty titles calculated to make the distinction between them and others, that there was between the pharisee and publican?

How opposite to the spirit and dignity of Christianity, is every such instance, of attempting to distinguish a follower of Christ, by perishable honors. Who ever accepts them with satisfaction, must be mortified when death, that leveller of all distinction, shall bury in oblivion their baseless fame, and place them in the same grade with those who lived unhonored and died unwept. If there is to be any distinction among Christians, let it consist in degrees of goodness; then if there is ought to envy, it will be the graces that make another so much like his Master.

Pomp, parade and fashion, have already carried the work of mischief to an alarming extent, by beguiling the ignorant, and deluding the unthinking, whereby the religion of Christ is subverted, its spirit lost, its power blasted, and our temples of worship degraded to halls of fashion, and the scene of fawning, and sickening adulation. I sometimes so much doubt the soul of religion among us, as to believe that if the moslem's shrine was here, and attended by the train which makes religion popular among us; it would receive as much attention, as is now paid it by the turbaned Turk.

It is a wonder that John, Paul, Peter, Timothy and all their colleagues should have been denied the D. D. How would it sound? The apostle Paul, D. D.—St. John, D. D.—alone, all showed we think that if the servant is worthy of such distinction, the Master should be. Imagine the Saviour with D. D. attached to his name, how can we more insult him? For the honor of Christ, for the good of humanity, Heaven grant us a deliverance from all these things unlike the unostentatious character of him whom we profess to serve.

G. S.

HERALD CORRESPONDENTS.

We have several articles on hand from some of our best correspondents, we thank them for their remembrance of us. They may look for them soon in the columns of this paper. G. S.

HERALD SUBSCRIBERS.

We hope those who felt interested in our welfare while conducting the Herald, will not feel less so now. With us, it depends still on you, what the result of our labors will be; therefore do not discontinue if it is possible for you to do otherwise. G. S.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 26, 1838.

SETTLED PASTORS.

Have our brethren ever sufficiently reflected on the importance of having constant preaching, by a pastor settled in the society, and so supported that he can devote a great portion of the week to visiting among them? I think not. There are societies in the State, not situated near any society of kindred faith, who are abundantly able to secure preaching for the whole time, with all its attendant pleasures and benefits; who, nevertheless, are content with preaching merely every alternate Sunday, and leave the pastor employ that time which should be spent in pastoral and friendly intercourse, in travelling to a distance to preach the other half of his time. Thus are the labors and difficulties of the preacher much increased, and the advantages of the society abridged and lessened; while it may be doubted whether any other society is sufficiently benefited thereby to atone for the loss.

My opportunities for observation have been considerable—my experience on the subject, for the past seven years has been greater than is common to our preachers—and I am firmly convinced that but the least portions of the preacher's usefulness, depend on his labors in the desk. That society will prosper but little, which enjoys these public services only. I care not how great may be the preacher's talents, how virtuous his example how extended his reputation as a preacher, there are very few societies that will flourish for years under his preaching, if there is not united with it his social influence, and his active co-operation in the temporalities of the society, during the week. All the influence, respect and confidence he may win by his public labors, will be, like a hoard stowed away in the miser's chest—shut up from circulation and usefulness—bringing not even the interest it might acquire, if loaned to a poorer and less talented man. If so—and were not considerations of delicacy and even vanity in the way, I could substantiate my remarks with instances—societies receive but little benefit after their organization and establishment, from the mere public labors of a distant clergyman, who visits them at intervals of from two to four weeks, and remains with them only from Saturday night to Monday morning—and sometimes not even so long as that. It can not be that such a preacher can become so intimately acquainted with the great mass of the congregation as to feel with them in all their peculiar interests—to learn their wants, opinions, practices, etc., etc.—and thus be enabled to overcome in private the obstacles in the pathway of the cause, which it were improper, or at least delicate to attempt removing in the labors of the desk. Nor will the brief intercourse of an intermission on Sunday—or the infrequent and special visits of Saturday and Sunday evenings, enable him to attach the mass of the congregation—the young, the timid, the reserved and distant—to him, so that they may feel an interest in his services and confidence in the directions his greater experience may render necessary to their welfare.—This personal attachment, also—oh, how will it heighten the consolations of his sympathy, and presence, and instructions in seasons of sickness and trial, of sorrow and distress—and the pleasures of the social circle, the festive season, and the public rejoicing.

Now all these, and their attendant benefits, and influences on the union and prosperity of a society, are lost to those societies who can procure them, but will not.—It is my firm conviction that a society that is barely able to support preaching the whole time, will in two years be better able to continue the practice, than one that is able to do it, but merely employs a preacher half the time, will be able to continue employing for half the time, at the end of the two years. That is, a preacher engaged the whole time, and so supported as to be able to devote all his labors to the society, will be able to do more than twice as much good, as if laboring with two societies in such manner that he can only give them the benefits of his labors in the desk. True, this is merely a matter of opinion; but when we reflect on the vast influence of the social feelings in religious matters—when we know how sympathy and personal partiality mingle in our rational exercises—who is there that will not accord this much to the personal and social and religious influence of an upright, common sense Christian preacher, who is of social habits and pure life? It is my opinion, then, that the good of the cause demands that every society—or, where two or more societies are adjoining each other, every neighborhood of Universalists—that is able to do it, should employ a preacher to settle among them, to preach to them the whole time—and should so support him, that he may give all the attention and labor he can spare from his own family, to visiting the congregation—every family and member of it—and encourage them in their progress and improvement, social, intellectual, moral and religious. And our preachers should, I think, turn their attention more and more toward the production of such a state of things, and endeavor to become more generally social in their manners and habits—and aim to extend their influence to the production of increased peace and harmony, intelligence and good will among their congregations.

That there are objections to the employment of preachers all their time, by single societies, I am well aware, and shall therefore, in some future number consider the scarcity of Universalist preachers compared with the number of so-called societies, and inquire into the causes of the disparity. A. B. G.

Br. Waggoner was prevented from attending his late appointments at the North, by illness, which confined him to the house.

DECLINE OF UNIVERSALISM.

It is a most melancholy fact that there is a want of something in the organization or management of many of our societies—or in the motives or views of our friends who are members of them. Probably the deficiency alternates from one to the other of these, according to time or circumstance. But how mortifying to every lover of the Gospel, how disgraceful to the members of such societies, to have them spring up, increase, prosper, settle a preacher, perhaps build a goodly meeting-house, and then, without any sufficient cause, see them submit to a reverse of all this—no meetings, no preacher, a neglected, decaying meeting-house, Sabbaths neglected or desecrated, children running loose and growing up without religious instruction, that they may afterwards become the victims of fanaticism or skepticism, superstition or unbelief—and their parents unable to employ Sundays but in secular conversation, and stupid dosing around the fire, or strolling lazily about the house or farm! Oh, it is melancholy—most melancholy to think of—to see occasionally such a picture as this in our Zion; but such societies, such Universalists there are in various sections of our land; and to them, rather than to others, do the fingers of our opposers point in bitter and taunting scorn, as the effects, the consequent apathy and indifference to religion, induced by a belief in God's universal and changeless goodness.—"All are going to heaven at any rate; why, then, trouble ourselves in supporting meetings, attending at the altar of God, or bringing up our children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord?" Such is the language ascribed to us by our opposers, and however we may indignantly repel it, such is the language, the most powerful language of the act of these negligent, sleeping, cold, dead brethren and societies. They may deny it in words, but their lives confess its truth, and disgrace the holy and blessed cause, which, but for the paralyzing and evil influence of their examples, might win from error many and many a brother and sister, now groaning in the worse than fear of death, under the heavy yoke of superstition. Oh, my God, dwelleth the belief in thy goodness in such Universalist brethren and societies—dwelleth the love of thee and of the brethren in those who thus not only refuse to save their own children, but actually aid in rivetting the manacles of spiritual slavery on the already enslaved, and in preparing fetters for the souls of the rising generation? It can not be!

One excellent ministering brother out North, writes—"the dairy business has become a cruel task-master, that forbids his numerous, faithful and devoted servants the liberty even to step aside on Sunday, long enough to go to the house of worship. Little good can be effected by appointing meetings, when but very few attend them. Will our friends who have exchanged the privileges of religious association and public worship, for an overwhelming amount of care and business, look at this matter and see if they have counted costs correctly on both sides? Will an extra amount of wealth (even if they succeed in gaining it,) compensate them for the exalted joys and beneficial moral influences which swell the Christian's bosom, when uniting with an umerous brotherhood in prayer and praise to their universal Parent? What is the influence of their example—what the consequences of their absorption in business to their children? The next time a storm of fanaticism comes over their neighborhood, what have they done to prevent their families from falling a prey to religious error, insanity, and having their happiness blasted forever? And can gold or silver, houses and lands, soothe their compunctions whenever they see their children's countenances beclouded with deep and lasting melancholy—raving in the dread terrors of religious insanity—or blackened and stiffened in the distortions of a violent death—the consequences of their idolatry of wealth?"

Oh, I pray God, that our brethren may never realize by experience, what an evil choice they are making, in choosing between God and mammon—between the solo pursuit of the riches of this life, and that of the untold wealth of a proper attention to those desires within them which, only, properly constitute them man. It is well to provide things honestly before all men; but it is not well to do it by cheating ourselves, and families, and society, of that which is worth more than all this world's goods.

Another worthy ministering brother, of the West, says,—

"I have been travelling of late, through Genesee county, visiting societies destitute of the preached Word, endeavoring to 'wake up' the sleeping, and arouse the lukewarm to action. Among others, I visited those of Alexander and Byron. They are nearly dead—hardly a breath of life in them. It is too bad, Brother, to behold the great and glorious cause of God's impartial grace so neglected, and, to all appearances, so wholly uncared for and forgotten. 'Oh that my head were waters, and my eyes fountains of tears!' In both the above mentioned places, there are sanctuaries dedicated to the worship of a God of impartial and universal love, and the dedicated property not devoted to him! The members of these two societies are wealthy, and somewhat numerous, and are very active in business of a worldly nature, while the religion of Christ, seemingly, occupies scarce a single thought. There are exceptions, however, and honorable ones—'redeeming spirits,' as they might be called—who will stand by Universalism to the 'latest and last of their breath.' And I rejoice that this is the case.

"The cause is at a stand, or on the retrograde, in many other places in the county, and not only in this particular county, but also in many others. Now, something must be done, and that, too, soon. It will not do to sleep, when duty requires of us action. Energy and activity must characterize our movements. We have been so afraid of being termed fanatical by the infidel and the worldly-minded, that we have gone to the opposite extreme. These fears must be shaken off—we must be zealous—we must be active, unmindful of the world's scorn, or the world's contempt. We can be all these, without in the least degree bordering on fanaticism."

Now, what can be done for these cases of moral paralysis? Our preachers are a devoted self-sacrificing few—and they have gone on, making sacrifice after sacrifice, attending to the temporalities of the societies for the lay members, lighting the house and kindling the fires, themselves, for their meetings (this is a fact!!!)—until the members begin to think it the preacher's duty to sacrifice a few hundred dollars every year, and to do all the drudgery of the society, for the good of the cause! Preachers have done all they can do in this way, too long already. It is time they stop, and instruct the lay brethren, that they, too, have some duties to perform for the good of the cause. If societies die by it, let them go—the fault is in their members, not in the preacher who has otherwise performed his duty to them. But they will not die, but rather revive and live, if the preachers will faithfully do their duties throughout.—But, we ask again, what can be done in this lamentable state of things?—Something can—something should be done. Much as preachers have done, and much as laymen have left undone, there is still something which preachers may do, and should do, towards remedying the defects existing among us. The cultivation of a social spirit and free intercourse—of frequent interchange of opinion and consultations on plans for promoting the welfare of societies and the advancement of our cause—these things should more and more engage the attention and efforts of our ministering brethren. Let this be made a special subject of conversation whenever two or three are gathered together, at dedications, ordinations, conferences, and associations, and we think much good may be done thereby.

And our lay brethren, let them, also, be up and doing. Let each one feel that it is his business to do something, however trifling his leisure, means or influence. Is the society lifeless?—let him call, forthwith, on the Trustees, or prominent members, and have a meeting called and see if preaching can not be had, even only for one Sunday or one week day evening. When this is obtained, and a goodly number are thus assembled, see if something further can not be done. Let each one do all he can—if no preacher can be had immediately, raise the money, and engage one at the earliest future day, and in the meantime establish a reading meeting, and appoint the brethren to do the reading. Agree, also, to meet, each week or fortnight, in each others' houses, alternately, for social and religious conversation—provide means to purchase a few Universalist books to be circulated at these social meetings, among each other, in regular turn. Let these books be read aloud each evening, in the family circle, by the parents and elder children, while the rest sit around at their employments, listening, and occasionally commenting on what they hear, or turning to the Scriptures to see if what the writer declares, be supported by that good Book. Much more—various other plans might be offered, but I will stop, in hopes that some of our correspondents will take them up, soon. A. B. G.

EXPOSITOR AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW.

We have received the first number of this work, as issued under new auspices. It contains articles from the pens of the Editor, Br. Hosea Ballou, 2d; Brs. J. M. Austin, Hosea Ballou, W. Balfour, and S. Streeter. We have not read but one of its papers through—"The ultimate results of the Divine Government"—and with this article we are much gratified. An article from Br. Austin, on "the origin of sin," we should think, from a slight view of it, contained a doctrine different from our own opinion upon the subject; but the reputation and respectability of the author, demand a reading and consideration. The remaining articles are—Unbelief the reason why Christ wrought no more miracles; Usage of the word Church in the New Testament; the Parallelism of Hebrew Poetry; "The wicked shall be turned into hell," etc.; Nature of conversion. We have not space for a review of the work, were it necessary. The Editor, the writers, the need of such a periodical, the terms, the manner in which it is got up, should prove sufficient inducements for the patronage and united support of our friends.

Br. L. F. W. Andrews is editing a work, published at Macon, Geo., and entitled, "The Two Opinions, or Salvation and Damnation, being an inquiry into the truth of certain theological tenets." The first three numbers have come to hand, and from the works which he intends publishing, among which are, Smith on Divine Government, we think it will prove an interesting and valuable production.

Br. Gregory has assumed the Editorship of the Southern Evangelist, in the place of Br. T. Fisk.

The Boston Quarterly Review, is the title of a work recently issued, edited by Rev. O. A. Brownson. Those who would like to read the productions of a fine writer, and of a powerful, though we must say a speculative mind, would do well to subscribe. He will, we doubt not, fully obtain his money's worth. Indeed, the noble article on Democracy, in the last number, is worth two-thirds of the subscription price, which is three dollars per annum.

All the above works can be subscribed for at this office.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

Our head (not of the body, dear reader, but the title of the paper) is too long already to admit of an addition to it, but the former patrons of the Herald will find a department with the above title, which will be occupied by the valuable contributions of Br. Sanderson. The article on the state of our cause in Western New-York, will be found especially interesting, and worthy of attention and the co-operation of our friends. I had commenced a series on the same subject, (one of which appears in this number, and will be followed, probably, by a second,) but finding Br. S. so handy at the work, and his plan being so judicious and feasible, I give it all up to his hand. Let all our friends, wherever the plan is needed, unite in carrying it into execution. The cause demands it. A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

New Preacher.—I take great pleasure in stating that Br. A. R. Bartlett, of this city, who has been pursuing his studies for the ministry during his leisure hours, delivered his first discourse in Litchfield, on the 14th inst. It was a successful effort, and gave great satisfaction to the hearers. Br. Bartlett is some what known to our readers, by the few articles he has permitted us to publish in our columns, as a young man of talents; and to many of our brethren in this vicinity, as a brother of irreproachable moral character, and excellent disposition and judgment. When he shall devote himself wholly to the work, he will prove himself a good minister of Jesus Christ.

Ordination.—Br. John Allen was ordained pastor of the society in Watertown, Mass., on Christmas day.—Sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner, of Boston.

Installation.—Br. J. Harriman was installed pastor of the society of Lamprey River, N. H., on Christmas day. Sermon by Br. T. Whittemore.

Removals.—Br. P. Bronson, late of Wentworth, N. H., has removed for the benefit of his health, to Mulberry, Harris county, Georgia.—Br. J. G. Burt from Chelmsford, to Billerica, Mass.—Br. M. H. Smith, of Haverhill, has accepted an invitation to settle in Salem, Mass.

Dedication.—The New Universalist meeting house in Warren, Worcester county, Mass., December 20th. Sermon by Br. M. H. Smith, to whom we are indebted for a printed copy. Hundreds were obliged to go away, unable to obtain entrance. A. B. G.

NEW AGENTS.

Luke Baldwin, Ogdensburg—Joseph Baker, Sandy Creek—L. C. Chapin, P. M. North Eaton—Chester P Johnson, Fabius—E. Hungerford, Evans' Mills, N. Y.—Rev. C. S. Hussey, South Lyndeboro', N.H.—and A. Poucher, P. M. Columbia Lake, Mich.

Br. Bazin—Send the Expositor to Rev. Salmon Adams, Carroll, Chautauque county, and also to Rev. Judah Babcock, Hume, Allegany county, N. Y.

Br. Tompkins—Credit Mrs. D. Kinyan, Newark, Wayne county, N. Y., $2.00, and charge G. and H.

Br. Price—Please credit S. G. Rogers, Newark, $2. and charge G. and H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in February, by Br. Britton at Plesis, and at Theresa in the evening—Br. Sias at Perch River and at Pamelia Four Corners in the evening—Br. C. B. Brown in Onondaga South Hollow, (and once every four weeks thereafter until further notice)—Br. Guild at Worcester at 11 A. M.—Br. Goodrich at New-Ohio, and at Nineveh in the evening.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in February, by Br. Britton at Little York—Br. Wilcox at Brownville, and at Sackets Harbor in the evening, as friends may appoint.

Br. Britton will lecture on the evenings of February 5th, at Bentley's Corners—6th, at Oxbow—7th, at Antwerp, near Br. Fosters—8th, at Somerville.

Br. Wilcox will lecture on the evening of February 8th, at Harrisville—9th, at Carthage—10th, at Dexter—12th, at New Philadelphia.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

A W, Spring Arbor, (Mich) for self, A B and D P—T F, Brimfield, (Mass) for self and A J—Rev W H J, Belpre, (O) for H G and S R—J C H, Lebanon (O) for J B and W F—Rev G W M, Auburn, for self, W D and C B—B S K, Newport, for D P and S P—S G, Montrose, (Pa) for L B, L S, A H, H F, L K, U N, J D and W A—W R, Sandgate, (Vt)—Rev N H R, Mainsville, (Pa) for self and F G—E S, Sullivan, for self, J M, S R, I F, H G D, J B, V C, G W, S F, W A and O R S—Rev J F, Denmark—D P, Cohocton, for A M. S H and D C—L A V, Fowler, (O) for self, I L and F B—R T, Cassewaga, (Pa) for E B and P R—B S, Harmonsburg, (Pa) for self, J W and D M—P M, Canandaigua, for J G and A G—C V, Suffolk C H—P M, Cooperstown, for B B, L B, I P, J J P and L I B—P M, Canal, for D C L and J P—P M, Dresden, for D A and M S—P M, Oregon, for J W and J F B—A S, Hobart, for self and L C—S C, Pamelia Four Corners, for J H Z. C K, D F and E F B—D H P, Oppenheim, for self, A A P, W A B and J S W—A H, Chickopee Falls, (Mass)—T H, New-Haven East Mills, (Vt)—P M, Franklin Square, (O)—A S G, Salisbury, for self and J S—P M, Lebanon, for J P and E G—E H, Sandusky, for I E, W E, E E jr and J M D—H C, Tully, for self, A W L, R M and I W—P M, Cooperstown, for A F W and J K—L B, Canton, for M J and J H—D M, Canton, for F L and books—P M, Royalton—P M, Cabotville, (Mass) for B C—P M, Conway, (Ms) for A S—Rev J S F, Darien Centre, for D K and W W—P M, Farmingham, for self, W M and I B L—S P, Little Falls, for self and J G.

POETRY.

From the Trumpet.

THE CROWN OF LIFE.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

There's a crown for the monarch, a golden crown—
And many a ray from its wreath streams down,
Of an iris hue from a thousand gems,
That are woven in blossoms on jewelled stems;
They've rifled the depths of Golconda's mine,
And stolen the pearls from the ocean brine;
But the rarest gem, and the finest gold,
On a brow of care, lies heavy and cold.

There's a crown for the victor of lotus-flowers,
Braided with myrtle from tropical bowers;
And the golden hearts of the nymphæa gleam
From their snowy bills, with a mellow beam.
They have stripped the breast of the sacred Nile,
And ravished the bowers of the vine-clad isle;
But the sweetest flower from the holy flood,
And the vine will fade, on a brow of blood!

There's a crown for the poet, a wreath of bay—
A tribute of praise to his thrilling lay.
The amaranth twines with the laurel bough,
And seeks a repose on his pensive brow.
They've searched in the depths of Italia's groves,
To find out the chaplet a poet loves;
But a fadeless wreath, in vain they have sought—
It withers away on a brow of thought.

There's a crown for the Christian, a crown of life,
Gained in the issues of bloodless strife.
'Tis a halo of hope, of joy, and of love,
Brightened by sunbeams from fountains above.
They've gathered its rays from sources afar,
From seraphim's eyes, and Bethlehem's Star;
And the flow of its light will ever increase,
For a Christian's brow, is a brow of peace.

THE BROKEN-HEARTED.

The following beautiful article is not a new one, but is certainly worth re-reading and preserving.—It is, we understand, from the pen of G. D. Prentice.

E. H. C.

I have seen the infant sinking down, like a stricken flower, to the grave—the strong man fiercely breathing out his soul upon the field of battle, the miserable convict standing upon the scaffold, with a deep curse quivering on his lips, I have viewed death in all his forms of darkness and vengeance, with a fearless eye,—but I never could look on woman, young and lovely woman, fading away from the earth in beautiful and uncomplaining melancholy, without feeling the very fountains of life turned to tears and dust. Death is always terrible—but, when a form of angel beauty is passing off to the silent land of the sleepers, the heart feels, that something lovely in the universe is ceasing from existence, and broods, with a sense of utter desolation, over the lonely thoughts, that come up, like spectres from the grave, to haunt our midnight musings.

Two years ago, I took up my residence for a few weeks, in a country village in the eastern part of New England. Soon after my arrival, I became acquainted with a lovely girl, apparently about seventeen years of age. She had lost the idol of her pure heart's purest love, and the shadows of deep and holy memories were resting like the wing of death upon her brow: I first met her in the presence of the mirthful. She was indeed a creature to be worshipped—her brow was garlanded with the young year's sweetest flowers—her yellow locks were hanging beautifully and low upon her bosom—and she moved through the crowd with such a floating and unearthly grace, that the bewildered gazer almost looked to see her fade away into the air, like the creation of some pleasant dream. She seemed cheerful and even gay, yet I saw, that her gaiety was but the mockery of her feelings. She smiled, but there was something in her smile, which told, that its mournful beauty was but the bright reflection of a tear—and her eye-lids, at times, closed heavily down, as if struggling to repress the tide of agony, that was bursting up from her heart's secret urn. She looked as if she could have left the scene of festivity, and gone out beneath the quiet stars, and laid her forehead down upon the fresh green earth, and poured out her stricken soul, gush after gush, till it mingled with the eternal fountain of life and purity.

Days and weeks passed on, and that sweet girl gave me her confidence, and I became to her as a brother.—She was wasting away by disease. The smile upon her lip was fainter, the purple veins upon her cheek grew visible, and the cadences of her voice became daily more weak and tremulous. On a quiet evening in the depth of June, I wandered out with her a little distance in the open air. It was then, that she first told me the tale of her passion, and of the blight that had come down like mildew upon her life. Love had been a portion of her existence. Its tendrils had been twined around her heart in its earliest years, and, when they were rent away, they left a wound which flowed till all the springs of her soul were blood. "I am passing away," said she, "and it should be so. The winds have gone over my life, and the bright buds of hope and the sweet blossoms of passion are scattered down, and lie withering in the dust, or rotting away upon the chill waters of memory. And yet I can not go down among the tombs without a tear. It is hard to take leave of the friends who love me—it is very hard to bid farewell to these dear scenes, with which I have held communion from childhood, and which, from day to day, have caught the color of my life and sympathized with its joys and sorrows.

"That little grove where I have so often strayed with my buried Love, and where, at times, and even now, the sweet tones of his voice seem to come stealing around me till the whole air becomes one intense and mournful melody—that pensive star, which we used to watch in its early rising, and on which my fancy can still picture his form looking down upon me and beckoning me to his own bright home—every flower, and tree, and rivulet, on which the memory of our early love has set its undying seal, have become dear to me, and I can not, without a sigh, close my eyes upon them forever."

I have lately heard, that the beautiful girl of whom I have spoken, is dead. The close of her life was calm as the falling of a quiet stream—gentle as the sinking of the breeze, that lingers for a time around a bed of withered roses, and then dies, "as 'twere, from very sweetness."

It can not be that earth is man's only abiding place.—It can not be that our life is a bubble, cast up by the ocean of eternity to float a moment upon its waves and sink into darkness and nothingness. Else why is it that the high and glorious aspirations, which leap like angels from the temple of our hearts, are forever wandering abroad unsatisfied? Why is it, that the rainbow and the cloud come over us with a beauty that is not of earth, and then pass off and leave us to muse upon their faded loveliness? Why is it, that the stars, which "hold their festivals around the midnight throne," are set above the grasp of our limited faculties—forever mocking us with their unapproachable glory? And finally, why is it that bright forms of human beauty are presented to our view and then taken from us—leaving the thousand streams of our affections to flow back in an Alpine torrent upon our hearts? We are born for a higher destiny than that of earth. There is a realm where the rainbow never fades—where the stars will be spread out before us like the islands that slumber on the ocean—and where the beautiful beings, which here pass before us like visions, will stay in our presence forever. Bright creature of my dreams, in that realm I shall see thee again! Even now thy lost image is sometimes with me. In the mysterious silence of midnight, when the streams are glowing in the light of the many stars, that image comes floating upon the beam that lingers around my pillow, and stands before me in its pale, dim loveliness, till its own quiet spirit sinks like a spell from heaven upon my thoughts, and the grief of years is turned to dreams of blessedness and peace.

MARRIAGES.

In Kirkland, on the 10th inst., by Rev. D. Biddlecom, Mr. GEORGE IVES, of Vernon, to Miss MARY CARPENTER, of the former place.

In Bristol, January 4th, by Rev. W. Queal, Mr. CONSTANT SIMMONS, to Miss BETSEY FRANCIS, all of Bristol.

In the village of Victor, December 20th, by Rev. A. C. Barray, Mr. SOLOMON FISH, of Victor, to Miss LAVINIA JANE GERRY, of Clarence.

In Walton, Sunday, December 31st, by Rev. E. E. Guild, Mr. ELIJAH P. DICKS, to Miss LOUISA BUTLER, all of Walton.

In same place, January 1st, by Rev. Mr. Beach, Rev. EVERIT EMMET GUILD, to Miss SUSAN PARDEE DARROW, all of Walton.

DEATHS.

DEATH OF MRS. PHEBE CHASE, CONSORT OF REV. J. CHASE.—In West Bloomfield, on Friday the 12th inst., Mrs. PHEBE ANN CHASE, consort of Rev. Jacob Chase, in the 32d year of her age, after a very distressing illness of about two weeks. While she retained her mental faculties, she was aware that her dissolution was certain, she was perfectly reconciled to it. By this dispensation of divine Providence, our respected brother, and his three motherless children, are very sensibly and grievously afflicted. Mrs. Chase was an affectionate wife, a tender parent, a warm hearted friend, and a useful member of society. Respected in life, her memory will be long and fondly cherished by her relatives and friends. Peace be to her ashes. With her, the feverish dream of life is over, and the bitterness of death is past. She has returned to that Being, whose mercies are over all, and whose goodness will bless all mankind. On Sunday following her decease, an unusually large congregation assembled in the Universalist church in North Bloomfield, where her funeral solemnities were performed by the writer, and her mortal remains consigned to the tomb. May the God of grace sanctify this affliction to the good of all concerned.

WILLIAM QUEAL.

In this city, on the 14th inst., ELIZABETH HALLOCK, wife of Nicholas Hallock, in the 53d year of her age.—In her death, her companion has lost all a man can lose in a wife, and her children, all that can be lost in a mother. Throughout her long and useful life, truth and reason were the light by which her footsteps were guided, and her end corresponded therewith. To her, death had no terrors, futurity no dread. She frequently said that the past and the future looked alike peaceful and calm. To her husband she has been a cheerful and intelligent companion, to her children a judicious and tender mother. She met the vicissitudes of life with a smile, and death without a groan—in the midst of her family, without a doubt, without a fear or a pang, she calmly and quietly passed away! Thus lived, thus died this excellent woman; and though her body must now return to the elements from which it originated, her virtues and her worth are enshrined in the memory of her surviving relatives and friends.—Com.

[As one highly esteeming the deceased, (who was a member of the society of Friends,) I would add my feeble tribute of respect to her memory. She was eminently mild and amiable in her deportment, and cheerful and intelligent in conversation. She appeared to exhibit in active exercise the meekness and charity of the Christian, so that "None knew her, but to love her;

Or named her, but to praise."

A. B. G.]

In Fleming, Cayuga county, January 3d, of inflammation of the lungs, Mrs. S. T. MADDER, aged 39 years. The deceased was a firm believer in the Restitution, and she experienced its consolations in her last hours. Beloved as a neighbor—affectionate as a wife and mother, and consistent as a Universalist, she fell asleep and has gone home to God and the Saviour. May the consolations of truth be experienced by her afflicted husband and relatives.

G. W. M.

Will the Trumpet please copy?

In Henderson, December 15th, Miss LUCY HUNGERFORD, in the 21st year of her age. She was amiable, and respected by all who knew her. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to her mourning relatives and sympathising neighbors, on the following Sunday by Br. Sias.

In Bristol, November 30th, Mr. BENJAMIN B. GREGG, aged 25 years.

He was cut down by the unsparing destroyer, in the midst of youth and usefulness. He possessed a very amiable character, and a warm attachment for his friends. He died as he had lived, a believer in the final emancipation of all intelligent beings from sin and all its consequences. His zeal was exhibited in a manly and dignified perseverance, in the maintenance and defence of the sentiments he avowed and cherished. With firmness he asserted his belief in the final consummation of all things.

He has left a widowed mother, three sisters, a brother, and many other kind and affectionate hearts to lament his death. We commend them all to the great Parent of love; in his mercy may they find those rivers of consolation which shall be equal to their day of trouble.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH,
Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1838. NUMBER 5.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER I.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

FEMALE INFLUENCE.

From the intimate connection that exists between the two sexes, and from the rank which females occupy in Christian countries, it is evident that their influence in this age, is both extensive and powerful. In ancient days, the influence of woman, though comparatively small when contrasted with its present sway, was not unknown. Anacreon, the lyric poet of Ionia, thus sang:—

"Nature imparts her gifts to all;
And every creature, large or small,
That frolics in the sea or strand,
Receives some favors at her hand.
* * * * * *
To man, more bountifully kind,
She gave the nobler powers of mind;
And woman, too, was not forgot;
Both grace and beauty are her lot,
Whose potent influence will prevail
When wisdom, wit and weapons fail."

The influence of woman commences with man's existence, and throughout his whole career, however diversified, he is never dissolved from it—commencing at the cradle, it terminates only at the grave. The domestic circle is its fountain head, from whence its streams flow throughout all the various ramifications of society. Domestic life is woman's proper sphere. There her peculiar qualities and powers are developed—there she commences the exercise of that sway, which, for good or evil, is sensibly felt in the world at large—there she begins those lessons which will affect those to whom they are addressed, either beneficially or injuriously, while earthly life shall endure—there she first puts into operation, that invisible, yet enduring power, by which she sways to an immense extent, the fate of our race—there she commences twining around the hearts of the sterner sex, those minute and lasting cords, which hold them, in a great degree, to an assimilation to her own character. The domestic circle is the home of woman, where she the most fully evinces her useful and valuable qualifications, and appears the most lovely and enchanting. "A family is society in miniature—home is its location—woman its presiding spirit—and whatever destroys its primary features, must disturb the tranquillity of its joys, introduce evil into its atmosphere of good, inflict the worst of miseries, not only on her, but on all its members, and affect the whole community of which it forms a part."*

Who has not experienced the influence of woman? Who has not been charmed by the vivacity of her intellect—enraptured by the sparkling of her genius, and filled with admiration by the modesty of deportment and simplicity of manners, which so pre-eminently distinguish her from the other sex? And whose heart has not been won to respect and love her, for the kindness, the tenderness and benevolence which her conduct is ever manifesting? Ledyard, the well known modern traveller, thus bears testimony to that kindness of disposition from which so much of her influence is derived—"I have always remarked that women, in all countries, are civil, obliging, tender and humane; and that they do not hesitate like man, to perform a generous action. Not haughty, not arrogant, not supercilious; they are full of courtesy, and are in general more virtuous than man, and perform more good actions than he. To a woman, whether civilized or savage, I never addressed myself in the language of decency and friendship, without receiving a decent and friendly answer. In wandering over the barren plains of inhospitable Denmark, through honest Sweden, and frozen Lapland, rude and churlish Finland, unprincipled Russia, and the wide spread regions of the wandering Tartar; if hungry, dry, cold, wet or sick, the women have ever been friendly to me, and uniformly so; and to add to this virtue, so worthy the appellation of benevolence, these actions have been performed in so free and so kind a manner, that if I was dry, I drank the sweetest draught, and if hungry, I ate the coarsest morsel, with a double relish."

The influence of woman is experienced by the other sex, in every stage of existence. How powerful is the influence which the wife can exercise over the husband, when she judiciously employs her abilities! She can mould him into almost any character—she can influence him to noble and patriotic deeds; to a virtuous, honorable and upright course in life; to a benevolent, kind and peaceable disposition—or, if the evil inclination sways her, she can debase and degrade his mind; destroy all honorable ambition, all aspiring after usefulness and respectability; dispirit and break down his mind, and plunge him into disreputable and sinful habits. When such is the power of woman's influence over her companion, wisdom dictates that it should be exercised with great care and prudence. The female who would have her husband rise in society, and become useful and respected, should reflect, that to attain this end much depends upon her own conduct. If she is careless of his interests, negligent of his affairs, and unconcerned in his plans and prospects, she is a dead weight—yea, her influence will be of a character to paralyze his exertions, to discourage him in every useful effort, and to keep him down to his present level, or sink him still lower. But if she exhibits an interest in his condition—if she cheers and encourages him in his losses and in his moments of depression, instead of railing at him—if she endeavors to soothe and allay his feelings when irritated, instead of exciting them to a flame of anger—then the influence of her conduct will be of a highly beneficial character, and her labors will not be unrewarded.

The influence that sisters are capable of exercising over brothers, is by no means inconsiderable. Brought up in each other's company, from infancy—mingling in a great degree in the same scenes, the same amusements—there is usually an intimacy between sisters and brothers in youthful life, much exceeding that between parents and children. The influence which the sister thus acquires, she can wield, by a judicious course, to great advantage. Often the young man, while turning a deaf ear to the counsel of parents, will readily listen to the advice of an affectionate sister. Being nearer his age, minglng with him in the same circle, and partaking to a considerable extent of the same recreations, she is enabled more fully to enter into his feelings and appreciate the peculiarities of his situation, than the parent, and is, therefore, better prepared, in many cases, to impart counsel and admonition that will have a salutary and virtuous tendency. She can watch a brother's failings, and by circumspection can so bring her influence to bear, as to counteract, to a very important extent, the baleful temptations to which he is exposed.

Sisters can also exercise a salutary influence over brothers younger in years. They mingle much with them, and are often entrusted with an oversight of them in the absence of parents, when children throw off restraint and exhibit more clearly their true dispositions. In these cases sisters should realize that there is no small degree of responsibility resting upon them. They should notice the development of the tender minds of their brothers—should check every improper expression, and every evil passion and propensity, and exercise all their influence to give their pliant minds and dispositions a virtuous and benevolent cast. In this way, young ladies can greatly assist their parents in training their brothers to usefulness and respectability.

I can not forbear adding here, a few suggestions relative to the influence of sisters over brothers, extracted from a late popular work, by an eminent female author, entitled the Young Ladies' Friend. "The important relation which sisters bear to brothers, can not be fully appreciated, without a greater knowledge of the world and its temptations to young men, than girls in their teens, can be supposed to possess. I assure you, that your companionship and influence may be powerful agents in preserving your brothers from dissipation, in saving them from dangerous intimacies, and maintaining in their minds, a high standard of female excellence. If your brothers are younger than you, encourage them to be perfectly confidential with you; win their friendship by your sympathy in all their concerns, and let them see that their interests and their pleasures are liberally provided for in the family arrangement. Never disclose their little secrets, however unimportant they may seem to you; never pain them by an ill-timed joke; never repress their feelings by ridicule; but be their tenderest friend, and then you may become their ablest adviser. If they go into company with you, see that they are introduced to the most desirable acquaintances, and show them that you are interested in their acquitting themselves well. If you are so happy as to have elder brothers, you should be equally assidious in cultivating their friendship, though the advances must of course be differently made. Young men often feel the want of a confidential friend of the softer sex, to sympathise with them in their little affairs of sentiment, and happy are those who find one in a sister. Once possessed of an elder brother's confidence, spare no pains to preserve it. Convince him by the little sacrifices of personal convenience and pleasure which you are willing to make for him, that when you do oppose his wishes, it is on principle and for conscience' sake; then will you be a blessing to him, and even when differing from you, he will love and respect you the more for your adherence to a high standard. So many temptations beset young men of which young women know nothing, that it is of the utmost importance that your brothers' evenings should be happily passed at home, that their friends should be your friends, that their engagements should be the same as yours, and that various innocent amusements should be provided for them in the family circle. Music is an accomplishment chiefly valuable as a home enjoyment, as rallying round the piano, the various members of a family, and harmonizing their hearts as well as voices, particularly in devotional strains. I know of no more agreeable and interesting spectacle, than that of brothers and sisters playing and singing together, those elevated compositions in music and poetry, which gratify the taste and purify the heart, while the parents sit delighted by. Brothers and sisters may greatly aid each other in judging of their friends of the opposite sex.

* Ladies' Magazine.

Brothers can throw important light upon the character and merits of young men, because they see them when acting out their natures before their comrades and relieved from the restraints of the drawing room. And you can in return, greatly assist your brothers in coming to wise and just conclusions concerning their female friends.—Your brothers may be very much indebted to the quicker penetration of women into each other's characters, and saved by your discernment, from being fascinated by qualities that are not of sterling value. I have been told by men who had passed unharmed through the temptations of youth, that they owed their escape from many dangers, to the intimate companionship of affectionate and pure minded sisters. They have been saved from a hazardous meeting with idle company, by some home engagement, of which their sisters were the charm; they have refrained from mixing with the impure, because they would not bring home thoughts and feelings which they could not share with their trusting and loving friends. They have put aside the wine cup, and abstained from strong potations, because they would not profane with their fumes, the holy kiss with which they were accustomed to bid their sisters good night."

That mothers can exercise a valuable influence over children, is beyond controversy. Who first instructs the infant to lisp the language of its fathers?—the mother. Who first gives form and consistency to ideas floating vaguely in its unskilled mind?—the mother. Who first furnishes it themes for thought and conversation?—the mother. Who gives the first bias and direction to its tender mind, both in moral and intellectual respects?—the mother. How potent, then, is the influence of mothers over children! The susceptible mind of the child, is to the mother, "as clay in the hands of the potter." She can mould and fashion it at will—she can sow the seeds of virtue, and morality, and correct religious views, both by precept and example, or she can allow her offspring to grow up under the sway of ignorance, and error, and evil passions. In most cases, the mother is instrumental in laying the foundation of those prominent characteristics, whether good or bad, that distinguish her children through life. To a mother was our beloved Washington chiefly indebted for those principles of honor and integrity, of virtue, patriotism and religion, which so pre-eminently distinguished him in his trying career. From a mother Napoleon obtained that energy of character, that perseverance, industry and self-possession, to which he was mainly indebted for his unparallelled success. It is important, therefore, that mothers, and those destined to become mothers, should be aware of the influence which they sway over their children, and should be prepared to wield it in an advantageous manner. Let them with care, scatter the seeds of patriotism, morality and religion, early, in the rich mental soil of their offspring, and, unless counteracted by influences of an extremely deleterious character, they will, in after life, yield an abundant harvest of usefulness and respectability.

Although the influence of woman is chiefly exercised in domestic life, yet it is not confined to that circle; but, to a certain extent, it bears directly upon community at large. On all public occasions, where the presence of females is proper, they exercise a controling influence upon the character of the proceedings. In civilized life, deference is ever paid to the feelings and taste of woman. In every assembly, whether the social circle, the ball-room, the theatre, or any public convocation where they are present, if females would exercise their undisputed prerogative, and unitedly frown upon every thing of an immoral and dissolute character, their modesty would soon cease to be offended, and public morals, in these respects, would be improved. But if respectable ladies will give their countenance to exhibitions of an improper character—if they will smile approvingly, at attitudes, or gestures, or words, that should call up the crimson blush of shame—they must expect that such occurrences will continue to be exhibited before them. They have the remedy for this evil in their own hands, and if they fail to exercise it, they must continue to experience its deleterious influences.

Young ladies can also exercise a sensible influence upon the character of the young men with whom they associate. They have the power of causing the conduct of their male associates to be such as they desire. Let them refuse to associate or have any intercourse with young men who are addicted to evil habits—let them give a firm and indignant reproof to, or withdraw immediately from the presence of, those young men who exhibit any thing immoral or improper, either in word or deed—and many evils which now exist, would be abated. Young men will almost invariably cause their conduct to correspond with the tastes of the females in whose company they desire to mingle. And in the great majority of cases, they will abandon any evil practice, rather than lose the approving smiles of those ladies whom they esteem. Let young women remember this truth, and exercise the powerful influence they possess, in a prudent manner, and effects highly beneficial to themselves, and to community, will ensue.

The influence exercised by females over husbands, brothers, and those with whom they are intimate, is exceedingly varied in degree. While some possess this influence to an extraordinary extent, others appear wholly destitute of it. The amount of influence depends entirely upon the conduct observed towards those over whom it is desirable to exercise it. Woman can not command man to conform to her tastes and views—she must win him into conformity. Man often accomplishes his purposes by power, and violence, and contention. But this is not woman's province—these are not her weapons. She has but one general course of procedure to obtain an influence over those with whom she is connected, or in whose welfare she is interested—and that is, by persuasion, by kindness, by gentleness and affection, by the continued exhibition of a sweet temper, and of a loving and forgiving spirit. These, and these only, are the means by which she can gain influence over the sterner sex. It is contrary to human nature for man to be coerced or driven into any measure by woman, and she who undertakes this course, is ignorant of her powers, ignorant of her proper sphere of action, and blind to her own happiness!

I am pained to declare, (yet the experience of all will bear witness to its truth,) that the wretchedness which many females experience, is too frequently caused, or at least augmented and perpetuated, by their own misjudged conduct. Suppose you have reason to believe the affections of the husband, or of the young man with whom you had hoped to be connected for life, are becoming cool toward you, and turning to some other person, what course should you pursue to regain his love? Should you reproach and deride him, and treat him with bitter scorn and anger? No—this conduct would be calculated directly to defeat the end you would accomplish—it would cause you to appear more disagreeable to him than ever, and make a still wider breach in his affections. The true policy for woman to pursue in this case, is to assume all the lovely attractions of her nature—to be forgiving, kind, affectionate, and as pleasant and agreeable as possible. This is the only course she can possibly adopt, with the least prospect of winning him back to his first love! Suppose the husband absents himself from home, and spends his leisure hours at the haunts of intemperance and vice, how shall the wife secure his company by his own fire-side, and save him from ruin? By meeting him, on every return, with a storm of clamor, and fury, and violence?—by making his ears "tingle" with a flood of harsh invective and reproach?—by causing herself, the family, and the dwelling, to appear as disagreeable and repulsive to him as possible? No—woman, remember—no! This conduct will not, can not, amend him—it will cause him to dislike and dread home above all other places—it will influence him to absent himself as frequently and as long as possible, and rivet the chains of vicious habits upon him! There is a better, a more safe and successful method for you to pursue. You need not approbate his vices, but whenever you allude to them—which you may frequently—do it in a kind tone of voice, and in an affectionate and beseeching manner. And when he enters his dwelling, meet him with a smile of love, instead of a frown of hatred—be gentle, sweet, even-tempered, in all your words and actions—let your dwelling be "swept and garnished," and made as cheerful and pleasant as possible—arrange all things to suit his convenience and taste. The moment you have made home more agreeable and satisfactory to him than the places of his resort, that moment you have achieved the victory. We are always desirous to tarry the longest where we enjoy ourselves the best. If the wife studies to make the domestic fire-side pleasant and delightful to her companion, the case is rare that she will have just cause to complain of his absence. By pursuing this prudent and judicious course, on the appearance of the first symptoms of an inclination in the husband to tarry needlessly from home, and, indeed, when no such inclination exists at all—the wife can not only secure her own peace and enjoyment, but can save the husband from threatened degradation and ruin.*

Such being a general view of the influence possessed by woman in her different stations in society, young ladies will perceive the importance of qualifying themselves to sway it, in a manner beneficial to themselves and their race. The saying, that "woman rules the world," can hardly be an exaggeration. Her power is immense; and when properly directed, can be the cause of an incalculable amount of good. But woman should remember that she can rule only by pleasing—and she can never please by stepping out of her proper sphere and arbitrarily demanding to rule. It is necessary that young ladies should reflect much upon the peculiarities of the condition they will be likely to occupy in community; that by a full understanding of the necessary requisites, they may be prepared for a faithful and useful discharge of all the duties that may devolve upon them.

*The remarks in this chapter, applicable to married ladies, are naturally involved in the subject of female influence, and are addressed to young women, from the supposition that the most of those who peruse these lines, will, in due time, enter the marriage state.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1838.

MATTHEW VII: 21-29.

After making a few remarks on these verses, we will introduce a very earnest appeal to his family, founded upon this passage, which we find among the papers of our deceased and worthy friend.

Verse 21. Several expositors of this verse remark, in effect, that the kingdom of heaven must here signify that of glory, above; for the calling of Christ our Master is the very circumstance which constitutes us the subjects of his earthly kingdom, or members of his visible church. This inference, however, is grounded upon a non sequitur inasmuch as it takes for granted that the phrase kingdom of heaven has only two significations. A third, and, perhaps, the most important of all the meanings of these words, must not be overlooked, as it is by some commentators. It is this; the predominating influence of those affections which spring from a love and confiding trust in God, and of a supreme dedication of our lives to the doing of that which is right, and to the love and practice of mercy. When these have the dominion over our propensities, and give character to our actions, then is the kingdom of heaven set up within us.—This seems the sense intended by these words here.

The mere acknowledgment of Jesus as a wiser or even a heaven-sent Teacher—the mere profession of admiration of his precepts or of being his disciples—will never establish in the heart the holy and sanctifying influence which we have just named. The admonitions of this Teacher must be practiced, not merely admired.

Verses 22, 23. In order to establish a belief in the divine mission of Jesus, it was necessary to communicate the power of working miracles upon many who were not really his practical disciples. Along with these extraordinary powers, there was not necessarily bestowed the presiding influence of heavenly wisdom. This has to be wrought by each individual for himself. It is a work, not a gift. These remarks will explain these two verses.

Verses 24–27. To understand these verses, it is necessary to recollect that Judea, like other eastern countries, was liable to tremendous storms of rain, which, in that hilly country, would form torrents down the hills and along the vales.—Probably there were in sight, ruins of houses, which by these sudden inundations had been undermined and desolated, and probably, also, some buildings which had withstood unhurt, the storms and mountain torrents of many years. Our Master so frequently made use of similar methods in the illustration and inculcation of his discourses, and it is so likely that such objects were in sight, that we are induced to adopt this supposition. It should be remembered also, that many of the houses were almost entirely composed of mud. On these accounts, a wise choice of a site for building was necessary to prevent demolition by storms.

As it required more labor and pains to put up a building which should be proof against storms of wind and rain, than merely to patch up some brick and mud, so it requires more labor to yield obedience to the precepts of Jesus than merely to admire them. To trust to the latter for happiness, were folly equal to trusting to the houses of the sluggish and unwise builder for security.

We now introduce the address to his children which Mr. S———, seems to have founded upon this passage.

In Pollock's beautiful poem, "The course of Time," you may recollect that he introduces it as the bitterest element of the misery of the damned, that their eyes every where met in characters of flame, and their ears were ever and anon assailed with this brief, but heart-rending sentence.

"Ye knew your duty, and ye did it not."

Whatever may be the sources of misery in a future state of existence, we have all felt enough to convince us, that in this the consciousness of transgression, or of shrinking from duty, is one of the bitterest feelings we can experience. The like prominent place that the *mens conscia recti holds among the constituents of happiness, the like place among the elements of infelicity holds the consciousness of infidelity to right and duty.

"The Master to whose services I have endeavored to train you, my children—the Teacher whose instructions have so often been the theme of your meditations—hath said that his yoke is easy, and his burden light. Have ye not found it so?—Have ye not found it easy, by placing yourselves as in the presence of your Father in heaven and his Anointed One, to repress the tendencies to wrong-doing, and go, from strength to strength, in the ways which God approves? You have all felt how ennobling it is to have your eye upon God's approval, and to know you have acted in a way not altogether undeserving of it. You have all felt how delicious it is to exercise the kindly and the devotional affections. All these, then, you lose if you shrink from the performance of those duties, which your consciences, now well illuminated by the teachings of Heaven's greatest Prophet, dictate and hold forth to you. O for the sake of your happy feeling of approximation to God, for the sake of the peace which should reign in your own bosoms, for the sake of the virtue and the peace of all to whom your influence in the smallest degree doth extend, satisfy not yourselves with the study of the instructions of Jesus, and with the knowledge of your duty, but overcome every obstacle to your full, free and ready performance of those actions which have received the stamp of his approbation. Avoid, my children, above all things, avoid the sense of duties unattempted, and of temptations ingloriously submitted to. Ye know your duty and ye know it well—for ye have studied at the feet and at the cross of Jesus—but if ye nerve yourselves not to its performance, your knowledge will only add to the poignancy of your remorse.

Farewell, my dear children, for soon must I be taken from you. When we meet again, after the long sleep of death, may I find that ye have fought a good fight against temptations and habits which would seduce you from the love of your One Father, and your many brethren; may I find that ye have overcome the world. This is the task your Father hath given you to do, and which he rewardeth with so much exquisiteness of delight and satisfaction—and shall I ever find that ye have flinched from your task, and that ye have preferred ease, shameful, miserable, inglorious ease? With one foot upon the earth and another in my grave, it agitates me almost too much to ask the question."

Reader, ponder, as if to yourself had been addressed these solemn admonitions of a dying fellow-mortal. And may his words turn many to righteousness. P. P.

*A mind conscious of rectitude

For the Magazine and Advocate

OMNIPOTENCE.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY,

At the voice of the Lord the cedars are bow'd,
And towers from their base into ruin are hurled;
The voice of the Lord, from the dark-bosom'd cloud,
Dissevers the lightning in flames o'er the world."

MONTGOMERY.

God is almighty. We need but look around us, in order to behold that omnipotent power is at the helm of affairs—that an all-potent arm is stretched out over the world, to govern and to guide. "Hast thou considered the heavens?"—There we see displayed the evidences of God's almightiness. There's not an orb that twinkles in yonder blue; not a star that glows in the midnight vault above us; not a blazing meteor dashing in its own bright gleaming magnificence across the trackless fields of ether; not a sun that shines amidst the immensity of God's works, and there's not a world moving onward through the realms of space in its primeval order, majesty and glory, but what testify of the omnipotence of their great Creator!

"The sun, himself, is but a gleam,
A transient meteor from thy throne;
And every frail and fickle beam
That ever in creation shone,
Is nothing, Lord, compared to thee,
In thy own vast immensity."

Look around upon earth, the footstool of the great Architect. Do not the everlasting mountains show forth his infinite might! Do not

"The embattled floods, by mutual whirlpools crost," and the dead cataract, "on whose forehead God has placed the rainbow," tell of the almighty power of Him who rideth upon the winds, and ruleth in the storm!

It is impossible for us fully to comprehend the majesty of our God. As well might we attempt to hold the sea in the hollow of our hand, or at a word, annihilate the universe. "He is at once known to us, and concealed from us, he is near us, and at the same time infinitely above us."

"Oh turn ye, then,
And bend the knee of worship, and the eyes
Of the pure stars shall smile with glad surprise
At the deep reverence of the sons of men
Aye—kneel in worship, till the stars grow dim,
And the skies vanish at the thought of Him
Whose light beyond them lies."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

HOPE.

BY REV. J. BAKER.

Hope is the desire of the soul. It is the principle within, which enables man, when called by death to part with a friend or relative, to look forward to the time when he shall meet the departed, in immortal and unending felicity. In this respect, hope may be said to be the fruit of faith.

We have faith in the accomplishment of God's promises. We believe that the word of promise which he hath spoken, will be fulfilled. Though man may be involved, while here, in sin and corruption, and moral death; yet God hath promised his deliverance. The work is given into the hands of his Son. The Father is, in him, reconciling the world unto himself. The work will be accomplished. The mystery has been made known to man, that according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, God will gather together, in one, all things in Christ Jesus, both which are in heaven, and on earth, even in him.

Faith in this—a firm belief in this Gospel, makes hope strong and lasting, in its possessor. It is an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast. It calms the troubled breast with a prospect, that the time is coming, when troubles shall cease, and peace and joy fill every soul. This hope, this desire and expectation, is in the breast of every Christian. Their constant supplications are, that it may be realized: and what is still better, the word of God stands pledged for its support—its accomplishment. It has the word of him who can not lie. His hand is stretched out, and who can turn it back? Surely, then, the desires of the Christian shall be granted!

O, how cheering would be the aspect of the world, if men would but exercise faith according to this hope! Fear would no longer be abroad in the world. Earth would present a foretaste of heaven; jarring and discord would no longer scourge mankind. We should regard all as brethren—children of one common Father, destined to one happy and immortal home! Let us, then, hope in the Lord—yea, and cherish faith according to our hope, and we shall be at rest.—God heareth and answereth the prayers of the righteous. Let us not fear, therefore, for the prayer of all is, that the doctrine of a world's salvation may prove true. And God is able to do better for us than we can even ask or think! yea, he is willing! Hope, then, in God!

Marlborough, Mass., January, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DOING GOOD;

OR A QUESTION WHICH ANSWERS ITSELF.

BY REV. C. S. HUSSEY.

"The Christian is the highest style of man." YOUNG.

It argues well to see a man doing good. His fellow-men award him a smile of approbation.—Conscious of his rectitude, he is at peace with himself, and, above all, he is justified in the sight of God. I say, it argues well to see a man doing good—it matters not of what sect, name, or denomination he may be. If this spark of benevolence which burns in the human heart, causes man to do what he can to remove the galling yoke of sin from the "heavy laden sinner," and "wipe the tear from sorrow's eye," what will that flame do, that burns to the heaven of heavens—irradiates and warms the vast immensity of space, and passes through and attracts whatever of life is contained in the wide universe? Would you, dear brother, finish sin, make an end of transgression, and bring in universal and everlasting righteousness, if it were in your power? Tell me not, then, that the Most High God will not bury wickedness and its hell in an unrefunding tomb, and deliver every child of mortality from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

South Lyndeboro', Mass.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ZEAL

FOR UNIVERSALISM DEMANDED BY BENEVOLENCE.

BY REV. DARIUS FORBES.

Universalists, as a denomination, profess one of the most benevolent systems of faith ever known in the world. It seems in every respect, designed to promote human happiness, and benefit human society. It calls upon us to love God, because "he first loved us;" and to love mankind, because he is good to "the unthankful and the evil." It tells us of the rich provision he has made for the spiritual wants of our race;—how he sent his Son, to toil, suffer, bleed and die for the redemption of our race from the power of sin. It tells us how he has in store for his intelligent creation, a higher and more refined mode of living than we now possess. It tells us we are to meet all our friends, and the companions of our joys and sorrows here, and the dearest objects of our fondest affections, in heaven. It tells us a God of unbounded goodness rules over this world, directs and controls all events, and will direct all to the best possible result. It tells us we may repose our all in his care, without one anxious thought for their safety; for he has promised to do better for us than we are able to ask or even to think.

Such a religion is just what man needs in this state of ignorance, error, and sin. It meets the soul's deepest wants in this chequered mode of being, where we are constantly exposed to misfortunes, calamities, losses, bereavements and death. While all around us is changing, unstable and passing away, this religion presents one bright spot, one point, where all our hopes may centre. It is designed to make man happy, even in the midst of the severest trials of life, to give him joy though the world frowns upon him. It will clothe the shroud, the pall, and the grave, though they may contain the remains of our dearest earthly friends, in smiles. It tells us that their spirits are transferred to a happier abode, to a more genial clime, where we shall follow them to enjoy the smiles of our common Father forever. Without such hopes and assurances, no man can consign an object of his love to the grave, except in terror and despair. The death of such an individual, without such hopes, would despoil those who remain, of all joy, and whelm them in misery and wretchedness.

This religion, then, is designed to promote the happiness of mankind in a manner and degree, which nothing else can. Is it not, then, the call of benevolence to do all we can for its extension in the world? Every reflecting person feels that it is designed to impart pleasures, no where else to be found. Yet, how many there are, who profess this faith, and still are totally indifferent to its extension in the world! How many who secretly cherish this faith, and will not avow it to the world for fear of becoming unpopular, or suffering loss in their business or friendship! How many who are loud enough in their professions, but utterly neglect to do any thing for its extension, either by personal exertions or pecuniary aid! How many who think one dollar paid for the support of what they profess to regard as religious truth, is more than ten expended for frivolous, useless, and may be, even pernicious personal gratifications, or to aid on a political scheme! How many others, who, not content with merely neglecting what they profess to regard as truth, but must needs aid in sustaining and up-building the opposite! How many follow the advocates of a false and ruinous system of religion, which breathes slaughter and death to nine-tenths of the human race, and yet are constantly and loudly condemning the sentiments advanced and maintained! How many conduct in reference to religion, as if they supposed it required neither honor nor honesty; and as if they thought they might innocently conduct in reference to it, in a manner which would disgrace them in any of the ordinary affairs of life! How many conduct as if they imagined there was no such thing as right and wrong in religious profession; nothing like duty demanded in reference to this matter; and that they may disregard the interests of truth and righteousness, and the calls of benevolence, with perfect impunity! Mistaken souls! How are they introducing spiritual death into their own natures! How are they preparing for themselves, tribulation and anguish; to have their minds racked and tortured with terror and despair!

Reader! are you thus regardless of the duties you owe the cause of religious truth, and thus reckless of principle? Do you grudge a few dollars and cents contributed to aid the cause of truth in your town and neighborhood? Do you think more of one dollar, given for the support of religion and its institutions, than of ten for foolish amusements, or useless personal gratifications, or to aid your political party?

If so, I would appeal to your benevolence and sympathies. Have you no pity for human suffering—for the woes of your race? I know you have, you would fly to the relief of any thing tortured with physical pain. The tear of commiseration would moisten your eye, were you now to see placed before you a human being, or even a brute, writhing and screaming with anguish, and no means would you spare for his relief. Why, then, are you not equally alive to the mental pain produced by error and sin? What is it to have the body racked with the severest pain, to having the soul tortured by guilt and remorse, by terror and despair? Think of the anguish of mind, produced by that doctrine, opposed to our distinguished point of faith—I mean, endless wo. How many a virtuous and upright youth is tortured, day and night, by its terrors, in doubt how to escape such an end! The day passes in anxious and distracting meditations and fears! Night comes and brings along with it the ghosts of the damned, visions of a world on fire; of the great Judge, surrounded by flaming vengeance, coming to judgment; the graves bursting and the dead coming forth. They see the books opened and the work of judgment begun.—They wait with trembling anxiety in terrific suspense, to hear their own names called, to know their doom! They see multitudes driven from the presence of the judge, seized by horrid devils and dragged down to hell, amid flames, the blaze of lightnings and the crash of thunders.—They hear the piteous moans of exhausted wretches, the wild shrieks of anguish and despair, and the howlings of torture! Terror and trembling seize upon them, and they wish themselves any thing but human beings!

This is no picture of the imagination. It is reality—fearful, horrid reality! I know it is so. I have trembled and wept over such scenes, and had my soul tortured by their fears, for years!—Such, I apprehend, is the condition of multitudes of our best young people. And will you have no pity upon them, and endeavor to enlighten their minds, and thus save them from such fearful misery? Is there no flesh in your hearts, that you can not feel?

Cast your eyes abroad upon our world, and see what bitter tears of misery are every where shed on account of that terrible faith. See that mother as she leans upon the stone that marks the place where the remains of her child are deposited, whose soul she fears is weltering in the flames of hell! See that father, mourning with unassuaged grief over the death of his son, torn from him without a hope, gone to be a fiend in that infernal abode! See that sister, whose brother was snatched away in a sudden and unexpected manner, whose merciless creed will not allow her to even hope he has gone to a better world, daily beseeching her God, with all a sister's love, to have mercy upon him! Look into our insane hospitals, and there see the work of that instrument of hell! See the poor wrecks of humanity destroyed by that dreadful sentiment! See shrieking madness, wild insanity, stupid idiocy, fiercely gnashing their teeth with demoniac rage, or raving with terror at that hell they see yawning beneath their feet, filled with devils sporting with the miseries of a dear friend, a loved companion, or a tender and beloved child, snatched from them by death!

Think of all these scenes, and all the miseries of evil doing arising from a neglect of religion and a want of its hopes, and then tell me—how can you take so little interest in the extension of the truth, and the maintenance of religion and its institutions? Think of these things and then tell me, Can you find it in your hearts to neglect the cause of truth and the calls of humanity? Will you see all these miseries sweeping over the land like a wild deluge, and yet remain idle and indifferent to that cause which, alone, can save men from all these evils? Is it the dictate of benevolence? Is it in accordance with that spirit of kindness breathed forth in the Gospel? No! no! it is not. And may God grant that you, dear reader, may be suitably impressed by these things, made to feel your duty and be impelled by the pure spirit of love to its performance.

Norridgewock, Me., December, 1837.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

UNION CONFERENCE.

Brs GROSH and HUTCHINSON—On the whole I believe the world is becoming wiser, better and happier. Christians of every denomination are fast assimilating in feeling and action. A disposition is constantly increasing, to maintain the "unity of the spirit in the bond of peace."

For two years past, we have been in the habit of visiting the Universalist society in South New-Berlin. A few tried friends there, deserve much credit for their constancy and perseverance in the cause of truth. They can rejoice in knowing that, with the blessing of Heaven, their exertions have been successful, and that others are coming forward to engage in the glorious work. The Christian philanthropist should never "be weary in well doing, for in due season he will reap, if he faint not."

Recently, when there, notice was given that, on Sunday evening, there would be a Conference meeting held at Holmesville, for mutual moral and religious improvement. A general invitation was given. Accordingly, at an early hour, the house was thronged by Universalists, Methodists, Baptists, and non-professors. After the preliminary services of reading the Scriptures, singing and prayer, a renewal of the invitation was made to all professing Christians present, to unite in the services, with remarks, showing that, although in matters of faith and hope, there might be some difference of opinion, yet as it respected the practical and experimental principles of religion, I trusted we were all agreed—that all Christians should unite their moral and intellectual faculties in promoting virtue, morality and pure religion among their fellow-men. This invitation was accepted, and the evening was devoted to occasional speaking, and exhortation and singing. The services appeared to be attended with a salutary and beneficial effect. At the close, an appointment was made for another meeting of the same description, in four weeks from that evening. The house was again thronged, and a general attendance of all the denominations in the neighborhood. Two Methodist preachers were present and joined in the services. This was a union meeting. There were several who spoke on the part of the Methodists, expressive of their views and feelings on the subject of religion. It is true, that a remark was made, now and then, implying that while some went the upward course, others would go the downward way—that some would seek to enter the strait gate, but would not be able, etc. These remarks, however, appeared to be made more from habit and tradition, than from design. As it respects the "strait gate," and some seeking and failing to enter in, I observed that the difficulty was not in the gate—that it was high and broad enough—that there was no disposition in the keeper to keep any out, but the difficulty was in those who sought to enter. They did not strive right. This was owing to a lack of light and knowledge—therefore we should all strive and pray that light an knowledge might extend, till all should "know the Lord from the least unto the greatest"—"the blind be brought by the way which they knew not," and all be able to strive to enter the kingdom in the right way. The meeting was conducted with order and harmony throughout, and closed by a notice for a third on the evening on the 5th Sunday inst.

In relation to these meetings, I consider them an evidence that a more charitable and liberal tone of feeling is being cherished by many of our hitherto opposing Christian brethren. No other feelings were apparent on these occasions, but those of Christian kindness and charity. All appeared to be sensible of the importance, of the benevolent and purifying principles of the Gospel, and to be desirous that their joys and hopes might be shared by all. From happy experience, we could exclaim—

"The hill of Zion yields
A thousand sacred sweets,
Before we reach the heavenly fields,
Or walk the golden streets."

Oxford, December 15, 1837. N. DOOLITTLE.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

THE CAUSE IN WESTERN NEW-YORK.

In concluding the article on this subject in my last, I promised the further consideration of it at another time. I now proceed to it.

A better understanding among our ministering brethren, is called for; a point to which I barely alluded in my last. By a better understanding among us, is not meant, that there is now, or is likely to be, any disagreement in general matters relating to the welfare of our denomination. Our feelings being so generally uniform, seems rather to have led many into an error of judgment. It is too much regarded as an end, instead of a means. But little has been done to direct these feelings to those important results which will have a great bearing on the condition of our cause. We all feel that there should be no conflicting interests among us; and that all we do, should be done with a reference to the advancement of Universalism—at the same time, not forgetting the duty we owe to ourselves and to our families. For we should never render ourselves obnoxious to the charge—"If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." I anticipate with delight, the result of a better understanding among us; and my expectations are based on the prevalent uniformity of feeling among us.

I have already intimated that pecuniary causes operate, in a great degree, against us; in some instances compelling us to starve on charity, or surrender our profession. The stoutest heart is thereby made to languish, and the loftiest mind to droop. It betrays consummate ignorance to ask, whether the clergy, like other men, need the ordinary means of support. They must have it: yet much of the intellectual strength, not only of those in the ministry, but of those who would engage in it, is paralyzed, or confined by a necessary frequent resort to other avocations for a livelihood. Many with whom I am acquainted, possessing minds of nearly the first order, are beginning to look around for other means of support. It is painful to them to do so, but it is no voluntary act—they are compelled to do it. They have necessarily incurred, and are incurring liabilities, from which they can not disengage themselves, so long as the present state of things exists, without leaving the ministry, wholly or in part. It is with regret that I mention these things, and glad would I be if there was no occasion for naming them. Their effects on the condition of the cause in the western part of this State, are likely to be too fatal, for me to be silent. I believe there is a remedy and it must be applied, even though it should not, at first, prove agreeable. Without mincing the matter, it must be understood that our living depends on those who receive our labors, and if they can not support us, we must engage in some other employment; and those who can preach without infringing on the means of their support, let them do it. If those who request our labors, were unable to remunerate us, they then might be given gratuitously. But most of them are able, and we can not now devote our labors to them, without receiving from them a proper support—at least, we see not how, in justice to all concerned, it can be done.—If any way can be devised by which we can do the work of an evangelist, without depending on those who employ us for a support, we wish it might be done—it will meet with our hearty acceptance. We can not labor unless we can live—we can not live without the means of living—we have not joined these things together, but God has, and no man can put them asunder.

The putting into operation a remedy for the evil we have mentioned, depends upon the clergy—the remedy, itself, must come from the laity. I know this is a delicate matter for our ministering brethren; but when such important results are pending, why should they be fastidious? A dissatisfaction does exist—one which many even of the laity, see, feel, and desire to have removed—and we ought to understand one another in relation to it, and remove it, if possible. There is no doubt that we can determine on some course, which will lead to the best results, if a large lay and ministerial conference can be assembled to deliberate on this subject and its consequences; and this is another reason why the conference spoken of in my last, should be held at as early a day, and in as central a place, and be as numerously attended, as possible. G. S.

For the Herald of Truth.

DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.

BY J. N. GRANGER.

"'Tis with our judgments as our watches,
None go just alike, yet each believes his own."

Man is singularly, yea, wonderfully constructed. Whether we view him upon Phrenological principles, tracing the manifestations of his passions, propensities and powers to the relative development of physical organization; or acknowledge him to be guided by an impalpable, unknown essence, independently of physical organs by which it may act; still, he is curiously constructed.—Nothing has been too mighty for his genius to grapple with, from the analyzation of the earth under his feet, to the sublimer knowledge of the etherial region that stretches its studded canopy over his head. On the other hand, nothing has been too absurd for him to advocate, from the Saturnalian rites of Heathen credulity, to the mystical and mystified notions of the present day. Again, what a diversity of opinion is entertained upon every topic that engrosses the attention of mankind; especially the all-important subject of Christ's mission to earth. My neighbor, for instance, is an Arminian—he searches the Word of God with an inquiring mind, and says that he finds the doctrine of conditional salvation written legibly upon its pages. His minister pours forth the same sentiments from the sacred desk, with an eloquence that makes madness beautiful,

"And casts o'er erring deeds and thoughts,
A heavenly hue of words"— and he believes. I, on the other hand, am a Universalist. From Genesis to Revelation, I find satisfactory proof of the unconditional final salvation of all human kind. I stop not here. I compare the divine evidence with the reason and fitness of things. I view man as he actually exists, groping in the dark labarynth of doubt and error, yet endowed with a sublimated essence that is continually yearning "for the eternal beauty of undying things." I apply the testimony and the reason to the needy condition of man, and am brought, irresistibly brought to the conclusion that "the Lord will not cast off forever, but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies; for he doth not willingly afflict nor grieve the children of men." Now whence arises this difference of opinion, we being equally sincere? The question is easily answered. Mentally speaking we are differently constructed. Our minds are predisposed to receive different kinds of evidence, or are satisfied with a greater or less amount of evidence. We believe, then, independently of any volition, act or desire. To illustrate.—I am alone.

"Night stretches her leaden sceptre o'er a slumbering world; Silence how dead, and darkness how profound!"

The lamp flickering in the socket, warns me that my lucubrations are about at an end. My eye rests upon a favorite time-piece before me.—It is just telling the hour of twelve. Now, could all the threats devised by human ingenuity—could all the terrors of an imaginary hell—could Faith's red "Auto, fed with human fuel," make me believe that it is morning. Certainly not! I might be constrained to say that it was noonday; but it would be because fear or selfish motives predominated, not that I believed it to be so. And why? Simply because threats and terrors are not evidence. Then belief is a state of mind brought about, not at all times by weight of evidence, but by what we consider weight of evidence. And it consequently follows, that while we give an impartial hearing to any question, we can not, and ought not to be culpable, responsible or accountable for our belief. How cautious we should be, then, not to draw invidious comparisons between ourselves and neighbors—not to say in the language of arrogance and self-pride, "Stand by thyself, I am holier than thou," but take your erring brother by the hand, address him in the kind conciliating language of reason and affection, and draw him insensibly from the murky region of doubt and error into the shining pathways of happiness and truth.

Manchester Centre, January 4 1838.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1838.

THE IDENTITY OF HUMAN SYMPATHY.

We will commence the subject which we propose briefly commenting upon, by attempting to answer the following reply to the remark of Doctor Channing, wherein his article, entitled "Moral Argument against Calvinism, Illustrated," he says, "It is plain that a doctrine which contradicts our best ideas of goodness and justice, can not come from the just and good God or be a true representative of his character." The following is the reply.

"Here two facts are taken for granted, neither of which is true. 1. It is assumed that men's "ideas of goodness and justice" are always necessarily correct. This is notoriously not true. The Universalist tells us, it is contrary to his 'best ideas of goodness and justice' that the wicked should be eternally punished. Of course the Doctor's principle would prove Universalism true.—The Pelagian says, it is contrary to his 'best ideas of goodness and justice' that Adam's posterity should be affected in moral character by his sin. Of course, according to the principle, Pelagianism is true. The infidel says, it is inconsistent with his best ideas of goodness and justice, that God should require the death of his Son before he will pardon the sinner. Of course Christianity is false. Whenever men set up their own feelings and views as the test of revealed truth; they adopt a principle most unsound and disastrous in its consequences. 2. The Doctor assumes another fact, which is false, viz: That Calvinism 'contradicts our best ideas of goodness and justice.' It may contradict Dr. Channing's ideas—even his 'best ideas;' and it may contradict the ideas entertained by many others; but it manifestly does not contradict 'the best ideas of goodness and justice' entertained by Calvinists.—On the contrary, it precisely accords with them. And has any man or any class of men the right to set forth their ideas as the infallible test of revealed truth? This would be most emphatically to claim infallibility, without inspiration. If this moral argument is Dr. C.'s mighty weapon against Calvinism; it has little to fear from his assaults."

With the specific purpose of the Doctor's argument, or with the results and statements of the above quoted article, we have at present nothing to do—although we are willing that our readers should judge whether the ideas of the Pelagian and the infidel are exclusively theirs, or whether the ideas of the Universalist and his objection are well founded or not—but we maintain that the expression "our best ideas of goodness and justice," is philosophically correct and tenable. We do not understand Doctor Channing, to set up his own special ideas as a test, or to claim "infallibility without inspiration." We understand him to mean those ideas of goodness which are common to mankind, and thus understanding him, shall endeavor to defend his expression.

We say, then, that the perception of moral beauty is universal. In different minds it is more or less obscured and perplexed, yet it is the same moral beauty which all see, of which all have a shadowy glimpse, an enlarged view, or a glorious vision. Circumstances are the causes of these different degrees of perception. Yet there is an innate acknowledgment of this moral beauty in every heart, and its manifestation is known and felt by all. The mind of the child may be obscured in the first dawnings of perception, and that of the savage darkened by ignorance and superstition, yet tell that child or that savage of a certain individual that he is a good man, and they will love in degree, the same principle exhibited in that individual, as does the philosopher with his ennobled and expanded faculties, or the enlightened and intelligent Christian. Though not so clear, not so explicable, in these first instances as in the last, yet it is the same emotion of our common nature that throbs to the exhibition of goodness, justice, love, or whatever other moral attribute it may be.

But it is probable, nay certain, that to a perfect perception of moral beauty, humanity, at least in its present state, can not attain. What then? We must take those ideas of the moral attributes with which our innate perceptions best harmonize, and which render our view of those moral attributes the most expansive and clear. These are our best ideas of moral beauty. Upon a view like this, the deep places of our hearts are filled with gladness—the darkness passes from before our mental vision, and our souls go forth in the enlarged sphere of their action like free and rejoicing things. Nor do we think that this makes our best ideas of goodness, etc. rest upon individual opinion. Our common nature, unbiassed and unprejudiced, will give response to the view which bursts the most harmonious and beautiful upon the sight. If the perception of goodness be common to all, that common perception will, alike in all, acknowledge that view which is the best when it is presented. We can not be deceived into the belief that a ray of earth is the more glorious, when the light and the beauty of heaven are streaming down around us. Our best ideas of goodness, then, are those which the pure, the unfettered emotions of mankind, by common and united impulse, feel and own to be the best when those ideas are clearly and candidly presented to them.

We thus say, that the perception of goodness is universal, and that the best ideas of goodness are common and alike to all and by all innately acknowledged to be the best, when exhibited under favoring circumstances. We will endeavor to shew this more clearly by two illustrations. The perception of goodness is universal, else, why do we appeal to the skeptic, for the evidences of God's attribute of goodness exhibited in nature? If our ideas of goodness are not the same with his, how do we know that what satisfies us as an evidence of goodness, will not appear perfectly futile to him and entirely contradictory to his notions of goodness? Because, we appeal, in that case, to the common idea of the immutable, existing principle of goodness, satisfied that that idea will testify to the cogency of our appeal. The best ideas of goodness are common and alike to all, or why do we commend to the Deist the morality of the Gospel, as the best exhibition of moral beauty ever presented to man and challenge him to say aught against it? May he not answer us that it possibly will suit our best ideas of moral beauty, but it does not suit his? Oh! we know that if he will listen to it, it has a power which speaks in "a still small voice" to the deep yearnings of his spirit, and which makes clearer and enlarges more to his perception that view of moral beauty which has been ever before him, than any of all the philosophies and theories of men.

We believe, then, that the expression "our best ideas of goodness," is a correct one. We believe that the more expanded and the more clear that moral loveliness appears to man, the better will be his ideas of that loveliness. We believe that these ideas will be alike to all when presented in an equally clear and expansive manner. For the organs of our moral, if we may use the phrase, like those of our physical vision, are naturally constituted the same in all, and under the same advantages, objects presented to them will appear the same to one, as to another. If any thing crosses or darkens that vision, it disfigures or contradicts our (humanity's) best ideas of moral beauty.

We believe the Gospel to harmonize better than aught else with our (humanity's) best ideas of moral beauty. We believe it is yet to operate, by the exhibition of that beauty, upon the sympathies which are common to our race. For there is a chord of sympathy, which runs though the universal humanity and which responds and gives birth, in all lands and all ages, to whatever affects our common nature. Goodness is every where goodness, its operation and exhibition awaken the same feeling in every bosom, and its possessor is looked upon and regarded after the same manner by all. And this chord thrills alike in all, to fear and hope, to joy and sorrow—it quivers when dark sin and passion sweep over it, or vibrates to the thrilling voices of angels, singing "Peace on earth; good will to men." It is the token of our common origin—it is connected with that link which unites earth to heaven!

And to this would we apply the power of Gospel truth. To the eyes of the darkened and the erring we would exhibit the greatness, the loveliness of God's attributes, as revealed in the word of life. To the sympathies which are common to man universally, would we appeal with the doctrines of Christianity. We would say to the benighted ones,—"Brethren, here are our best ideas of morality—they will be your best ideas of morality, for we know that you have the feelings of our nature. We know that they will appease the innate yearnings of your spirits, for they have those of others. They will unveil to you the proper object for that sentiment of worship which is born with us all. They will satisfy the aspirations of your poets and philosophers after 'the greatest good.' They will reveal to you that dim future, the secrets of which your wise men would have extorted from the lore and the hidden spells of earth, or would have read in the mystic but silent stars. For, here is God exhibited as our common Father—here are we all declared brethren—here are shewn 'the way, and the truth, and the life'—here you will discover the secret of happiness, the path of peace, the light of immortality!"

And when God sees fit to operate by, and accompany with his spirit, the appeal of the Gospel to the sympathies of man will be effectual. The Pagan will turn from his blinded worship, and the Moslem will kneel at the foot of the cross. The dweller of the dreary North will shout anthems in earth's remotest places, and pæans of salvation will float on every breeze that comes from the far islands of the sea. In the depths of the lone forest, the red Indian will lift up his brow in light, and the African will rejoice in the desert budding and blossoming as the rose. The skeptic will cease to brood over his cold speculations, and the strains of Judah's harp will thrill through the ranks of the ransomed of the Lord, as they "return to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads." The veil from the face of all people will be rent in twain, and as brethren, we shall meet in the courts of our Father's great temple. Peace and gladness will dwell upon earth—"the nations shall know war no more." The falchion will bend to a ploughshare, and the spear to a pruning hook. The smoke of unhallowed offerings will no longer go darkling up to the heavens, for the altar and the idol will be prostrate in the dust—and where all was shadow, and error, and gloom, the light of the blessed and holy Shekinah will rest and abide forever! E. H. C.

NEW PUBLICATION.

"The age of Truth; or a Sermon on the Doctrine of Atonement. By Udney May Jacob. Warren, Pa.—Goodrich and Young, printers. 1837." pp. 32.

Some unknown friend has sent us the above pamphlet, which I have perused with considerable pleasure.—The sender will please accept my thanks. The pamphlet appears to be the workings of a strong mind—not very careful about the style or manner, if the ideas are but clear, in which latter he has succeeded well, by apt quotations of Scripture. His text is John vi: 31–33.—He labors to show, 1. What Jesus came not to do. 2. What he did come to do. 3. How he performed his work; and, 4. Why he did it.

As some of his views are a little different from those generally held, I present the following summary.

1. Jesus did not come to do any thing contrary to the will of God—or to frustrate the law of God or any of its requirements. Hence it is preposterous to suppose that Jesus made an atonement to prevent the execution of the penalty of God's law on sinners. The pernicious error of mistaking forgiveness of sin for forgiveness of just punishment is forcibly pointed out. I think, however, that our Br. errs in supposing that mankind go to Jesus to be judged—every Scripture passage that speaks of movement in the parties, declares that Jesus comes to judge men according to their works. Even God is spoken of in the Old Testament, as coming out of his secret place to judge the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity.—Let Br. Jacob look again at this matter, and see what saith the Scriptures. He will find that the throne and judgment seat of Jesus are represented, uniformly, as being set on the earth.

2 and 3. Jesus came to give his flesh—his blood—his life for all men, that he might raise all men from the dead. He proves the universality and the universal efficacy of this offering, and shows the injurious consequences of denying either.

4. This division goes to show that the penalties of God's law, will be executed on every man, successively, immediately after death—that after all have been judged and punished, the resurrection will take place, and all be raised holy and happy. He supposes this resurrection would take place immediately, if men would cease to sin; for the sins of one delay the happiness of all—so intimately are the interests of the whole universe made one and the same.

The following, with which I close this notice, will probably include all else that is peculiarly his. The pamphlet is a good one, (though poorly printed,) well filled with Scripture quotations aptly applied, and (bating a little severity against Partialist preachers, whose errors he supposes to be generally wilful) calculated to do much good among the opposers of the Restitution.

A. B. G.

PROPOSITIONS.

1. Every thing that exists, except the Father, is an effect produced by some cause.

2. The punishments to which men are subject in consequence of sin, are of two kinds, arising from two distinct and opposite causes.

3. One cause of punishment is sin itself, the effect whereof is misery,—the other cause is the law, the effect whereof is the execution of its penalty: this is punishment for sin. The result of the execution of the law is good, for the cause that produces it is good. It therefore never can be remitted. But the effect of sin never can produce any good, for the cause which produces it is bad; like causes, like effects. Hence, when a sinner truly repents and is converted, the punishment derived from sin is forgiven and ceases. But the penalty of the law which when, inflicted, is grievous for the time being, nevertheless it results in good, therefore it can not be remitted. Hence God says he will by no means clear the guilty, that is, from the penalty of the law. But the punishment arising as an effect from sin, this he will remit when the sinner repents and reforms. Christ is the physician, the penalty of the law of His Father is the medicine: and reconciliation of all things to himself is the result: both which are in heaven: (that is, in the intermediate state between death and the resurrection) and in earth.—Col. i: 20.

"But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons."—Col. iii: 25.

A NEW WORK.

Br. Chase proposes publishing a duodecimo volume of about 200 pages, bound in leather, to contain—1. A sketch of the Author's life; 2. A few select doctrinal and practical sermons; 3. Illustrations of contested Scriptures. 4. Various religious anecdotes and poetic articles; and, 5. A copious Index. The work will be afforded at 75 cents per copy, and published as soon as sufficient encouragement is received. Subscribers' names to be returned before the first of April next, to Br. J. Chase, West Bloomfield, Ontario county, with residences and number of copies plainly noted. A. B. G.

Subscriptions for the above work will be received at this office.

UNIVERSALISM IN OHIO CITY.

Our friends in this place (opposite Cleveland) are prospering under the labors of Br. Whitney, formerly of this section. They have commenced a building which shall answer the double purpose of a meeting-house, and an Academy—in separate rooms, however—and have engaged Br. Dinsmore, late Principal of the Morrisville Academy, to take charge of the latter. By the following advertisement, taken from a Western paper, it will be perceived that Br. Dinsmore is already on the ground, and has commenced operations in advance of the completion of the building. We hope that the efforts of our friends in spreading knowledge—correct knowledge of any and every kind, may be crowned with abundant success. A. B. G.

OHIO CITY SEMINARY.

Mr. Dinsmore having been engaged as the Principal of this Institution, (as the building designed for its use is not yet prepared,) will receive scholars at his DWELLING HOUSE on Hicks-street until said building shall be completed.

Tuition—for Common Branches of Education $3.50 per Quarter. Higher Branches, from $4, to $6, per Quarter.

Ohio City, November 29, 1837.

HEAR US!

IN MERCY OR IN JUSTICE—EITHER.

Our Subscribers who are indebted to us, are earnestly entreated to make payment immediately, to us or our agents, for former volumes, or in advance for the present, if they can. And our Agents are requested to remit to us by mail, (if no other safe and speedy conveyance offers,) in bank notes or drafts that will be current here at the least discount (if any), all funds for us that may come into their hands.

THE REASON.

Our remittances are still far less than they have been in former years, at this season, notwithstanding that there should be added to them the deficieney of last year, and the money due on 1836. The deficiency in the remittances that would have come in, in the ordinary course of business, is now at least 3000 dollars, (to say nothing of several thousands beside, that should be paid to us on former volumes,)—for the want of which we have been compelled to postpone paying bills due months ago, and to borrow money, besides, to pay current expenses.—These bills and this borrowed money must be paid, and soon; and to do it, these 3000 dollars, at least, must be procured—while the payments on the present volume should be increased. We exceedingly dislike to publish (and our readers, to read) dunning articles, and we earnestly pray that our subscribers will do all they can to remove our necessity for writing them. The burden of pecuniary cares and perplexities that has rested on us for many months past, has been very great—and to it has been added the shame that many of our able subscribers will compel us to dun them—to entreat payment of what we have earned—1st, by laboring for it—2d, by waiting for it—and now, and worst of all, 3d, by dunning for it! Will they not hear us! G. and H.

N. B.—Those owing the firm, or myself, for books, etc., are also requested to forward what they can, as soon as they can. Every cent that can be raised, will be wanted from now until we are released from the difficulties that have accumulated on our shoulders since last Spring. Besides I wish to make some improvements in the printing department of the paper, and must have means to do it. A. B. G.

THE EXPOSITOR.

This valuable periodical wants more subscribers, (as well as advance payments from those who now take it,) to be supported and made what it intends to be. One lady in Boston has procured twenty-five female subscribers for it. A gentleman in Roxbury has procured sixty, and another in Stratford, Ct., has procured fifty subscribers for it. Are there no more to be obtained in the "Empire State"? Send on your names and money to either this or the Union office—free of postage—or to Br. G. W. Bazin, Publisher, Boston. A. B. G.

NOT RIGHT.

It is not right for subscribers to allow some four or five numbers of a new volume to come to their address and then order a discontinuance, or what is still worse, send their papers back without writing the name of the Post-office on them, leaving us to guess where they came from. We gave sufficient notice that all orders for discontinuances should come to us before the close of the volume, yet we are subjected to many dollars expense by forwarding numbers to these negligent—we came very near saying dishonest subscribers, who, contrary to every principle of right, thus tax us. G. and H.

THE RECORD.

NEW PREACHERS.—The following gratifying intelligence from Br. T. J. Greenwood, of Marlborough, Mass., was omitted last week.—"I am happy to inform you, that yet two more are about to be added to the number of the ministers of the reconciliation. Brs. Stillman Barden and Jacob Baker—both young men of excellent character, and of great promise of usefulness, now resident in my family, pursuing their studies preparatory to the Gospel ministry—preached, for the first time, on the last Sunday in December. The former occupied the desk of Br. J. Skinner, of Holliston, and the latter, my desk in Framingham." They preached to good acceptance. [An article from Br. Baker will be found in this paper—and two others from Brs. Barden and Greenwood will appear soon.]

Br. T. Fisk, it would appear by the last Southern Evangelist, has not withdrawn from the ministry, but is travelling and preaching in the vicinity of Hamburg, Georgia.

The Universalist society in Albany have formed a Library Association, and will receive gratefully what our Editors and publishers may forward to them, for their files and shelves. Address Br. S. Van Schaack, Librarian of Universalist Library Association, Albany.

A Universalist Institute, Bible class and Sunday school have lately been organized at Sandy Bay, Mass., under the pastoral labors of Br. C. Spear.

Br. D. J. Mandell, of Westbrook, Me., has engaged to preach the whole time to the society in Gardiner, Me., for three months, commencing December 24th.

A Postoffice has lately been established in Booton, Genesee county, Mich., and our worthy agent, James H. Murray, Esq., has been appointed its Post Master. A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Patience, dear friends, we have now surmounted the press of articles, most of them long ones, which hampered us at the commencement of the volume. A funeral discourse by Br. Montgomery will appear soon. Several poetical articles will be attended to as soon as time permits; except in a very few cases, we deem their early publication less important than most prose articles. The article by H. L. [or S.] B..... is respectfully declined—we can scarcely find room for the usual obituary notices, and of course must decline inserting long eulogiums, however true, (as in this case,) on the departed. A. B. G.

PRIZE TALES.—If the receipt of payments for past and present volumes, should be sufficient to allow us, we will offer premiums for prize tales, On the importance and benefits of properly sustaining public worship—probably, also, for some Essays on the best means of doing so—on or before the first day of March next. We are anxious to allow the competitors at least three months time, and to issue the first one in our 27th number, which begins the last half year of the volume. To enable us to do so, however, our subscribers and agents must hasten payments, so as to let us know whether we can be able to pay present debts and current expences, and have wherewithal, besides, to pay the premiums. Come, friends, do you want some new prize Tales and Essays? You can have them, if you will. G. and H.

Br. Tompkins—Please send No. 7, vol. 5, Repository, to Mrs. Diantha Jones, Ann Arbor, Mich. That No. never was received by her.

Br. Tompkins—Send Repository to Miss Catharine Allen, Honesdale, Wayne county, Pa.

Br. Price, send Union to Daniel Cole, Lafayette, Onondaga county, credit him $1.50 on the ssme, and charge G. and H.

Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson have for sale that charming little work, THE PALFREYS, by a Lady. Every family should possess a copy. E. H. C.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. M. B. SMITH at Clinton, and at Hampton in the evening.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. BRITTON at Little York—Br. WILCOX at Brownville, and at Sackets Harbor in the evening, as friends may appoint—Br. M. B. SMITH at Cedarville, and at Carvers in the evening—Br. W. M. DELONG in this city—Br. J. T. GOODRICH at North Norwich, and at Sherburne in the evening—Br. WAGGONER will deliver a Temperance lecture in the Union meeting-house in Oppenheim at 10 A. M. and preach in the afternoon and evening as the friends may appoint—Br. MILES at Fairport, and in the evening in the neighborhood of Br. Samuel R. Thompson—Penfield—at such place as the friends there may appoint.

DEDICATION.—The new meeting-house in North Norwich will be dedicated on the 7th, inst., and a conference will be held on the 8th. Ministering brethren are invited to attend.

Br. WILCOX will lecture on the evening of February 8th, at Harrisville—9th, at Carthage—10th, at Dexter—12th, at New Philadelphia.

Br. BRITTON will lecture on the evenings of February 5th, at Bentley's Corners—6th, at Oxbow—7th, at Antwerp, near Br. Foster's—8th, at Somerville.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

I [D. Windsor—G R; Rochester, for R S—S G M, Hume, for S W, D H, and J D—P M, Linden, for A J W—A K, Knoxville, (Pa.) for self and J W—P M, Parisville, (O.) for P S, and S B—J N, Hinsdale, (N. H.)—J M, Boston, (Mass.)—J R, Sugar Creek, (Ills.) for self, and D P—A D B, Marsailles, (Ills.) for J S, and R W—P B R, Jacksonapolis, (Mich.) for self, J R, and J B A—P P, Fultonville—J B, and H B, Scipio, for sundry subscribers—P M, Branchport, for J D, and J S—P M, Hermon, for self, and T G—P M, Lebanon, for S S—P M, Flint, (Mich.) J W C, and J A E—L B, Port Huron, (Mich.)—W W, Newbury, (O.) for self, T L, and C C G—P M, Geneva, (O.) for S J—W K, Tafton, (Pa.)—J F, Rouse Point, for self, E D, J U W, A A, J C, and J C—J H M, Provincetown, (Mass.)—T K Jr. Norfolk, for self, M B, J B, J R M, and J H—J H W, Catskill, for W S—O P, Beaver, (Pa.) for self, and A P—P M, Cabotville, (Mass.) for A G W, R D, H B, and W T—E G, North Norwich, for self, C P, S W C, N C W, H N, and A C—J B.—E. Pharsalia—Rev. C H, Royalton Centre, for E H, and J P—P M, Pendleton—P M, Sociality, for self, and J B—P M, Lafayette, for S C, and D C—P M, Pine Grove for J V—T A G, Champion, for self, A S B, L C, A P, P K, J M, L H, and N H—P M, Moreland, for J C—Rev. S P L, Prompton, (Pa.) for J K, L W, and A S—P M, Old Hickory, (O.)—P M, Erie, (Pa.) for F and T.

POETRY.

[From the U. S. Magazine and Democratic Review.]

PALESTINE.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Blest land of Judea! thrice hallowed of song,
Where the holiest of memories pilgrim-like throng;
In the shade of thy palms, by the shores of thy sea,
On the hills of thy beauty, my heart is with thee!

With the eye of a spirit, I look on that shore,
Where pilgrim and prophet have lingered before;
With the glide of a spirit, I traverse the sod
Made bright by the steps of the angels of God.

Blue sea of the hills! in my spirit I hear
Thy waters, Gennesaret, chime on my ear!
Where the Lowly and Just with the people sat down,
And thy spray on the dust of his sandals was thrown.

Beyond are Bethulia's mountains of green,
And the desolate hills of the wild Gadarene;
And I pause on the goat-crags of Tabor to see
The gleam of thy waters, oh dark Galilee!

Hark, a sound in the valleys! where swollen and strong,
Thy river, oh Kishon, is sweeping along;
Where the Canaanite strove with Jehovah in vain,
And thy torrent grew dark with the blood of the slain.

There down from his mountains stern Zebulon came
And Napthali's stag, with his eye-balls of flame,
And the chariots of Jabin rolled harmlessly on,
For the arm of the Lord was Abinoam's son!

There sleep the still rocks and the caverns which rang
To the song which the beautiful Prophetess sang,
When the Princess of Issachar stood by her side,
And the shout of a host in its triumph replied.

Lo! Bethlehem's hill-site before me is seen,
With the mountains around, and the valleys between;
There rested the shepherds of Judah, and there
The song of the angels rose sweet on the air.

And Bethany's palm trees in beauty still throw
Their shadows at noon on the ruins below:
But where are the sisters who hastened to greet
The lowly Redeemer, and sit at his feet?

I tread where the TWELVE in their wayfaring trod,
I stand where they stood with the CHOSEN OF GOD!
Where his blessing was heard, and his lessons were taught,
Where the blind were restored, and the healing was wrought.

Oh, here with his flock the sad wanderer came,
These hills he toiled over in grief, are the same—
The founts where he drank by the way side still flow,
And the same airs are blowing which breathed on his brow.

And throned on the hills sits Jerusalem yet,
But with dust on her forehead, and chains on her feet;
For the crown of her pride to the mocker hath gone,
And the holy Schechinah is dark where it shone.

But wherefore this dream of the earthly abode
Of humanity clothed in the brightness of God?
Were my spirit but turned from the outward and dim,
It could gaze, even now, on the presence of him!

Not in clouds and in terrors, but gentle as when,
In love and in meekness, he moved among men;
And the voice which breathed peace to the waves of the sea,
In the hush of my spirit would whisper to me!

And what if my feet may not tread where he stood,
Nor my ears hear the dashing of Galilee's flood,
Nor my eyes see the cross which he bowed him to bear,
Nor my knees press Gethsemane's garden of prayer;

Yet, Loved of the Father, thy spirit is near
To the meek, and the lowly, and penitent here;
And the voice of thy love is the same, even now,
As at Bethany's tomb, or on Olivet's brow.

Oh, the outward hath gone! but in glory and power,
The spirit surviveth the things of an hour;
Unchanged, undecaying, its Pentecost flame
On the heart's secret altar is burning the same!

INDECISION OF CHARACTER.

A person of indecisive character wonders how all the embarrassments in the world happened to meet exactly in his way, to place him just in that one situation for which he is peculiarly unadapted, and in which he is also willing to think no other man could have acted with such facility and confidence. Incapable of setting up a firm purpose on the basis of things as they are, he is often employed in vain speculations on some different supposable state of things, which would have saved him from all this perplexity and irresolution. He thinks what a determined course he could have pursued, if his talents, his health, his age, had been different; if he had been acquainted with some one person sooner; if his friends were in this or the other point, different from what they are; or if fortune had showered her favors on him.—And he gives himself as much licence to complain, as if all these advantages had been among the rights of his nativity, but refused by a malignant or capricious fate, to his life. A man without decision can never be said to belong to himself; since if he dared to assert that he did, the puny force of some cause, about as powerful, you would have supposed, as a spider, may make a captive of the hopeless boaster the very next moment, and triumphantly exhibit the futility of the determinations by which he was to have proved the independence of his understanding and his will. He belongs to whatever can seize him; and innumerable things do actually verify their claim on him, and arrest him as he tries to go along; as twigs, and chips, floating near the edge of a river, are intercepted by every weed, and whirled in every little eddy. Having concluded on a design, he may pledge himself to accomplish it—if the hundred diversities of feeling which may come within the week, will let him. As his character precludes all foresight of his conduct, he may sit and wonder what form and direction his views and actions are destined to take to-morrow; as the farmer has often to acknowledge the next day's proceedings are at the disposal of its winds and clouds.—Foster.

REASONS FOR PUNCTUALITY AT CHURCH.

1. By staying at home, you will lose a season of enjoyment. The Christian finds a delight in worship.

2. You will wound the cause. If its friends will not give it countenance, who will?

3. You will wound the preacher. He will notice your vacant seat, and feel dispirited and neglected. Your attendance is due as a matter of courtesy to him.

4. You set an example which, if every body else should follow, there would be no meetings.

EXCUSES FOR STAYING AT HOME.

1. "It storms." True, but you can go if the preacher can. The congregation are under the same obligation to attend that the preacher is. If there are no hearers, it is as bad as if there were no preacher.

2. "But other folks will attend." Then you can go if others can, and ought to be ashamed to be behind "other folks" in zeal.

3. "But it is so stormy very few will attend." Then you ought to go lest there be too few, and the preacher feel disheartened.

4. "But I live so far from church." You would go the same distance in the same weather, on any other day, to attend to business or pleasure; to collect a debt or attend a wedding. And you ought to be ashamed to acknowledge that business or pleasure is of more importance, in your estimation, than worship.

5. "But this is a free country." True, as free to the preacher as the hearer. And if my congregation will not go to meeting, I will not preach for them. Reader, this article is from the pen of your own minister.—Union.

MARRIAGES.

In Seneca, on December 14th, by Rev. O. Ackley, Mr. WILLIAM AMSDEN, to Miss ELIZA ANN FIERO.

Same place, January 4th, by the same, Mr. GEORGE SPANGLE, to Miss POLLY HASSENGER, both of Hopewell.

In Alexander, Genesee county, last November 23d, by Rev. J. S. Flagler, Mr. DUDLEY CHANEY, of Richville, to Miss JULIA ANN GRIDLEY, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Centreville, December 7th, of disease in the brain occasioned by taking cold, Miss SARAH VAN BRUNT, in the 17th year of her age. A widowed mother, and several brothers and sisters mourn their loss in her departure. Sermon on the 9th, to a sympathising congregation, by Br. J. H. Sanford.

In Hume, September 2d, last, LUCETTA, youngest daughter of Mr. John Dond, aged 7 years. Funeral on the following Sunday, attended by a large concourse—sermon by Br. Sanford.

In Huntington, Lorain county, Ohio, December 22d, Mrs. MARGARET CASE, wife of Thomas H. Case, and daughter of Ira Tillotson, formerly of Henrietta, N. Y., aged 22 years. For the last two or three years she was an exemplary member of the Universalist society in Huntington; and while a wasting consumption was wearing away her physical strength, her mind was filled with "peace and joy in believing." She has left a bereaved husband and numerous friends to whom she was strongly endeared by the holy ties of virtuous friendship and Christian love. H. P. SAGE.

In Marshall, January 11th, CHARLES A. WHITE, son of Ashael and Margaret White, in the 4th year of his age. His night-clothes caught in the flame of a candle which had been set on the floor, and though his mother came in and extinguished the flames, by wrapping him in a blanket, as soon as possible, yet was he so severely burned as to be incurable. Sermon on the following Saturday by Rev. S. H. Lauchlin.

In Palermo, October 22d, ERASTUS, youngest son of Nathan and Lois Hawks, aged two years and eighteen days. Sermon on the 23d, by Br. C. B. Brown.

In Richland, January 8th, after a long and painful illness, MOSES RIPSON, aged 26 years. Funeral on the following day; sermon to a numerous assembly of neighbors and friends by Br. C. B. Brown.

In Perry, Geauga county, Ohio, on the 24th ult., Mrs. SARAH FRENCH, in the 75th year of her age. She died in the firm belief of the final holiness and happiness of the whole human family. She was formerly from Vermont—lived a number of years in Jefferson county, N. Y., and finally found her grave in Ohio. During her last illness, (which was a number of months of the most excruciating pain,) she exhibited the most perfect resignation to the will of God, and waited with patience and Christian fortitude the time of her departure; and her greatest anxiety was that she was afraid she should not have patience enough to wait the will of her Creator; for in Him was her trust, in Him was her consolation, and in Him she died. Thus we have another example of one dying composed, resigned and strong in the faith of the goodness, impartiality, justice, power and wisdom of Almighty God, and she too a believer in the universal salvation of every son and daughter of Adam. —Painesville (Ohio) Republican.

In Clarksville, Otsego county, December 29th, Mrs. SARAH MARIA DELONG, consort of Henry Delong, and daughter of James Lent, of Pierstown, in the 28th year of her age. Mrs Delong was educated a believer in endless wo, but previous to her last illness she became a believer in God's impartial grace, in which hope she remained stedfast, notwithstanding the prayers and entreaties of many of her friends, and in which she died resigned. She has left a husband and two small children to deplore her early death. The funeral was attended on the following Monday, by Rev. Mr. Grant, Methodist. J. D. H.

In Seneca, November 15th, last, of consumption, Miss CAROLINE AMSDEN, in the 19th year of her age. Her parents were already dead—hence no parental tears moistened her early grave; but the numerous assembly, and the sympathy of her many youthful friends, testified their high respect and deep affection for this amiable girl. Though formally united with no denomination, she was a joyful believer in the great and cheering principles of the Gospel of Christ, and died triumphing in its hope. The funeral was attended at the house of her uncle, A. A. Post (where she expired,) by Br. O. Ackley.

In Canastota, December 20th, ISAAC HENRY, son of Isaac and Mary Quackenbuss, aged 17 months, and 3 days. Sermon on the 22d, by Br. E. M. Woolley.

In Hamilton, January 17th, Mr. EPHRAIM RICHARDSON, formerly of Brookfield, Mass., in the 75th year of his age—after a distressing illness of nearly two years duration, which he bore with fortitude and resignation. Though connected with no denomination, he was a believer in the restitution, and died consoled by its hope. In life he was respected—in death, lamented by all who knew him. Funeral on the 18th. Sermon by Br. A. Williams.

* * Will the Trumpet please copy?

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH.

Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1838. NUMBER 6.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 15.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

BETHANY, Va., January 15th, 1838.

SIR—This morning by our regular mails, yours from Richmond, of the 21st ult., came to hand.—My last of the 6th December, it seems, reached you, and was considered by you, and your reply written in fifteen days from its date. While yours has been one month, lacking six days, in making its appearance here from the time it was written. These 25 days added to the 15, make 40 as the shortest interval between our dates; and still worse, it now only wants two days of two months since you wrote the preceding letter to me. It is dated November 13. And now you very politely tell me it must be so; that your friend, from his peculiar and exclusive honesty, I suppose, shall first print them; for you dare not permit me to have your manuscript! And so, nolens volens, you will give me six letters per annum and prolong the controversy some two years from this date. A very honest and profitable scheme, truly, for your Magazine, and such other Universalian papers as raised the wind and took subscribers during the war!

2. I begin to think that I have equal right to be heard on this subject, and to say what shall be; and I now tell you that the present volume of the Harbinger must close the discussion, unless you furnish a letter every month in proper time for its pages. My contemplated absence from home, to say nothing of decorum, or a decent respect to my readers, imposes upon me this duty. I therefore timously inform you that you are not at liberty to trifle with us as you please. We shall now see what interest you feel in conducting this discussion to its proper close according to our agreement. On the present principle of courtesy to public opinion, you may next go to Cuba, or the south of France, and thence despatch us two letters per annum!

3. Were it allowable to form an opinion from your last two letters, this will be to you a very fortunate alternative; for you seem to have got pretty well through with argument. Your first long letter, written before the preliminaries were agreed on, seems to have exhausted your resources. You then proved all your propositions, and disproved all mine in the lump!

4. You unceasingly tell us, indeed, of my "assumptions" and "assertions;" of your having "proved" this and that, and of my having "proved nothing;" until, as a matter of course, we now expect to see these words once or twice on every page. Your compositors, one might presume, will have found it economical to keep these words always set up ready for a long paragraph. You tell us so often of your good nature and of our "ill humor," that I begin to doubt whether you have any humor, or whether you are not a Universalian ossification of the type of Clark, of Museum reputation, who lived some time after his eyes and ears and outward flesh were converted into bone.

5. I regret to notice in your last, farther indications of the same unfortunate weakness heretofore complained of. The perversions and misrepresentations scattered over the face of this letter, I shall briefly notice, as a caution to our readers. You represent me, paragraph 7, as assuming that "temporal punishments were merely the sanctions of the Jewish dispensation." This is not fact. You next bring up the case of Ananias and Sapphira, the Corinthians, etc., against a position which I never held. My words are, "Neither Jesus nor his apostles did at any time threaten temporal, physical, or corporeal punishment to those who disobeyed the Gospel. These are not sanctions of the Gospel." And you urge these cases as though they proved that such punishments were held forth as sanctions of the Gospel. Such incidents are common to all dispensations. Hence my sixth argument in proof, that Gehenna in the lips of Jesus, did not mean temporal punishment when he spoke of an after death destruction of body and soul in hell, or of the disobedient being cast into hell, the everlasting fire—remains in all its strength.

6. In paragraph 8th you say that, by my own showing, Matth. v: 22, "Gehenna fire is threatened by Jesus as a temporal punishment as a sanction of the Gospel." You refer to my note on Matt. v: 22. This is not fact. I never said so. In that note I only say that "Jesus alluded" to this and other punishments to convey certain instructions to his disciples. I appeal to the whole note taken together. Will you lay it before your readers?

7. I will only add another sample. Our readers must examine for themselves. In paragraph 12 you say I am "at last reluctantly compelled" (by your gigantic force, I presume,) "to allow that the precise sense of these words is to be gathered from the connexion in which they are found." This is an unequivocal misrepresentation. All my regular readers know that many years since, and again and again, I have published this as one of the cardinal rules of interpretation of all words.

8. Before I call up the grand concession in your epistle, I will notice two or three minor points.—You assert, paragraph 9, that the "everlasting destruction" mentioned in one of my quotations, 2 Thess. i: 9, was a "temporal destruction long since executed on the transgressors mentioned." This is no assumption, nor assertion; but a good logical argument!! I call this a minor point; but not the argument which I shall yet, all things concurring, draw from it. Before you, Sir, will prove that "the everlasting destruction" here spoken of is past, the English language will cease to be spoken—grammar, logic, history, and the Bible will have disappeared among men—and Atheism will have gained the ascendant.

9. The doctrine of antithesis is also assailed in the same paragraph. My doctrine of antithesis is that of the schools. It is this: "The words on both sides of an antithesis are taken in the same extent of meaning." And my argument from it is, that as Gehenna or Hell, is by the Saviour placed in antithesis with eternal life; and everlasting punishment placed in antithesis with everlasting life, the words hell and everlasting life represent two states equally endless; or, if you please, that the word everlasting is of equal extent of meaning on both sides of the antithesis. Matt. xxv: 46.—These shall go away into everlasting life, and these into everlasting punishment.

10. Instead of examining the doctrine of antithesis, or of exposing any misapplication of it in this case, you are pleased with the assertion, "It would send David and Jonah both to an endless hell and endless heaven." Astonishing logic!—In what antithesis are these two persons, or these two hells, found in the Bible? Again you assert, "It would make corruptible crowns endless! It would make virtue and vice equal in duration, because opposed in character!" There is not a freshman pupil in any school could speak more unintelligently than you have here done. Is it a fact that you do not comprehend the doctrine of antithesis? Or do you feign ignorance, and speak thus foolishly for effect? Produce an antithesis, and exemplify your objections if you can. You can not. I will offer to your consideration some two or three, on which Universalists in former times often spoke with rapture as fine antitheses, but without understanding the passages:—

11. "By the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of One, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." I ask, is not the "all men" on the one side of the same extent with the "all men" on the other side?

Again—"For as by one man's disobedience the many were made sinners, so by the obedience of One, the many shall be made righteous."

Again—"by a man came death; by a man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in (or by) Adam all die; even so in (or by) Christ shall all be made alive." The question is not now about the meaning of these passages; but whether the terms in antithesis are taken in the same extent of interpretation? For you have opposed the doctrine of antithesis, and it is for the doctrine I now contend. "These shall go away into aioonion punishment, and the righteous into aioonion or everlasting life." This I call an antithesis. Or, "it is better to enter into life with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into gehenna, or the everlasting fire." These antithesis I contend are perfect; and the terms must be of equal extent on both sides.

12. Your letter now under consideration leaves my last standing erect in unbroken strength. I strongly suspected it was invulnerable on your part. I am now confident of it. On the words in dispute, I will henceforth regard it as a final settlement of the whole question. I boast not of my reasoning in the matter; but of the strength of the facts and documents therein displayed and arranged, and of the evidence and weight of the inference deduced and submitted to you and my readers. Your conclusions and treatment of it now authorize me to say, that I do most candidly and sincerely believe it to be, by yourself or any other Universalist, wholly unanswerable. If you reply that you do not think so, the sequel will show that you have acted so. I shall attempt to make this matter clearly apparent.

13. After a very feeble and erroneous critique upon aioon, you prepare for the avowal. You make aei the adverb, the root, and the participle oon the adjunct. This no scholar can admit; for being the participle from the verb, I am, is itself the root of eternity, as I AM is the name of Him that inhabiteth eternity. The word oon, without any adjunct, adverb or adjective, means without beginning or end; so that aei prefixed only makes a substantive of simple duration without regard to person or thing. It is the participle of the substantive verb which indicates absolute existence; I say, after a powerless attempt to annihilate the significance of the only word in the Greek language that in both its parts, always, and being, represents endless duration, you make the grand concession that YOUR THEOLOGY IS YOUR PHILOLOGY; or, in other words, you practically, and in fact declare, that your own conceptions of what is becoming, is the sovereign arbiter and interpreter of Scripture language!!

14. My last epistle has, it seems, abundantly satisfied you on the words of my second proposition. You have at last got Hebrew and Greek references and criticisms to satiety. You unequivocally tell me that were I "to find aioon, aioonios, and olem, 6000 times in their various forms and flexions in the Old Testament and the New, and out of that number 5900 times applied to God and his perfections," (and I suppose to the happiness of the saints also;) "yet if in the other hundred they were applied to a variety of things of short duration, and which from their nature could not be endless, I would not have gained one step towards establishing endless punishment from the force of them; UNLESS I PROVED BY SOMETHING ELSE THAT PUNISHMENT MUST BE ENDLESS."—So endeth the second proposition.

15. Mark it well. I have virtually—nay, I have almost in the same ratios, done what you have said; and you tell me it avails nothing, for I must prove eternal punishment by something else than by the meaning of these words. This consummates all that I said from the beginning. Yet this concession reflects no great honor on your wisdom and sincerity in constraining a controversy about words which you now say if they were found 59 times to mean endless duration for once any thing else, you would not, on such a demonstration, admit there was any thing gained, unless I could prove the point from some other source of reasoning than the words of inspiration. Why, then, did you not tell us this at first, and save so much labor!—?

16. I can not, however, but congratulate myself, even now in the midst of all the toils you have heaped upon me, and of all the hard things you have said to me, that I have so soon got through with the drudgery of proving my second proposition. I did not, indeed, flatter myself that at so early a period I could extort from you so full a concession in fact. I never did, in any of my discussions, promise myself the pleasure of converting my opponent, infidel or professor, or of even constraining him to admit that I proved a single position; and less, an advocate of a doctrine so palatable to sinners as that of Universalism; and still less in the case of an opponent so bold and reckless as yourself. I can not but regard it as a singular proof of what I before said of the peculiar impotency of the cause you plead, and of the little honor I could promise myself from the fullest refutation of it.

17. I conjectured, indeed, that all this was in your heart from the beginning: for I imagined that your objection to eternal punishment arose not from the lack of evidence in the words gehenna, olem, or aioonios, etc., but from its supposed incongruity with, or contradiction of, your a priori theory of the nature of sin, the divine benevolence, or the good of the universe. In some cases I have reason to think opposition to this tremendous consequence of sin, arises from heart-burnings against the notion of punishment. Some of this class having turned Universalists, have been known, on finding its foundations giving way, to turn skeptics, and even to become like Abner Kneeland, antitheists, atheists, or pantheists.

18. If you, Sir, with all your virtue, would stake fifty-nine to one, or fifty-nine hundred to one hundred on your theory against fact, or on your theology against philology, what shall we think of the daring efforts of less virtuous persons! You must know that the words God, Lord, heaven, salvation, life, death, etc., etc., are often, very often, used figuratively; and that there is not an adjective, I mean a compound adjective, one of the same construction, of such frequent occurrence in the Bible, more uniformly rendered by one word than aioonios; (your inapposite and uncompounded kalos and sophos fully proved what you sought to disprove by them;) yet you would risk 5900 to 100 for your opinion against fact!!!

19. The reason why you made this candid concession, nor the value and extent of it, I presume does not yet appear to all. That it may be understood in its cause and tendencies, I request our readers to reconsider paragraphs 10, 18, 19, 20, 23 and 25, of my last letter to you, and your notices of these paragraphs. He may then see the delusion, may I call it? of your species of Universalism. It admits that God is aioonios—that his perfections are aioonios—that his praise is aioon os—that the happiness of the righteous is aioonios—and that the punishment of the wicked is aioonios; yet that the four first are endless, and the latter momentary, though all expressed in Hebrew, Greek, and English, by the same word.

20. Why this inconsistency? I besought you, Sir, two or three times, not to slur this matter again; I laid it before you time after time, in its length and breadth, until in your 19th paragraph you make the grand avowal—you disclose the secret. The thing of endless punishment can not be proved to you by any rules of language or philology; for you say: 1. "It is useless"—2. "Absolutely pernicious"—3. "Dishonorable to God"—4. "Opposed to infinite benevolence"—5. "To mercy"—6. "To wisdom"—7. "To power"—8. "To justice"—9. "To the veracity of God"—10. "To the general voice of revelation." "Therefore," you say, "endless punishment can not be true." This is the triumph of theology over philology!

21. It is not yet in order for me to follow you into your philosophical ambush; but I have no doubt your philosophy will be found as superficial and as palpably at fault as your philology. I would not be surprised (mind I state it now) if when we get upon those points, you would flee again to the mountains of philology as affording more shade than the fertile plains of your philosophy. At present the matter stands thus:—Mr. Skinner thinks that everlasting punishment is useless, pernicious, dishonorable, unwise. unmerciful, unjust, etc., etc. Therefore, though everlasting, and eternal, and endless, were found in the Bible 5900 times in all their force, and one hundred times only in a part of it, he would balance; yes, overbalance the difference, and annihilate the force of these words by one single "I think."

22. Will it avail any thing with you, Sir, to reflect upon the ground assumed in this avowal. You have assumed that universal language possesses no word which could eternize a subject unless the subject be in its own nature eternal without it. You go so far as to allege that the word aioonios, when applied to God, could not by its own power or meaning, assure us of his eternity, unless we found other reasons in himself giving to it that meaning. So of the happiness of the righteous. Not finding these reasons in your philosophy of punishment, the word aioonios, or everlasting, prefixed to it, means momentary, or limited; just because you think it "useless, pernicious, unjust," etc., etc. In your philology all adjectives are cyphers. A cypher placed after 9 means 90; but placed before 1, it means 1-10th of a unit.

23. Again, as there is no special law passed in the commonwealth of letters in favor of aioonios, it must be by virtue of the common law of adjectives and epithets that it has no meaning of its own. This must be true of all adjectives. They all, on your theory of language, derive their meaning from the substantives with which they stand. In your new grammar, "A substantive is a word added to an adjective to express some quality belonging to it, or to give it a peculiar meaning." Thus happiness eternal, means endless; and punishment eternal, means momentary.

24. As you are safely moored, I will tell you where I may be found: Where I bade Mr. Montgomery adieu. All nouns and adjectives have a literal or common, and a figurative or less common meaning. Words that belong to the body, when applied to the mind are used figuratively; words that belong to the mind, when applied to the body must also be used only in a part of their signification; words that belong to things temporal, when applied to subjects in another state are used figuratively, in more or less than their common signification; and words that pertain to eternity or to another state of being, when applied to things in time or on earth, are used in less than their common signification. This universal and immutable law of language, not made for any special case, explains satisfactorily that when I say, 'He is an endless talker, an eternal trouble, an everlasting nuisance.' I use these words figuratively, and not in their proper signification.

25. You have said you believe in punishment after death, in another state of being, and have referred me to a document that I never saw. Will your co-editor please send me a copy of said future punishment? I am pleased to find, on your testimony, that you believe "in future post mortem punishment." I trust it is not in what some call absolute destruction—the everlasting punishment of a few of my acquaintance, who affect to think that Nero, Caligula, and Judas Iscariot will be doomed to the eternal destiny of a dove or a lamb! for surely if absolute destruction be everlasting punishment, the greatest wretch that ever lived and the most innocent lamb go into the same everlasting punishment.

26. I hope you have not found a Protestant Purgatory; though you speak a good deal like it—about punishment leading men to repentance, whose icy hearts the love of God could not melt: these, you believe with Bishop Purcell and the Pope, may be melted in the penal fires of Purgatory. I am anxious to learn your theory of future punishment. Excuse me for my unbelief. I think when it comes to be examined it will be found to be rather a lunar hoax.

27. Lastly, I am now ready to hear from you on the third proposition. Your grand avowal and concession, and your having introduced ten arguments philosophical and theological, will, I have no doubt, be fully satisfactory to our readers that enough is already said on that subject. Besides, I wish now to get at the naked question; for I think we have document enough on that solemn subject to satisfy every candid person under heaven. You can no doubt despatch your proposition about the apax legomenon, or the word that is found once in the Greek Testament, in one letter; though you can have five if you please. Meanwhile, I forewarn you that I will not, after your concessions, have much more of a logomachy. From words to things we must ascend.

Controversially yours, A. CAMPBELL.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PHILANTHROPY OF INFIDELITY.

BY REV. MOSES BALLOU.

"Voltaire, shut thy sweet voice; for thy task appointed thee seems finished. Sufficiently hast thou demonstrated this proposition, considerable or otherwise; that the Mythus of the Christian religion looks not in the eighteenth century as it did in the eighth. * * * * * But what next? Wilt thou help us to embody the divine spirit of that religion in a new Mythus, in a new vehicle and vesture, that our souls otherwise too like perishing, may live? What! thou hast no faculty of that kind? Only a torch for burning, no hammer for building? Take our thanks, then, and thyself away."

SARTOR RESARTUS.

That the subject of this article may be before the reader in such form that he will easily comprehend it, we shall proceed to inquire, 1st. As to the value of the Christian religion. The field we have opened is infinite, and we can explore it at present, to but a limited extent. The question rightly answered, what is the Christian religion? will show us somewhat its value and importance. To this end, let us view man as he would be without it—and then in the light Christianity beholds him. Without it, he is the mysterious production of—he knows not what. Ignorant alike of his origin and his destiny, he finds himself ushered into a world of wonders. The darkness of midnight broods over the source of his being. In vain he looks around him for a creator. He is afloat upon the current of a mighty stream which is bearing him onward with irresistable power, and if he ventures a query in regard to his destiny, the cold, damp grave gives him but its echo for an answer! He is certain of nothing, except, it may be, that every thing is uncertain, and thus tossed upon the sea of doubt, he feels that he is driven only as the fickle winds of chance may direct him. Want, destitution and despair weighs down his spirit.—Grovelling and degraded, he waits the bursting of the bubble which is to consign him to an everlasting slumber with his native elements. Such is man without Christianity. That is, if there is no truth in its promises, or foundation for its hopes.

On the other hand, view man in the light in which the Gospel beholds him, and he is metamorphosed in an instant. No longer the bantling of a mysterious fate, or a grovelling worm of the dust, he is a child of God—an heir of Heaven! Doubts vanish, for the light of eternal truth beams upon his soul. Tears fly, for God is with him. Destitution is gone, for he has the pledge from on high, of more than he can ask or even think. Trustful and confiding in storms and in sunshine, he feels secure as "The firm set earth on which he treads."

Clouds linger no more over the source of his being, and the boundless future is bright and radiant with the bow of promise. God is his Father! He, a beloved child—born to "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away"!

Thus it will be seen, that a belief in the Christian religion is of inestimable value to man—nor does it materially detract from its worth, if it be false, IF it be but firmly believed and cherished as sacred truth. True or false, a firm faith in it is of equal value to man in this world, and if its hopes do not end in fruition hereafter, the deprivation will be no source of misery as the creature will be wholly unconscious of it. Now what does infidelity propose to do? To take from us Christianity, with its life-giving faith and sustaining hopes. And what to give us in return? A situation more to be dreaded by the sensitive heart, than the nauseous drug of death. Such is the philanthropy of infidelity! Would its votary but furnish us with a comfortable substitute, the case would be far different. This he will not do. The man who takes from me my property without rendering me an equivalent therefor, is called a knave or a villian. What then shall be said of the man who will wrest from his fellows a treasure which gold can not purchase, and so far from granting an equivalent, asks their thanks for the nefarious robbery? May Heaven give him either a wiser head or a better heart! Fool—if he knows no better—villain, if he practices thus with a knowledge of the truth. God forbid, that we speak ill of the honest doubter, who strives not to undermine the faith of others. Such we pity—but for him who with wanton cruelty can rob the confiding believer of his trust in a happy immortality, we can not feel! "A torch for burning—no hammer for building." Willing to curse, but can not bless—"no faculty of that kind."—"Away," then, without "thanks" or favor!

Portsmouth, N H.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LOVE.

BY REV. C. S. HUSSEY.

"Hail, love divine! joys ever new,
While thy kind dictates we pursue,
Our souls delighted share,
Too high for sordid minds to know,
Who on themselves, alone, bestow
Their wishes and their care." BLACKLOCK.

I hold that that man who is actuated by pure Gospel love, is the possessor of more genuine happiness than any other individual on earth, let his circumstances be ever so pleasant. See him pursuing the kind dictates of love divine, in promoting the enjoyment of those with whom he is associated in life; for he feels that it is his duty to be the cause of as much happiness as possible.—See him consulting the interests of his family—see him doing good in his neighborhood—in one word, see him, in all his actions, endeavoring to imitate the bright and shining example of him who came on a mission of mercy from heaven.

Pure religion is manifested by acts of kindness; and no happiness can be more noble and exalted, than that which accompanies the practice of this religion; because the disposition which actuates him who does practice it, is the same, in kind, with that possessed by Him whose mercies are showered with impartiality upon all his children. It emanates from Heaven, and, exalting the human character, allies it to the one with which we are to be blessed hereafter.

Who denies that love is to be the immediate source of happiness in the future world—and who does not, from hence, feel convinced that the Christian is more or less happy, according to the amount of this divine love with which his heart is imbued here on earth? The disposition itself, is happifying to its possessor; and doing good, or enhancing the happiness of others, being its element, this happiness resulting from the possession of the disposition, is increased according to the amount of pleasure imparted to others. Hence, "a good heart wants some object to be kind to." And, as in this case it is emphatically "more blessed to give than to receive;" so, to maintain consistency, practice should speak our conviction of this momentous truth, in improving the surrounding opportunities of doing good. Base selfishness is out of the question; for the ever new and flourishing joys resulting from a Christian life and practice, are

"Too high for sordid minds to know,
Who on themselves, alone, bestow
Their wishes and their care."

South Lyndenboro', Mass.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SCRAPS AND SKETCHES.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

BELIEF AND UNBELIEF.—It is a matter of fact, that the belief or unbelief of man, can not affect the truth or falsity of a thing. For instance, if Christ is the Saviour of all men, as he is declared to be, he is equally so, whether they believe it or not—the truth is not affected by their faith or infidelity. It is very absurd, indeed, to suppose, as many do, that Christ is not the Saviour of a person until he believes he is such. Were an individual to inquire of me, whether a certain man was upright and honest, and I should reply by saying—"why, yes, if you believe, he is—if you don't, he is a rogue"—I should be deemed very inconsistent, indeed; but I would not be more so than that individual, who should declare that Christ was not the Saviour of a person, until that person believed he was such.

EFFECTS OF FAITH AND INFIDELILY.—An individual by believing in the Messiah and his Gospel, rids himself of those miseries ever attendant upon doubting and unbelief—he is saved from those fears and tormenting apprehensions which slumber in the infidel bosom, and participates in those joy and delights that issue from the fountain of righteousness. On the other hand, the unbeliever gropes his way through darkness—a slave to gloomy doubts and fearful forebodings—without a Saviour to love, or a religion that will impart to him consolation, and ease the throbbings of a bruised spirit. This is the damnation pronounced against the faithless one. Man experiences it here—and Christ said, "He that believeth not is condemned already—and this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil."

CHRIST.—Christ made his entrance into this state of being, amidst the songs of angels, and the acclamations of the hosts of heaven. But even the days of his infancy were perilous.—His youthful pathway was beset with danger; and when he entered upon his "Father's business"—when he forsook father and mother, to enter upon the "ministry of reconciliation"—then he was obliged to encounter the world's scorn and the world's contempt. Angels might have cheered him onward from their habitations on high, and the songs of cherubim and seraphim been ever lingering around him—but from men he received nothing but scoffs and persecutions.

The prophet Isaiah speaks eloquently and truly, respecting the treatment the Saviour should receive from a wayward and an ungrateful world. With the keen piercings of prophetic vision, he saw the sufferings and humiliation of the Messiah. By that power with which he was invested by the Most High, he drew aside the veil cast over the future, and beheld the scorn, and the contempt, and the persecutions that were heaped upon the Son of God! And what does he say? "He is despised and rejected of men—a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and we hid as it were our faces from him—he was despised and we esteemed him not."

Christ was endowed with knowledge and wisdom from on high—he spoke as never man spoke—and the examples he has left behind, are of the most perfect and holy character—every way worthy the imitation of man—every way worthy of being followed by angels. No personage has ever appeared on earth, in whom were combined so many virtues—so much perfection, and so much holiness!

For the Magazine and Advocate

CHANGE.

By the wisdom of the Creator, such is the constitution of animal and vegetable existences, that they are destined to change and decay. To the man of reflection, the contemplation of this change presents a theme fraught with interest, and, at the same time, tinctured with gloom. He beholds the most splendid monuments of the Creator's skill with sensations of grateful admiration, and then turns and beholds them decay, and commingle with the dust, with melancholy emotions.—He looks with the greatest pleasure upon the flower that blooms in Summer fragrance, but as he considers its decay, he is reminded of the destiny that awaits him; and feelings of a different cast arise. The verdure clothes the valley for a season, and we admire its beauty; but it soon withers beneath the frosts of Autumn. The oak springs from the acorn, grows, matures, decays.

Here, then, we behold a change in vegetable existence, and when our attention is directed to the animal world, even to man, the most exalted of the Creator's works, change is no less perceptible. To-day he may bask in the sunshine of prosperity—to-morrow the storms of adversity surround him. To-day, peace spreads its banquet for its happy recipient—to-morrow, he drinks the bitter dregs of misery's cup. To-day, the youthful maiden blooms in beauty—to-morrow, her remains are deposited in the tomb. To-day the rose of youth flushes the cheek—to-morrow, it is superseded by the silver locks and wrinkled brow of age.

The proudest memorials of human ingenuity, glory and greatness, are scathed by the "blighting hand of decay." The Coliseum, which reared its stupendous walls, and within which, the brutality of barbarism, for ages received additional impetus from inhuman contests, has been shattered, and the proud city which it ornamented has experienced a change and is now one mass of degradation. The massive walls of Babylon, whose magnitude confounded the beholder and made him mute with admiration, have been touched by the withering finger of decay, and have tottered from their base. The hundred gates that afforded security to Thebes, have mingled with the dust, and she now remains an emblem of the change incident to earthly things. J. M. E.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ANOTHER CONVERSION—FROM UNIVERSALISM.

We would congratulate the Universalist public, by announcing, that the Rev. E. D. Kennicott, formerly holding a letter of fellowship as a preacher of our order, which was surrendered to, and accepted by the Genesee Association at its last session, on account of delinquency in his ministerial duties, has recently connected himself with the Episcopalian church in Lockport. He now ministers to the people of Royalton, by reading sermons and prayers, according to the form of the church of which he is now a member. Will the Partialist journals copy the above, from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the Rocky Mountains, as another proof of the rapid declension of Universalism? C. HAMMOND.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1838.

MATTHEW XII: 1-8.

Upon this and some of the parallel passages, we find a great many observations relative to the authority and proper sanctification of the Sabbath. As this subject has been lately discussed by the Editor of this paper and some of his correspondents, we shall briefly state some remarks which we think illustrative of those Scriptures which have reference to this subject.

So far as our information goes, the Sabbath was very unfortunate in its advocates for a punctilious observance, in the days of our Saviour. The men who challenge Jesus for non-observance of the Sabbath, are the spies of the Pharisaic sect, who with murder in their hearts were watching how they might destroy him. These sticklers for Sabbath sanctification, followed Jesus not to hear and be benefited by the gracious words which fell from his lips, but pursued him for opportunities of finding fault and of making out an accusation that might deprive him of his life. For this reason we say the Sabbath has had most unpropitious advocates. Verily there be those who strain at a gnat, and nevertheless can swallow a camel!

A fool is frequently best answered according to his folly. Is it not thus that these sanctimonious hypocrites and sticklers are answered, when Jesus asks if they who were so wondrously well acquainted with their sacred law, had not forgotten a circumstance or two? He places his objectors between the two horns of a dilemma, thus:—The law, ye say, must not be broken—and yet David, the man after God's own heart, broke it upon a certain occasion. What say ye to this? may the law sometimes be set aside, or did David do wrong? They durst not allow either consequence—and yet they had but their choice of these dangerous admissions. Again, the law must not be broken—but their priests, in the necessary services of the temple, were obliged to do work forbidden by the law, such as making up fires, killing the animals for sacrifice, slaying and dressing them. Either, then, the law might in some cases be set aside, or the priests were not blameless.—Of these difficulties, Jesus left them the choice. He knew they dared not condemn the conduct of David or of their priests. The inference which must have been forced upon them, then, however unwilling they might be to admit it, was, that the law might be dispensed with, and its obligations set aside, in certain circumstances. After forcing upon them this admission, Jesus insinuates that there is going on amongst them, at the present time, a work of much more consequence than the regular maintenance of the temple service. To his hearers our Saviour leaves the application of this hint, according to his usual manner of not furnishing eyes to those who had eyes already if they chose to make use of them—of scattering good seed and leaving the result to the intelligence and disposition with which it might be received.

Upon another occasion, we find Jesus employing a similar method in the management of the prejudices of the Pharisees in regard to the observance of the Sabbath—and, if not out of their own mouths, yet out of the response of their own consciences, condemning them. As Jesus was upon the point of performing a cure upon the Sabbath day, the Pharisees interposed with the question—"Is it lawful to cure on Sabbath days?"—as usual our Wise Teacher gave no direct answer, but, in reply, inquired if they would not, or did not, in the case of an animal falling into a ditch, assist in delivering it from its dangerous situation. If common sense dictated this deviation from what to them appeared the strict letter of the law, how is it, he meant to say, that ye can not see and admit the inevitable conclusion, that, in all cases, it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath? No wonder they were silenced by this interrogatory, and appeal to their own conduct and common sense! And no wonder if impartial observers did rejoice at his triumph, and at the confusion of his adversaries, as related by Luke, xiii: 17.

It will be observed by the intelligent reader of those passages in which our Saviour speaks of the Sabbath, that he never went so far as to say that this institution might with propriety be abrogated, or that soon it would be so. This would have been virtually putting his life into the hands of his lynx-eyed enemies, who would not have failed to have made it the legal foundation for accusing him of a capital crime. This power the Sanhedrim possessed, and without a miracle, had Jesus thus 'despised Moses' law,' he must have died without mercy. As may be observed in those questions of his upon which we have commented, an approach is made to this conclusion. The priests set aside the law and yet were blameless; but no where does our wise Exemplar commit himself. For this reason, we readily reject, while we also wonder at an addition to the text of Luke, which we find in the famous Beza, who before the sixth verse of the sixth chapter of that beloved physician's narrative, inserts the following as part of the original:—The same day seeing a certain man at work on the Sabbath, he said unto him, O man, if thou knowest (approvest?) what thou dost, thou art happy; but if thou dost not know it, thou art cursed, and a transgressor of the law. We have said, we wonder at any commentator putting this speech into the mouth of Jesus, for it is obviously not parallel with any of his recorded observations, and seems to us to have been suggested by that passage in Paul's letters, where he saith—"One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike; let every one be fully satisfied (of the propriety of his conduct) in his own mind"—together with another in which he says—"He that doubteth (the lawfulness of what he is doing,) is condemned."

The envious, censorious, unkindly spirit from which these cavils proceeded, does not escape the indirect, yet severe rebuke of our Master. He sends his noisy professors of religion to one of their prophets, to learn that whatever proceeds from a principle of kindly and benevolent feeling, is much more acceptable in the sight of God, than any, or than all the acts of ceremonial or positive institution. Doubtless many, in our own day, who are tenacious for forms and ordinances, especially for such as support their own authority, would be remanded by the Great Prophet to the study of the same passage, or to that brief summary in which is contained "all the law and the prophets." If any man be self-righteous and censorious, how dwelleth the love of God in him! P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

EXTRACT

FROM AN UNPUBLISHED SERMON.

BY REV. J. W. BAILEY.

Do I hear any one inquiring—can there any good thing come out of this doctrine?—I say unto such, "come and see."

Go, ask the gray headed and decrepid, who is tottering over the grave. He has tried the riches of the world with a view of obtaining happiness, but has tried in vain. He has sought it in the path of ambition but has sought in vain. He has wandered in the ways of sin and wickedness, but it was not there. He has mingled in the company of friends and relatives, and there found a degree of pleasure, but it was not lasting. He must now leave them, with all the pleasures derivable from this transitory world, and go and see what is transpiring the other side of Jordan—he must pass to "that bourne, from whence no traveller returns." He wants a friend to guide him safely through the dark valley and shadow of death. He has viewed God as a cruel persecutor, delighting in the endless misery of his enemies—but in this did he find happiness? O, do not mock his feelings! He looks around him and beholds a company of numerous friends, and among the rest is his aged companion. His feelings have not become insensible to her welfare and happiness. But in his present belief, he feels that they must soon part, and that, too, forever. He has not the least assurance that she will join with him in shouting the song of redeeming love—for she has neglected to comply with the conditions necessary to meet her God in peace. Tell me not, that he feels resigned and happy. But what does he need? Is there nothing which will gladden his heart, and throw a cheering light on the future? Is there no balm in Gilead?—no Physician there? Yes, thank Heaven, we believe there is. Present to him the word of God. Impress his mind with the conviction that "God is good unto all and his tender mercies are over all his works"—that God "will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth," and happiness will beam upon his soul—"corroding doubts and gloomy fears" will be strangers to his mind—and the love of God will fill his soul with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

But what good can come out of this doctrine? Go, ask the mother, while tears are flowing plentifully down her furrowed cheeks, over the cold, pale corpse of her once lovely child. It lived to the age of moral accountability, and ere it had passed one day in this state, death summoned it to depart and be here no more. Now, where is the mother, who is so cold hearted—so negligent to the welfare of her own offspring—as to rejoice and feel happy, when impressed with the conviction that her child is in the burning lake—the groaning gulf—the land of horror and despair, where God will pour out upon it, his fierce indignation and wrath, forever and ever? Then, is there nothing good in that doctrine, which allays her sorrows, and wipes away her tears? Only let her be convinced, that the blood of the Lamb which was shed for the remission of sin, has washed from her child every stain of moral pollution, and fitted it for the company of the saints in heaven—and all other things combined will not afford her so great satisfaction and happiness.

But can there any good thing come out of this doctrine?—"come and see." The Gospel of the Son of God, as we understand it, is an antidote for every pain, sorrow and affliction, through which we are called to pass by the providences of Heaven. It points the weary voyager of life's stormy ocean, to the haven of eternal rest—to the bright Canaan beyond the billows—'where 'not a wave of trouble rolls across the peaceful breast." Its blessings have no bounds. The good which comes from this doctrine is incalculable. We might as well endeavor to number the sands on the sea shore, as to undertake to fully estimate the value of it. It is above all price—more precious than silver or gold.

Then cease your inquiry, and no longer let prejudice assume the reins of impartial judgment, and lead you to embrace a doctrine which clothes the immaculate Jehovah in robes of vengeance, stained with the blood of immortal souls, and which every philanthropic heart ardently prays may be false—but "come and see" the beauties of the redeeming grace of the God of Zion. Here you can feast your eyes and satisfy your souls.—Here you will find a friend—Jesus Christ, the never failing friend of sinners—

> "Whose own soft hand shall wipe the tears
> From every weeping eye;
> Then pains, and groans, and griefs and fears,
> And death itself, shall die."

Winchester, N H,

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CHARITY.

BY REV. S. BARDEN.

This is a principle which seems to form the base, on which rests the fabric of all pure and undefiled religion. It is but a derivative of love!—It is that principle, in which, when nourished and cultivated in the heart of man, all the purest and holiest affections of the soul, blend and concentrate. It inspires the heart with the most fervent love to God; and in clines it in good will towards man universally.

To be deeply imbued with this transcendent principle, prompts the possessor to recognize the faults of his fellow-beings with a palliating eye, and to render good as a recompense for received evil. He is forgiving, meek and forbearing, of long suffering, and endureth much. His bosom swells with sympathy while viewing the sufferings of others; his hand is ever open to satisfy or alleviate the wants of those, whom misfortune has reduced to poverty and distress. In that man, charity is the governing principle of all his actions; it incites those virtues that give him proximity to the moral image of his Maker. In fine, it emanates from God, and is coeval with that all-resplendent and preponderant attribute of his character—LOVE! Charity does not invariably manifest itself in large gifts, or donations, to some benevolent object; nor is it always the prime mover to the many large and pecuniary sacrifices which are made by the world. For these may only be external exhibitions, prompted by sinister motives, with self-agrandizement in view.

St. Paul says "though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." Then he immediately and forcibly explains the character of this heaven-born principle. "Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly; seeketh not her own; is not easily provoked; thinketh not evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things."—It is the main-spring of man's greatest happiness. Associating this principle with all his multifarious actions in life, and adopting it as his beacon light, to guide him onward in its changeful voyage, he ever realizes a clear and tranquil mind, yielding continually the richest treats of an approving conscience. He glides over the broad ocean of time, with nought to disturb or mar his sweet reflections. All before him seems hushed in placid serenity, while from the retrospect beams forth the radiant smiles of charity.

Marlborough, Mass.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DO WE SLANDER LESS THAN FORMERLY?

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SARCED SUBJECTS.

As a body, our denomination is undoubtedly—"our enemies themselves being judges"—less disposed than some with higher pretensions, to those malicious, injurious, and petty ebullitions to which we give the appellation of slander. This superiority over our brethren, we owe to our purer system of Christian belief, and to the larger portion of the genuine "spirit of Christ," which may be imbibed from our views of God's character. This superiority, truly an enviable one, we can retain and even increase, but only in one way—by meditating often upon the character and ways of our Father, who is "no respecter of persons," and who causeth his sun to shine, and his rain to descend upon the evil as upon the good—by drinking more and more deeply into the spirit of Jesus, the friend of publicans and heathens, that is, of the most desperate classes of society in his day—and, finally, by some considerable energy and perseverance in aiding these and cognate considerations to overcome our natural propensities and previous habits. Shall we not make an endeavor to maintain this character for a more than usual portion of "the milk of human kindness"—of candor and fairness—of superiority to low abuse, injurious slander, and similar manifestations of a persecuting and certainly a very un-Christ-like spirit? "Let us not soon be weary in well-doing; knowing that we shall reap if we relax not." Besides the satisfaction in our own bosoms, and the increase of good-will and good neighborhood around us, there will follow as one of the fruits of our unrelaxing labors, this—"men shall see our good works, and be induced to ascribe the glory, not unto us, but to our Father who is in heaven."

It will not hinder our progress, in this respect, if we should ask ourselves, at seasons not far distant, the question which we have employed as a caption to this article. Do we occupy less of our time, in company, in dwelling upon the faults and follies of our neighbors, than we did a year ago? Do we feel less disposed to blame our neighbors—less disposed to be told a tale of scandal—less disposed to circulate it? To such questions, if we can not answer in the affirmative, we may fear our faith is vain, or is dead—we may fear that we are not growing in grace and in the knowledge and similitude of our Lord Jesus Christ—and, alas for us, we may fear that we are deceiving ourselves, and that the love of God and our neighbor is not in us.

Will not every reader of this paper endeavor, that is, make an effort, not a faint and feeble one, but a determined and persevering effort, to be able to answer this question, to his own conscience, more satisfactorily next year? Without some labor, some effort, this can not be accomplished. Does our Father reward a continuance in well-doing so sparingly, that we will not make the effort? "Shame to the coward thought," by whomsoe'er indulged!"

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TIME.

Time, like a river in its passage to the place of destination, is always moving onward. The moments, days and years of youth, are apt to pass by unnoticed and unimproved. The fond dreams of gaiety and happiness, occupy their thoughts.—Fancy's golden wand paints the magic scene of future, uninterrupted pleasure. Unparallelled joys and unnumbered blessings, anticipation grasps after and seems almost to secure, when, alas! some unforseen occurrence blasts our fondest hopes.—Still, anticipation cheers us onward in pursuit of happiness, and it is not until the fairest portions of our lives have passed and shown us the instability of earthly pleasure, that we are sensible of our loss. We then turn our thoughts to seek more consoling and abiding felicity. Retrospection sighs with unavailing regret over the errors, follies and misimprovements of our past lives. Resolution then lays the plan of future usefulness and honor, consequently of permanent happiness, and although the incidents attendant upon human existence may sometimes mar this happiness, yet virtue's calm sunshine disperses the clouds of sorrow, and we again bask in the beams of peace.

J. M. E.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

THE CAUSE IN WESTERN NEW-YORK.

It has been the case, though not much of late, that the accounts of the progress of Universalism in some places, have been too exaggerated; consequently much has been expected, but little realized. The disappointment in these instances, has been great, and calculated to discourage some, and dampen the ardor of others.—If a society is destined to fall, it is better that its rise should not be known, than by reporting it, to produce an expectation which facts will not warrant.

I have observed, that in most of these cases, societies have had their origin in a peculiar way. They have not sprung up through an attachment to the principles of the Gospel, nor because they desired to cultivate a knowledge of religious truth, and contribute to its practice and prevalence in the world. True, they have a zeal, but it originates in the efforts of proselytism, so strenuously carried on by our opponents. Not knowing better how to manifest their disgust to popular dogmas, and their opposition to all revival schemes, they send for one of our preachers, knowing what our sentiments are on these subjects. A new society springs into being, but the seeds of the Gospel are not sown there. When the spell of a protracted meeting ceases, the society languishes; the audiences diminish, the pastor leaves, the story is told. Whether such a society will ever revive again, depends on whether another protracted meeting excites the community.

Opposition to other sects does not, nor can it constitute a Universalist, and therefore a society made up of such persons, can not advance the cause of Universalism.—Let this be understood, and let it be understood, too, that we are deceived, when called to preach, merely for the purpose of gratifying others in their hostility to other denominations. Being able in this way, to account for the "twice dead" condition of many societies in this State, something should be done, to avoid the evil in future. It is important, not only to the cause, but for the preacher's interest, that he should look well to this matter. The preacher feels that his efficiency is known only by the success of his labors. But what success can he expect to meet with, among those, who wait on his ministry, for the purpose merely of discountenancing fanaticism?

We shall never compromise with the mountebank operations of revivalists; but ever heartily oppose them; but this is only a very small portion of our work; the principles of the Gospel must be felt, adopted, and carried out, unless there is a disposition manifested for the reception of the Gospel, the chance of the preacher is small. Opposition to fanaticism never has, and never can permanently advance the cause of Universalism. Lamenting the evil to which we have thus alluded, let us endeavor to prevent its recurrence. G. S.

ROCHESTER.

As the most of my time will be occupied abroad, in settling up the business of the Herald, I have thought it best to resign the pastoral charge of the society in this city. It is absolutely necessary that my undivided attention should be given to the society, if I continued.—I am happy to say that Br. Tomlinson has accepted an invitation to succeed me. I am sanguine in my hopes of the success of the cause here. Let our brethren but persevere, and they will see this desolate city, bud and blossom as the rose. G. S.

Br. GROSH.—I am permitted by Br. Sanderson to write a line upon his paper—I wish you to say to the readers of the Advocate, that my residence during the Winter, will be in this place—therefore all letters and papers designed for me, should be directed to Rochester, Monroe county, N. Y., until further notice.

R. TOMLINSON.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1838.

UNIVERSALISM IN GERMANY.

PROFESSOR THOLUCK, AGAIN.—As we have many new readers, I may be excused for stating, briefly, that many years ago it began to be suspected by liberal Christians, and indignantly denied by our opposers, that Universalism was very prevalent among the so called orthodox in Germany. Mr. Dwight, who travelled extensively in the North of Germany, about 1825, stated in his journal that he found not one (or but one) believer in the doctrine of endless misery among the theologians of Germany, whom he represented as being at least a century in advance of all other nations, in Biblical literature. This was set down by our opposers to mean merely the rationalists, etc. Subsequently (in 1834), Professor Sears, of the Hamilton (Baptist) Theological Seminary, went to Germany to perfect himself in Biblical literature, and after several months residence there, wrote home a glowing account of the piety, zeal, learning, and successful labors of Professor Tholuck—one of the most eminent Biblical scholars in Germany, and of the so called orthodox party. In a subsequent letter Professor Sears gave an outline of Tholuck's views on the destiny of man, from which it appeared he was a believer in Universalism, though not without finding some difficulties (not insuperable, however,) in passages of Scripture apparently in favor of endless punishment. As a large number of our leading Partialists, of all denominations, dread, above all things, that their followers should know that any man of learning and piety holds such a sentiment, Mr. Sears was attacked and contradicted on several sides. Professor Sears must be mistaken—his imperfect knowledge of German and the Germans must have misled him, etc., etc. The Rev. B. Kurtz, of Baltimore, went so faras to declare it false, from an actual acquaintance with Tholuck and his opinions. Professor Sears abhorring the jesuitical policy of his brethren in endeavoring to conceal facts from the people, for fear of losing supporters of the dogma of endless wo, again came out, and sustained his allegations by quoting from private conversations with Tholuck, and controversies with him, on the very subject. He further stated that this conversation was held in English, and that he (Sears) then had a MS. lecture on the very subject, by Tholuck himself. Dwight's travels and testimony were referred to—other eminent theologians of Germany were named as holding the same sentiments—and, finally, a letter from Tholuck to Br. Sawyer, of New-York, was published—all going to prove, beyond a doubt, that there was no mistake in Professor Sears' statement.

Yet, most astonishing! Tracy, of the Boston Recorder, Kurtz, of the Baltimore Lutheran Observer, and some others, were hardy enough still to deny it, and to promise proof of the entire falsity of Professor Sears' assertions! Accordingly, a few months ago, Mr. Kurtz published what purported to be a translation of an extract of a letter from Tholuck, apparently denying that he was a Universalist; but so worded as to excite suspicion of foul play. The letter, with comments, may be found in our last year's volume, No. 40, page 317.—The other events here narrated, as well as some omitted for brevity, will be found in various previous volumes of this paper.

Well—Professor Sears has again come out in vindication of his former statement, and publishes testimony in confirmation of its truth, which, one would think, might shame the veriest Jesuit that ever told a lie or denied a truth for the love of God or the salvation of souls! He also reviews the seeming testimony arrayed against him, and conclusively shows, either, that it is not sufficient to invalidate his statement, or, that in fact it proves the very thing it is intended to disprove. Our limits will not permit a full statement, so I present the following compendium.

1. Professor Sears says, that during his residence of six months in close intimacy with Tholuck, he heard the subject discussed by Tholuck in English, Latin and German, and often discussed the subject with him, in the former language.

2. He heard Tholuck publicly express these very sentiments (Universalism,) in his lectures, and they are taught, substantially, every year, in the public lectures of the theological institution, in Halle, where Tholuck is professor.

3. Professor Balantine, who had been quoted against Mr. Sears, has published in the Southern Religious Telegraph, that the doctrine of the ultimate salvation of all men is very prevalent in Germany—indeed, that it is, very probably, universal in the class of so called Evangelicals to which Tholuck belongs. He adds—"Professor Tholuck says, that to be sure most of the Bible appears to assert an everlasting punishment of the wicked; and yet he can not but hope that this may be the result of a wrong interpretation of Scripture, and that it may yet prove true that all will be happy at last.—His hope is based on the love and wisdom of God.—And the Bible in two or three passages appears to hint at it, for instance, Romans xi: 36, 'For out of him, and through him, and into him (again), are all things.'" Again, speaking of Neander, a German theologian as eminent, (if not more so,) as Tholuck, Professor Balantine says—"It is plain that while these men hope and wish there may be a universal restoration, the doctrine is a necessary part of their system, and flows directly from their admitted maxims and modes of reasoning.—Their philosophic principle of unity would be altogether violated by the doctrine of eternal punishment. Either all are saved, or, as some suppose, the wicked are annihilated; for an eternal plurality of division (Zweyspalt) can not be endured."

4. Professor Stowe, of Lane Seminary, has written from Germany, saying that Tholuck denies that the pietists of Germany believe in the positive doctrine of universal restoration. Mr. Sears shows that the whole force here turns on the words positive doctrine. He always said Tholuck, Neander, and others had doubts, created by a few passages of Scripture, but not insuperable doubts—consequently they do not believe positively but probably that all will be saved. To use the language of Tholuck, when he views these passages in the light of the love of God, all his doubts vanish.

5. Mr. Oncken, missionary at Hamburg, says—"I was utterly astonished at the paragraph which appeared in the Lutheran Observer (by Mr. Kurtz). I have had a student with me since, who spoke of it as a well known fact, that Tholuck held to the error alluded to. As to the fact you have stated, it is too true. I have seen and conversed with ministers and students from various parts of the country, and, with only one exception, all held this error. In the South of Germany it is generally believed; in other parts where I have travelled, I have found it equally spread..... A man may as well deny his own existence, as to deny the existence of this dreadful error in this country."

6. Professor Sears takes a view of Tholuck's letter to Kurtz, similar to the one published in the last volume of this paper, No. 40. The sin against the Holy Ghost he calls merely an exegetical difficulty of Tholuck's.

7. He adduces the following synopsis of a lecture on the subject, written by Tholuck himself, and presented to Mr. Sears in 1834.

"Whether the doctrine of an apokatastasis,* Acts iii: 21, [restoration] is well founded, is a weighty question. If we examine the question in connexion with the analogy of faith, the doctrine of a final reception of all into the kingdom of Christ will appear incontrovertable. It is said (Rom. xi: 36, Heb. ii: 10, Col. i: 16,) that all things are created for God and for Christ as the ultimate object of the creation. Now if a single being is excluded, God does not gain his object in him.—Thus God will not appear as a Sovereign, ruling over evil. It may indeed be said, he is still sovereign Lord over evil, because this is made subservient to his designs; and he reaches his object, for those who do not become mirrors to reflect his tender love, must reflect his punitive justice. But he did not create them for this object. Even in Rom. ix; in v: 23, † of those who attain to glory, it is said they are "afore prepared" for it, which refers, evidently, to the afore mentioned decree to salvation. Compare Eph. i: 4, 5. It is not applied to those who are condemned. We find ourselves, therefore, compelled (genœthigt) ‡ to the conclusion, that as God on the morning of the creation exclaimed, 'behold all is good,' so also on the evening of the creation will he be able to exclaim over his creatures.

But how does the doctrine stand in relation to scriptural passages? The defenders of a Restoration have regarded 1 Cor. xv: 28, as the principal authority. Here it may, indeed, be said that the apostle in the whole connection, vs. 22–28, speaks only of the subjugation of the kingdom of evil to its last consequences within the church of the believers, as also in regard to the resurrection, he makes no mention of those who are not united with Christ. But the 22 verse, which has not been taken into the account, seems to lead to a different view. In like manner the passage from the Psalms in v. 25, applied in a similar way in Heb. x: 13, (compare Phil. ii: 11) leads to the inquiry: What kind of subjugation is that of these enemies? The current orthodox explanation is, "subjecting themselves with trembling and gnashing of teeth." Consequently the passage merely means that Christ will be acknowledged by his opponents, but not that their opposition will be turned into obedience. But against this view it is implied in Hebrews x: 13, that the subjection of the enemies is a consequence of the priestly influence of Christ, (compare v. 14); consequently that their hearts will be subdued, and they become believers. To this add furthermore, Rom. v: 18, where it is said that justification extends to all. If it be urged in reply, that this is to be taken potentially, the 19th verse disproves it, where instead of all, the many is used, but with the future tense. Thus the justification of all is declared as a fact.

To these passages other important ones stand in direct opposition—those which speak of eternal punishment. Matt. xxv; 41, 46; 1 Thess. v: 3; Jude 7—those which speak of the sin against the Holy Ghost, Matt, xii: 23—of Judas, Matt. xxvi: 24—Christ did not die for all, but for many, Matt, xxvi: 28, and xx: 28.

Therefore we must conclude as follows: the perfectly good, good in the Christian sense, will be eternally happy. The perfectly sinful, i. e. those who to eternity never receive Christ, will be eternally unhappy. But the question remains: Will any eternally reject Christ? If we consider the freedom of the will, and consider that it is the curse of sin to become more and more hardened, we can not deny the possibility (Mœglichkeit.) Although therefore God has an infinity of methods of affecting the sinner, as many as the sun has rays, Rom. xi: 32, 33, still men can always resist; and Matt. xii: 32, expressly declares that there will be those who will forever be unsusceptible of the Spirit and of forgiveness. Indeed, this passage more than any other may show *(durfte darthun) that some will be eternally hardened."

8. Lest this testimony by Tholuck himself should not be recent enough, Sears quotes from Tholuck's Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, published in 1836, the following comment on Heb. x: 13—being Tholuck's key to his comments on this subject throughout the New Testament.

"The doctrinal sense of this passage must be sought in 1 Cor. xv: 24–28, where the same sentiment is more fully expressed. Hitherto this passage (in Corinthians) has not been explained with sufficient care. Though I have often made it a subject of reflection, I have not yet been able to come to a final decision, especially as the conclusion stands connected with several other difficult passages, such as Phil. ii: 10. Nevertheless as this passage in Hebrews can best be explained by that in Corinthians, I can not avoid giving briefly, at least, my present views of the latter.—The expositors even down to the latest times, have not bestowed sufficient attention upon the question, whether the "subduing" is not one effected by "faith," and consequently the restoration of all who do not acknowledge Christ to that acknowledgment. The conclusion, "that God may be all in all" [men] clearly intimates this view. Gregory of Nyssen, the talented defender of a 'Restoration' speaks in an interesting manner on this point, in his excellent discourse on 1 Cor. xv: 28. For our purpose the following will suffice. The leading sentiment in vs. 24—28, is that the 'kingdom of Christ will one day come to an end. This however can not take place till all 'enemies' are subdued. Under these Paul includes, first evil spiritual powers; yet he does not limit it to persons, but extends it to unconscious powers, such as 'death.' In other words he would say; 'every thing which has thus far operated as a hindrance to the progress of the kingdom of God, evil both moral and natural, must in all its manifestations be abolished, before Christ shall surrender up the kingdom to the Father.' If this is the meaning of that passage in Corinthians, then we are to attach to this in the Hebrews the following sense. 'It is not yet manifest, that that exercise of the Redeemer's sacerdotal office has abolished sin with all its consequences; but Christ will not

*"The Restitution of all things." A. B. G.

†There is evidently an error in this reference—probably Rom. xi: and v: 21. A. B. G.

‡ Genoethigt—literally, necessitated. A. B. G.

* Durfte darthun—literally, dared to represent. A. B. G cease to be the Ruler of mankind till he has subdued all resisting powers.'"

Thus perish the deceitful workings of those who would, by any means whatever, keep the people ignorant of the fact, that universal salvation is believed by the most eminently pious and learned theologians of even the so called evangelical party, in Germany—that country which is so far ahead of all others in biblical literature! Mr. Sears has been most shamefully used by his less honest and less candid brethren. To crush his testimony, they have endeavored to crush the mind and reputation of the man! Shame on such an auto-de-fe in this land of freedom and protestant Christianity! Mr. Kurtz has travelled in Germany—knows Tholuck and other eminent theologians—and can not but know that Mr. Sears was correct—yet he unblushingly denied his statements! Mr. Stowe, of Lane Seminary, must have known that the introduction of the word "positive," in his denial of Sears' statements, would be overlooked by the multitude, and thus, with the connexion, lead to the belief that Mr. Sears was a ——— what? Yet he sent it forth to the world as a counter statement, knowing that in reality it was not a denial of Sears' statement! Well may Professor Sears say—"I confess my heart is disgusted with hearing so much about 'due caution,' when I perceive that the degree of it which is demanded, would be concealment, if not DECEPTION. I am no Jesuit." What have Kurtz and Stowe done but proved themselves deceivers—insinuators that the truth was falsehood—the true witness a liar? And even Tholuck, by some cunning workings of Mr. Kurtz's, undoubtedly, has been led to so say the truth, (or what he supposed to be truth,) that it should lead his readers to believe a falsehood! Examine his letter to Kurtz, and remember that Tholuck is a Universalist, and how will you, how can you reconcile that letter with strict honesty—with unbending, unconcealing, unequivocating veracity? Are not, then, such men as Kurtz and Stowe perfect Jesuits—deceiving the people for the love of God and the salvation of souls—doing evil that good may come of it—and whose damnation, therefore, is just? God save Universalists from such exclusive "piety"—such "evangelical" and "orthodox" practices, and let us remain Universalists in faith and practice—in verity and honesty, forever and ever! Amen. A. B. G.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

The poetry on our last page, was necessarily abridged to accommodate it to the very limited room we have for poetic articles—especially while obituary notices are so numerous. It is said that the notice of Miss Haskell's decease was twice sent to us, and that we neglected it both times. It is possible, though I can not remember ever seeing it; but one thing I am certain of, namely, that the negiect was not intentional. We take as much pains as possible to collect these and other small notices out of the several hundreds of letters received every week at this season, and I carefully copy them on a sheet by themselves for the compositor—no small task amid my other labors—and I feel sufficiently grieved at having overlooked any, without having it supposed that the omission was intentional. I do think a little reflection, added to a little charity, might save me this additional mortification.

Br. Sias has my thanks for naming a recent case, in which (he says) an obituary notice was sent us, and not inserted. In reply I state the fact, that I have received no letter from Br. E. A. Garfield since his reply to Brs Rayner and Browne, and that no such notice was contained in that letter. Of course, I must be freed from all blame in this latter case, whatever may be the facts in the other case.

One more word on this subject. I have frequently entreated that brevity be observed in these notices—I have often taken the liberty to condense them, at the risk of displeasing those concerned—yet, notwithstanding, considerable complaint is made that so much room in the paper is occupied by them. I know well, by bitter experience, that it is impossible to please all parties; but certainly, the writers of such notices might lessen my responsibilities a little, by studying brevity, and thus enable me to approximate somewhat towards this "consummation, so devoutly to be wished for" by an Editor. If they will not, I must e'en do the best I can, and beg on for a little charity in readers and correspondents. A. B. G.

A MISUNDERSTANDING CORRECTED.

The readers of No. 36 of the last volume, saw my tart notice of what I supposed to be a tart notice in the Herald, by Br. Hammond, touching the non-appearance in our columns, of the minutes of an Association at the West. Br. Hammond promptly disavowed (by letter to me) any intention to be tart in his notice in the Herald; and stated further, that that notice had been sent for publication some weeks before he sent his private note to me, (for which I returned him thanks in No. 35,) but its publication was so long delayed, that he no longer looked for its appearance. As it was the publication of a notice, immediately after he privately notified me, that I considered supererogatory—this explanation removed all difficulty from my mind. And his disavowal of any intention to be severe, was sufficient on that score. It only remains for me to add, that this notice of my mistake, and explanation of the whole matter, should hav been published last Fall. I wrote an article, supposed it had been inserted at the time, and only discovered that (by some means unknown,) the correction had not been made public, on receiving a note from Br. Hammond a few days ago. I sincerely regret the delay of this explanation, as the delay of an act of justice I owed to my own feelings on the subject— more especially if any of our readers at that time, should remember my remarks to the disadvantage of Br. Hammond.

A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

ORDINATIONS.—In noticing the ordination of Br. A. G. Clark, at Oxford, on December 28th, the name of the preacher of the ordination sermon was left blank, in consequence of inability to find the memorandum, without delaying the press—a thing not to be thought of at this season. The sermon was preached by Br. Doolittle—Brs. Goodrich, Sherburne, T. J. Smith, and the candidate took part in the services. Br. Edward Brown was ordained in Moretown, Vt., on January 18th. Sermon by Br. S. C. Loveland—charge, etc., Br. J. E. Palmer. The meeting was an interesting one.

INSTALLATIONS.—Br. J. H. Gihon was to have been installed as pastor of the society in Hightstown, N. J., on Wednesday, February 7th. Sermon by Br. A. C. Thomas.

REMOVALS.—Br. Tomlinson (see Herald department) has settled in Rochester, to supply Br. Sanderson's resignation there. Br. J. A. Gurley, of Methuen, Mass., has purchased the Sentinel and Star in the West from Br. Tizzard, and removes to Cincinnati, Ohio, to conduct it in person, and supply calls for preaching in that vicinity. Br. Gurley is an able, valuable young man—capable and willing to do much good as an Editor and a preacher. Br. J. H. Willis, of Danvers Mills, has consented to settle in Petersham, Mass., in March next. Br. A. Williams, late of Woodville, Jefferson county, has become the pastor of the society in Hamilton, and desires all letters, etc., directed to Poolville, Madison county.—☞ Br. W. is an agent for this paper.

NEW SOCIETY.—The Universalists in Stoddard, N. H., have formed themselves into a society. A second society has been formed in Reading, Mass. A society of forty members has lately been formed in Dixfield, Maine.

MEETING-HOUSES.—The second Universalist society in Lowell, Mass., has purchased a site on which to erect a house of worship. The brethren in Andover, Mass., (the place of the great Theological Seminary and Professor Stuart,) have commenced to build, and will probably finish their house by July next. The brethren in Stoddard, N. H., have agreed to build a brick meeting house, containing 56 pews, 48 of which are already subscribed for.

DEDICATIONS.—The house at Weare Centre, N. H., was dedicated January 11th. Sermon by Br. A. L. Balch—Brs. Whittaker and Bartlett taking part in the services. The house in Guildford, Vt., was dedicated December 10th. Sermon by Br. Woodhouse—Brs. Hewes, H. F. Ballou, S. Clark and Bugbee taking part in the services. The two last named also preached in the afternoon and evening. The house is 45 by 55 feet—contains 55 pews, besides a gallery over the entry.

APOLOGY.

Illness of some of my family, with attendant cares and loss of rest, must be my apology for any deficiencies in this paper—the omission of some obituary and hymenial notices, for instance. The sick are recovering, again.

A. B. G.

EASTERN MONEY.—We are now compelled to pay from 5 to 8 per cent discount on Eastern money. Those who can, without too much inconvenience, send us this State money, will please do so; for we can not afford to lose this discount at the low price of our paper.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. GUILD in Roxbury, at 11, A. M.—Br. SIAS at Tug Hill—Br. WAGGONER will deliver a Temperance lecture at Cold Brook in the evening, and preach on Monday evening following at Prospect village.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. GUILD in Walton, at half past 10, A. M.

Br. E. E. GUILD, will preach on the evenings of February 17th, at Roxbury, as Br. Follet may appoint—23d, at the school-house near Hiram Goodrich's in Hampden—28th, at the school-house in Combs' settlement in Hampden.

Br. SIAS will lecture on the evenings of February 16th, at Rodman—19th, at Champion village—20th, at Great Bend—21st, at Lockport—22d, at Martin's St. school-house—23d, at Adams village—27th, at Blanchard's Corners—28th, at Zuller's in Pamelia—March 1st, at Evan's Mills—2d, at the school-house, near Anthony's.

A GENERAL CONFERENCE of the western and southern counties of this State, will be held at Pavilion, Genesee county, commencing on Tuesday, February 27th, for the purpose of devising and carrying into operation means demanded by the situation of the cause.

G. SANDERSON.

N. B. It is confidently expected that all our ministering brethren in the southern and western counties will be present. G. S.

SINGULAR NOTICE.—The following singular notice was received by mail, and at first taken to be a hoax or a quiz. We are assured, however, that the writer was but lately a Sunday school Agent for the Congregational or Baptist churches in Otsego county, and is a moral man. For the sake of his latter, rather than his former qualification, we give it place.

North Brookfield, Madison county, N. Y., January 19, 1838.

Messrs A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson—Please insert the following notice in your paper for the subscriber, and oblige a stranger. WILLIAM S. HATCH.

"Prove all things, hold fast that which is good."

A General meeting of the Saints will be holden at Hamilton Centre, Madison county, N. Y., on the third Monday in March, 1838.

Some may inquire the object of the meeting? Reply 1st, come and see—2d, the body edifies itself in love—3d, it is not to unite the Saints, for they were never disunited.

Says one—"What is a Saint?" Well—that is the point. W. S. H.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Champion South Roads, for N R, W T, E P D, S, J D and J T—L C, Troy, (Mich)—E H P, Commerce, (Mich) for self, P B, E P, R W, C H S S and S A P—G K W, Atlas, (Ill) for D R, I B, J A, H M, B B and H I R—D C, Romulus, (Mich) for J C, O B, O B and W S—Rev G W M, Asburn, for I C, J P R, D R, L S, W H C, E L, A H, S B and W F—P M, Hamilton, for J M—C H, New-York—P M, Galway, for D S, L S and L B—D R A, South Shaftsbury, (Vt) for G R D, E B and A D—E B I, Riders, (Mich)—H S, Bellville, (Pa)—P M, Clear Creek, for T S and S H—P M, Zoar, for B M and A M B—J B, Cortlandville, for self, F E, R M, and C P—D M, Magnolia, (Ill) for L G, G W P, E H, J G, J S R, P W and A H—S J, Adams, for self, T C C, A B and A T—P M, Dayton, (O) for W R—J B P, Lyons, for self, S P and D J—D B, Oxford, for self, W W P, C A H, E P, C A B, R W B and C W—P M, Pavilion, for H C, C S and G M—P M, Bridport, (Vt) for Z M—P M, Chesterfown, for S H L—S H, Ashfield, (Mass)—P M, Washington, (Mich) for O D—H R N, Claremont, (N H)—M C, Salem—J M B, Indiantown, (Ill)—P M, West Bloomfield, for self, H S, J S, R Q and A S—Rev J A A. Leyden, for self and L M T—Rev P M, Watertown, for self and sundry subscribers—J P, Potsdam, for J B W, Z E, J S E, M L jr, J F and A S—J M C, Watertown—P M, Nelson, for C W, R S and D M.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY

Of Miss Martha L. Haskell, daughter of D. C. and L. Haskell, of Madrid, St. Lawrence county, who died January 18th, 1837, aged 19 years.

BY REV. F. J. BRIGGS.

Ye friends disconsolate, whose hearts are torn
With grief at her departure whom you mourn.
Whom death, that spares not, as his arrow sped,
Has lately number'd with the silent dead;
Permit a friend in sympathy to bear,
With you, the sorrow, and the grief to share—
To sympathise with you, the loss deplore.
Is all I can, although I would do more.

* * * *

To you the thought that Martha is no more—
That with her, now, all earthly scenes are o'er;
Her eye, which used to glow with joy and move,
Shall no more beam with tenderness and love
Upon her friends; her voice that sweetly sung
Is gone in death; and no more from her tongue
Will those sweet accents of affection flow
T' excite your pleasure or assuage your woe;
That you her presence can no longer share,
Feelings create that border on despair.
And yet these sad bereavements of our friends
Are not without their beneficial ends.
In times like these we feel more forcibly
That we are born for immortality:
'Tis then we feel the goodness of the Lord
In this instruction of his sacred Word,
That pain and death are temp'ral in their reign,
And though we die, yet we shall live again;
Although you mourn the loss, you'll not complain,
For this is but your Martha's greater gain.
No more with pain, with care, with woes opprest,
She rests where all the weary are at rest;
Her body lies beneath the green clad sod,
Her spirit rests in heaven with her God.
Would you recall it? no, the thought forbear,
And wait resigned till you shall join it there.
Virtuous, good, benevolent, and kind,
Cheerful and mild, in every gen'rous mind
Her memory will long embalmed remain,
Her many virtues they will long retain.
She by her faith, and by the life she led,
Still speaks to us, though silent with the dead:—
"Relations, friends, why do you weep or mourn
Because I have unto my rest been borne?
Death is a tribute we are bound to pay,
And you perhaps may soon be called away.
My presence, then, e'en had my life been spared,
You would have but a little longer shared.
Ye young or humble; busy, meek or proud;
Your fate like mine may be an early shroud;
Although your prospects show in brightest bloom,
You may ere long be hurried to the tomb.
With proper thoughts, then, regulate the mind,
That you, when called, may likewise be resigned;
Nor will this course in one respect destroy
What happiness you can in life enjoy;
It can not—no, it will prepare the mind
To taste those joys more stable and refined

* * * *

Peruse the Scriptures, there you will behold
Those richest treasures, that its truths unfold;
That precious promise which the Lord has given,
'All shall in Christ be blessed and raised to heaven
From deepest slumbers of the silent tomb,
In honor, glory and immortal bloom;
When God's own hand shall wipe away the tears
From off all faces, sorrow, grief and fears,
And death, and gloom, and pain, shall no more be,
But endless, perfect, sweet felicity.'
Obtain this faith, you'll find it in the Word—
The precious Gospel of our risen Lord;
This will support you in the dying hour,
For I have felt its firm supporting pow'r—
And as this world's receding from your view,
This faith will ope a vista to the new—
Through death's dark region send a lucid ray,
That brings to view an everlasting day,
When friends with friends shall meet, no more to part,
And endless joy be pour'd into each heart;
And all shall in eternal pleasures glow,
As from each heart exhaustless love shall flow.
Triumphing in this Gospel faith, you'll find
You leave the sorrows of the world behind,
For one where nought but peace and joy shall dwell,
And feel to say—'Inconstant world, farewell.'"

East Pierpont, October, 1837.

WOMAN.

The progress of society manifests itself more clearly in the developement and beauty of the female character, than in any other way. In a rude and uncivilized community, woman is a degraded creature; as it advances, she is the mark of its exaltation. It is not too much to say, that to the women of America we must look for the security of our institutions, and for our future greatness as a nation. Old things are rapidly passing away; old prejudices, old superstitions and old notions, involving the false relations of society. A new era has dawned on us, and woman is the morning-star in the return of the golden rising: she is the herald of a spiritual sun, whose beams are to search the darkened depths of humanity and reveal the great problem of our nature.—There is not one in a million who knows what man is, or the relation he bears in the interminable universe of being. The thoughts of the million are bowed down to earth, and are centred in themselves; they have no conception of the nature of love, and their emotions, which bear that name, give the lie to its philosophy. They do not understand—they can not comprehend—their intelligence has not expanded to that degree of recipiency, which drinks in the vast revelation of humanity, its end, its mighty destination, and the causes which have operated to produce its present state, and the causes which must energize for its consummation. They do not know that woman is the recipient of celestial love, and that man is dependant on her to perfect his character; that without her, philosophically and truly speaking, the brightness of his intelligence is but the coldness of a winter moon, whose beams can produce no fruit, whose light is cheerless and depressing. They do not know that woman is all affection, and they can not appreciate the comprehensiveness of the truth.

We have no disposition to flatter the sex: we would raise them above the humiliation of flattery. Adulation is not congenial with their better nature: and it is this we are desirous of unfolding. If they can only be made to understand their real character, they will feel and acknowledge the truth of this remark, that in proportion as they admit self-satisfaction from the praises of man, they are removed from his purest admiration. In this expression, we would not be understood as being the advocates of prudery, and of that false modesty which prides itself in the distance it holds from men. On the contrary, we would expose the narrow-minded views of that class of teachers indicated in the "Young Lady's Friend," who, by warning the sex against unthought-of improprieties, save no other end, but to suggest to them a wrong. Women ought to associate freely with men, according to the unwritten rules of decorum, which are stamped on the innocent heart. The precepts of prudery are steeped in the guilt of contamination. Truth, and the loveliness and delicacy of cherished affections, beautiful dreams of the ideal woman, gentle hopes and aspirations for the pure and perfect attainment of the angelic character, are enough for her guidance, without the transferred colourings of a stained sufferer.

Woman has heretofore occupied a false position in the world—an unnatural one. She has been so long regarded as a weak creature, an inefficient actress on the great stage of life, a mere puppet to fill up the drama of existence, that she has too often come to be of the same mind herself, and forgotten her high destination, in the frivolities of an hour. We have no patience with those persons, who treat her as a mere Rosa Matilda, who can be allured by a pretty compliment and satisfied by the gossamer of romance. Beset as she has been by the intellectual vulgar, the selfish, the designing and the false, no wonder she has sometimes folded her wings in despair, and forgotten her heavenly mission in the delirium of imagination. But this can not be always. There is a remnant of blessedness with her, in spite of evil influences; there is enough of the divine master left, though the portraiture is worn and blemished; and the time is fast approaching, when the picture of the true woman will shine from its frame of glory, to captivate, to win back and restore the objects of her mission.—Rufus Dawes.

MAY YOU DIE AMONG YOUR KINDRED.

It is a sad thing to feel that we must die away from our homes. Tell not the invalid who is yearning after his distant country, that the atmosphere around him is soft; that the gales are filled with balm, and the flowers are springing from the green earth;—he knows that the softest air to his heart would be the air which hangs over his native land; that more grateful than all the gales of the South, would breathe the low whispers of anxious affection; that the very icicles clinging to his own eaves, and the snow beating against his own windows, would be far more pleasant to his eyes, than the bloom and verdure which only more forcibly remind him how far he is from that one spot which is dearer to him than the world beside. He may, indeed, find estimable friends, who will do all in their power to promote his comfor and assuage his pains; but they can not supply the place of the long known and long loved; they can not read as in a book the mute language of his face, they have not learned to wait upon his habits, and anticipate his wants, and he has not learned to communicate, without hesitation, all his wishes, impressions, and thoughts, to them. He feels that he is a stranger; and a more desolate feeling than that could not visit his soul. How much is expressed by that form of oriential benediction, May you die among your kindred.—Greenwood.

DEATHS.

In Lockport, Jefferson county, January 10th, after a short illness, Mrs. Isabelle Butterfield, widow of the late Capt. Levi Butterfield, aged 66 years. Mrs. B. had arrived to a good old age in the enjoyment of the blessings of a bountiful Providence, and in the faith of God's unbounded grace. In this faith she left the world. A large family, many friends, and a numerous congregation assembled at her funeral solemnities on the 12th. Grace, mercy and peace be upon them all.

P. M.

In Fredonia, October 23d, Alexander, only son of Andrew and Ann Peterman, aged ten months and eight days. T. C. E.

While on a visit to her daughter, in Penn, Erie county, Pa., December 28th, Hannah Gott, widow of Dr. Nathaniel Gott, aged 71 years. The deceased was a firm believer in a world's salvation. She died of apoplexy.

N. B. P.

In Venice, January 15th, of consumption, Capt. David Fish, in the 78th year of his age. He was the son of Titus and Lucretia Fish, of Stonington, Conn.; from which place he removed to Albany county, N. Y., in the year 1794. After residing there 13 years, he emigrated to Venice, Cayuga county, where he continued to reside until called away to inhabit the celestial courts of everlasting glory. Br. Fish was a soldier for more than two years of the Revolution, and has been, during his whole life, respected as a patriot, neighbor and friend. He was a firm and consistent believer in "the restitution of all things," and he departed in the comforting faith of meeting a redeemed world in the realms of untarnished purity. Agreeably with his request, made the evening before his death, the writer attended his funeral on the 17th, where he delivered the consolations of the Gospel to the mourning relatives, and a very large concourse of sympathising friends and neighbors. H. Boughton.

In Scipio, January 9th, George, only son of Jacob and Doris Sharp, aged one year and nine months.—Thus has another bud been plucked from its parent stalk, to bloom forever in the sunny climes of incorruption and immortality. May God bless the mourners.

H. B.

In this town, (Perrysburg, Ohio,) on the evening of January 1st, Mary Ann Hollister, wife of Hon. John Hollister, aged 35 years. The deceased has been a resident of this place from its early settlement; and her name is particularly identified with the early recollections and associations of its inhabitants. Her loss will be deeply felt by her kindred, friends, and numerous acquaintance; and her memory will be cherished in their best affections, with the fondest remembrance.

It is a tribute of respect due the deceased, to say, that she was an affectionate and devoted companion, a tender and loving mother, an agreeable associate, an ornament to society, an humble and devout Christian, a confiding friend. She bore her sickness with patience and becoming fortitude; and when feeling that the hour of her departure had come, she extended her parting hand to her surviving husband, and bidding him an affectionate farewell, quietly fell asleep in death, in the hope of a glorious immortality. She is gone to the spirit land—the amiable, the virtuous, the beloved one is no more. Peace to her ashes—and may the blessings of heaven rest on the unhappy mourners, and surviving friends.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1838. NUMBER 7.

FUNERAL SERMON.

Delivered in Auburn, September 10th, 1837, at the funeral of Mrs. M. Underwood.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

[By request.]

"Humble yourselves, therefore, under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time; casting all your care upon him; for he careth for you." 1 PETER v: 6, 7.

Though all other things should become as changeable as the winds of heaven, yet there is one fact which is certain and unerring—that fact is, death will sweep from the broad stage of human life, every being who stands or will stand upon it. We may think that we have friends—those friends may become enemies. We may suppose ourselves rich—those riches may fly away. We may dream that our health is firmly founded—it may sink into the arms of disease. But that death will reach us, is as fixed as the revolution of the earth—there is no escape from its grasp.—The broad waters of time are surely flowing to the unfathomable ocean of eternity, and on their tide, human beings are irresistibly swept into that "bourne from whence no traveller returns." Think of it as we may, view it as we will, there is no flying from this fate. We must do battle with the monster, we must stand before his shaft, and by its blow, fall back to the dust from whence we came.

But while death is certain, it is also certain that its blow is not feeble. Its sting is deep; oftentimes heart-rending. At one time it nips the bud of infancy ere it blooms, and leaves the parent-stalk to mourn the withering of its hope. At another time, it plucks the full-blown rose of youth, and leaves some confiding heart to weep over its desolation. At another time, still, it rudely tears the marriage tie, consigns the wife and mother to the grave, and leaves the family painfully lamenting that the eye which looked and the tongue which spake affection, are sealed in death. Anguish and tears follow the footsteps of death, for humanity laments those which were but are not.

While, then, we are as feeble before death as the wild flower before the frosts of Autumn, who, in these circumstances, will care for us?—upon whom can we cast our care?—and who will wipe away our tears, by bidding our grief be still?—We may have firm, constant friends; we may have the diamonds of Golconda, the rubies of Peru, the gold of Brazil, and the silver of Potosi; we may have all the collected knowledge of philosophy—but when the creature is struggling in the arms of death, of what avail are all these then, though good in life? Can they cast one ray of light upon the tomb?—can they raise one clear hope of future life? They can only aid us in inquiring, as Job did before us, "if a man die, shall he live again?"

Under such circumstances, and with such facts before us, the instruction of the text is precious.—We can cast all our care upon God, for he careth for us, even in death; as the Psalmist said, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." God never forgets his children—his protecting care is always around them. How many touching instances of confidence, even under the most trying circumstances, has this fact produced. Job presents us a noble example of confidence in God.—Though his dwellings were destroyed, though his children were murdered, though his flocks were stolen, though his friends turned traitors to him, and his consolers aggravated his troubles, yet he never so far forgot the obligations he was under to his Creator, as to murmur at the dispensations of his providence. The noble man, great in his integrity, excellent in his feelings, and a Christian in conduct without living under the Gospel dispensation, exclaimed even in the midst of his sufferings, "though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." Thus did he give us an example in the little light which he possessed, which would shame us, did we fail to imitate it in the great knowledge which has been presented us. In view of death, he could only ask the question of doubt, "if a man die, shall he live again?" But we can positively declare, "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Though he discovered the power, wisdom, goodness and mercy of God in the wonderful works of nature, yet he was not possessed of that superior view of the divine character, which is given us in the riches of revelation and the fulfilment of all its glories; still, in a manner worthy of all imitation, when called upon by his wife to curse God and die, he exclaimed, "thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" Job ii: 10. And well might the historian add, "in all this Job did not sin with his lips."

But one greater than Job; more highly exalted, yet more thoroughly persecuted; more divinely blest, yet more cast down with suffering; has left us a still more brilliant example of confidence in the God of our Fathers. I mean him, who tasted death for every man, and freely yielded his life for the benefit of the world, and the blessing of its children. Amid all the bigotted persecutions with which he was surrounded; amid all the attempts to take his life; amid all the contempt which was hurled at him, without a place of his own where to lay his head—still, such was his unchanging confidence in the goodness of God, that he presented the world with the most affecting representations of his character, always teaching that "God is love." By the simple clothing which the lily possesses, our Saviour taught his apostles that God would not forget them—by the parable of the wandering prodigal, he taught the Jews that God loves his children, though they stray from the house of virtue and wander in sin and ignorance. And when his own concentrated sufferings approached, which were so great that he almost sunk under them when in the garden of Gethsemane, still he did not doubt the wisdom of God nor question the propriety of his actions. This is evident from his prayer—"Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee; take away this cup from me; nevertheless not what I will, but what thou wilt." Mark xiv: 36. The misery was so great, that he wished to avoid it, but his confidence in God led him to conclude, that if it was the will of his Father that he should suffer, it was his duty to do so. This confidence he retained to the end. And when he came to the cross, with death staring him in the face, he shrunk not nor murmured; but while he prayed to the Source of love, that his enemies might be forgiven their great sins, he also committed his own spirit into the hands of God, and yielded up his life; and then descended into Hades, to wait until the morn of the resurrection should usher him forth as the Prince of peace, the Saviour of the world, and the author and finisher of the Christian faith.

This instance is full of instruction, and imparts that confidence in God, without which the spirit is dark and the heart quails in despair. Oh, could all imitate Christ—could all take him for their exemplar—could the living walk in his steps—could the dying cast away fear and possess his confidence, death would be robbed of its sting and the grave of its victory—vice would be crushed and sin untouched. Even when time has pushed our bark along its river, suffering us not to tarry at the green spots we may discover, and we are about to bid adieu to those we leave behind us, before launching out upon the ocean of futurity, there is no cause for murmuring at the dispensations of Providence; but every reason why we should exclaim in all sincerity, "though he slay me, yet will I trust in him."

But one of the most important reasons why we should cast all our care upon God, is that "our Father who is in heaven," is love! This is one of the most soul-touching subjects that can be found in the pale of religious themes. The love of God, as it is displayed in the beauties of nature and the excellences of the Bible, can unlock the heart which has long been sealed by the power of sin, call forth its hidden sympathies and lead it, humble as a little child, to the mercy-seat of God. The soul, who will laugh the tempest and fire of unending misery to scorn, finds a talisman in the love of God, which, in spite of himself, will draw tears of repentance from him, and bind him to the service of religion.

There is one fact particularly worthy of notice concerning the love of God—it is this—the affection of God is represented to us in the Scriptures, by the love of the earthly parent. This representation is most beautiful, for who, that watches the love of the mother for her offspring, which is exhibited in all her hopes, all her desires and all her pleasure, does not feel an involuntary praise pouring from his heart to that illimitable ocean of wisdom, who not only tunes the harp of nature, but from his own divinity, lights the flame of affection upon the altar of the soul. Well may the love of God be presented by a comparison with the love of the earthly mother, for it is then placed before us in all its infinite majesty, requiring no unnecessary misery, no endless Gehenna with an omnipotent satan to mock, and furious fires to burn the children of mortality, the length of whose human existence, when compared with eternity, is but a bubble upon the ocean; but overrules evil for good, and consults the ultimate happiness of every creature.

Take the mother whose affection has been called forth by the instinctive fondness and budding innocency of her beauteous babe, and nothing can destroy her love. Her child may be in danger, and she may be cruelly told, that its life will be crushed unless she saves it by daring danger herself; but her love will destroy every fear, and though a solid column of flame should interpose between her and her child, she will forget that fire can burn her, and rush forward to redeem the object of her care. He may in the morning of life leave his mother, roam other climes, cross tempestuous seas and buffet the rude storms; still his mother's heart follows every footstep. If he is sick, she wishes to stand by his bed-side, to cool his fevered brow and present the medicine of health. If he is sinful and fallen into the syren grasp of fashionable iniquity, her love prompts measures for his reformation—if those measures succeed, and he hearkens to her voice, even if his hand has been red with blood, she will receive him. He may die, but death can not destroy her love. On the contrary, death will call forth its raging power, and its beauty will be seen even in the storm of grief. Her grief may calm from the torrent to the rivulet, and the cares of life may even crowd the image of her departed child from her mind, but when recollection becomes busy and memory performs its pilgrimage to the tomb of the beloved, her love will still burn bright as the evening star, and the gushing tears of affection will pay tribute to her regret, that she is separated from it. And as she can not have it back again, her desires will extend to the throne of Almighty God—her affections will there fasten upon her child, an immortal creature, in pure, unfading happiness, with whom she expects to be finally joined and mingle praises with a redeemed universe.

Such is the love of the mother—and it is a fitting emblem of the love of God. There is, to be sure, a vast difference in many respects between them. In God, love is infinite—in the creature, it is finite. In God, it is a boundless ocean—in the creature, it is a drop. In God, it is the sun whose influence penetrates the whole universe—in the creature, it is the feeble light of the glow-worm. In God, it is as pure as light—in the creature, it is mixed and debased by the passions and vices of human character. Still, it is the same in nature—and as we know that the stream can not be more pure than the fountain from which it emanated, so the affection which lights up the human soul, can not desire greater good for the objects of its care, than does the love of God for the objects of his care.

What, then, must be the result of the boundless love of God? Must it not aim at the final destruction of evil? And, even if it be necessary to punish, will not that punishment be intended to subdue and reform? Let the prophet in his peculiarly affecting language answer! "And in this mountain shall the Lord of Hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees; of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain, the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory: and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it." Isa. xxv: 6, 7, 8. This is the result which the love of God will produce. Reaching all creatures, its benign influence will not cease until every person shall be redeemed from the power of sin, and adopted into the glorious liberty of the children of God—until ignorance shall be annihilated—sin shall be finished—misery destroyed—death blotted from the book of fate—until happiness shall fill every heart, and every person, in humble penitence shall exclaim, "Our Father, who art in heaven."

Another glorious feature of the love of God, is its unchangeability. As God would not create an object for the purpose of hating it, and as he knows no revenge or cruelty—as God is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works—so do we feel assured that the love of God is unchangeable. He is of one mind and none can turn him. He is the same, yesterday, to-day and forever, "without variableness or shadow of turning."—Full evidence have we of this fact. The reflecting mind can perceive a number of instances in the progress of the world, which would have turned the current of divine love into the fire of hate, if God was actuated by the base passions which so frequently make war in the human heart. The Jews, in the midst of all their wanderings, rebellions and idolatries, still were governed by that parental hand which sought their reformation, even by the chastisements that were inflicted upon them for their manifold sins. And when the world was covered with the cumbrous night of sin and error—when the Pharisee performed his hypocritic mockeries and ceremonies in the sight of Heaven, and then called them religion—when the Sadducee plunged into the black waters of skepticism and taught the annihilation of mind—when the heathen altar smoked with the blood of victims, and the imaginary God was worshipped in the obscene practices and vain forms of pagan idolatry—even then the love of God operated with undimmed purity, and provided means for the destruction of these evils. "God so loved the world that he sent his only begotten Son" for its welfare and improvement. Oh! could it be aught but unchanging, infinite love, that devised the noble plan of salvation? And could it be aught but the same heavenly principle, which steeled the soul of Jesus against every difficulty, and sent him forth in all the majesty of Christian principles, to labor for the benefit of mankind, and then to yield his life for their consolation and instruction? Ah no!—And the same love which invested the works of God in the morning of creation, and whose constancy is exhibited in the continuation of the sun and all the bounties of nature, we feel assured will continue to blaze in its splendor, until it shall warm into perfection, every affection and power of the soul.

The love of God can not be alienated from his children. It is as unlimited as the nature of God and as unchanging as the beauty of the universe. We may indeed cease to love him. Sin may alienate us from our heavenly Father. Experience proves it too true. In profane ribaldry—in the withering, debasing hour of intemperance—in the absorbing love for millions—in the cant and hypocrisy of an outward religion—in the ungenerous practice of slander—we forget to love God—we forget his purity—we forget his requirements—and we too often forget, until utter ruin of mind, body and property pays the forfeit. The altar of sin receives too many vows, streams with too much health, and talent, and happiness, sacrificed to the practice of a deadly idolatry which clings like the cancer, continually throwing out new shoots of power to crush the moral life in its embrace. Iniquity rears her head in every community, too often unreproved and unchecked—and it is in her service that we forget to love our God.—But he will not cease to love us—his love can never be changed. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? (says Paul) shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us!" Rom. viii: 35-37. Though we may live upon the desert, still we are surrounded with the love of God—though death should touch our bone and our flesh, yet are we visited with the love of God—though we should groan in the dungeons of the inquisition or stand at the martyr's stake, yet God does still love us. Though we may be in ignorance, yet the love of our heavenly Father has provided the way for our deliverance—"I will bring the blind by a way that they know not; I will lead them in paths which they have not known; I will make darkness light before them and crooked things straight—these things will I do unto them, and not forsake them." Isa. xlii: 16. Though we may be in sin, and the heavy hand of just retribution may fall upon us, yet shall we eventually be led, humble and penitent, to the mercy-seat of God, for sin shall be finished and an everlasting righteousness shall be brought in. Ah, well might Paul exclaim, and be "persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Rom. viii: 38, 39.

Such, then, is the character of God, the Friend of all human beings, "our Father who art in heaven"—the source of all perfection, the height of justice, the majesty of virtue, the essence of all wisdom, the ocean of all power—while

> "Mercy is the central sun,
> Of all his glories joined in one."

How worthy is God of our praise! How worthy is he of our obedience, and how constantly we should show our gratitude to him in pure and humble lives! And above all, how confidently we should cast our care upon him, even though that care is induced by the death of those who are very dear to our hearts, since he careth for us with infinite love.

Another reason why we should cast all our care upon God, is, the gift of the Christian system.—Its doctrines are to the thirsty soul as the fruit of the tropics to the lips of the dying stranger; pointing us to joy on earth and peace in heaven. One prominent point which the apostles preached, was the resurrection of Christ crucified; the way, the life, the hope of immortality. And the evidence of this doctrine was set forth in the resurrection of Jesus; thus by a summary, convincing method, establishing what philosophy had in vain attempted to do. For, although philosophy might reach the skies with the hope of there reading the truth of immortality and endless existence of the mind among the everlasting stars; although it might pick up apparent evidence on the earth; yet solid matter checked its flight and pressed it to its human estate in doubt and despair—so that after all philosophers might do, people might hope and doubt, and at last perish in annihilation.

But by his death and resurrection, Christ demonstrated the truth of immortality. He burst the chains of death; the bright morning star of the resurrection, he is the Lord of life, the joy of the world, and the guide of man through the valley of death to the realms of immortal life, where the weary are at rest and the wicked cease from troubling. This resurrection shall separate the mind from its gross tenement, to be clothed with a glorious and a spiritual body; for according to St. Paul's account of the resurrection, "it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." 1 Cor. xv: 42, 43. 44. In view of such a glorious change, no wonder he exclaimed, "for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ." Verses, 53 to 56. Childless mother! whose heart has been torn and whose affections have been lacerated by the loss of your little ones, come hither and tell me, if the doctrine of the resurrection is not of the most consoling power! When you think of your departed, smiling babes, and the waters of anguish gather and threaten to drown your happiness, does not the blessed idea of again meeting them, hush your sorrows and refresh your broken spirits? Wifeless husband! whose partner has gone to the unseen world, let me ask you, what would bear you up under such trials, were it not that Christ has taught you the resurrection? And when you fondly dwell on the memory of the departed one, does it not whisper satisfaction to your soul, that you shall meet in the paradise of God?

But why ask these questions? None but the careless pass without realizing the greatness of the doctrine, for there is no sorrow too heavy for it to control. When all things fail to comfort the heart, when death with all its powers, is busy; immortality, like an angel of mercy, speaks comfort.—It gives joy in the house of mourning, and writes upon the tomb "the way to endless life." O, when I die, may God confirm my faith, and let me depart with the blessed hope of again meeting my friends in the presence of him whose smile is life.

Another noble trait of the system of the Saviour, is the reconciliation of the world; the best and most soul-cheering doctrine ever conceived in the councils of divine grace. Its proof is powerful. It blazes in the sun and blooms on the earth.—God promised it to the patriarchs; he has spoken it by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began; he sent Christ to accomplish it; and the apostles have preached it. God wills it; Christ wishes to perform it; all good men hope for it; Christians pray for it and man stands in need of it; and lastly, God is good to all, therefore he will save and bless them.

Is this doctrine doubted? Then I inquire; if it be not true, why are we presented with such soul-melting descriptions of the character of God, wherein he appears with all the divine affection of a parent, not to destroy the world, but to heal its moral maladies, and wash it clean in the waters of salvation? If it be not true, why did God send his Son to save the world, to die for it that it might see light, be released from sin and receive the truth?--a Son, whose patient life, spotless purity and unflinching perseverance in discharging his duties even to the death of the cross, has softened the hardest heart, and called forth the warmest tones of admiration from the gifted mind of the infidel Rosseau! If faith in universal salvation be not true, why did the all-powerful God, promise Abraham, that through Christ, the chosen seed, all the families, nations and kindreds of the earth shall be blessed? Why, in view of the final triumph of the Gospel, did he inspire the evangelical prophet to declare that every knee should bow, and every tongue should confess that in the Lord had they righteousness and strength? Why did God send the Redeemer, not to condemn the world, but to save it? And why were the apostles sent forth into a gainsaying world, to convince men that God was their friend and protector? Why is it declared that God wills the salvation of all men and their introduction into the knowledge of the truth, and that Christ gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time? Why does Paul labor to prove that the kingdom of the Redeemer shall finally be given up to God, that he may be all in all? Unless it be to prove, that he who believes in the Gospel, must believe in the final salvation of the world; that in God's own time, a grace shall rise on grace, a joy on joy, and a glory on glory, until sin and misery shall pass away like a forgotten thought, until knowledge, peace and gratitude shall overflow every heart, and until every tongue shall sing the song of truth "to him that sitteth upon the throne and to the Lamb forever."

It is not the least evidence of the truth of this doctrine, however, that it saves from fears of death. Here its powers are God-like; here the full influence of its kingdom is manifested. What majesty and sublimity there must be in a system, which raises the mind above fears of death, enabling it to triumph over the sting of the ghastly monster, and rejoice in hope of the resurrection. That the Restitution has this power, hundreds of instances might be adduced to prove. We would refer to a venerable Stephen, who cheerfully laid down his life in defence of the Gospel, praying God when his spirit was going home, not to charge the sin of his death to his murderers.

The case of Peter is very affecting. This venerable apostle knew that his death would be a violent one, for his Master had already informed him of it. In the conversation which passed between him and the Saviour, as recorded in John xxi: 18, 19, Christ remarked to him, "when thou wast young, thou girdest thyself, and walkest whither thou wouldst: but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not. This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God." History informs us that this prophecy was literally fulfilled. When Peter was old, he was carried to Rome; his hands were stretched in a yoke; another girded him with cords, and he was led through the city, to a place where he would not, and there crucified. And long before this took place he knew it would be his lot, for he avows this with Christian triumph, in his 2d Epistle, i: 14. "Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus has showed me." The case of Paul is also affecting. After a toilsome life readily spent in defence of the Gospel, he knew that his death was at hand and his doom pronounced. And so calmly did he view that event, that he wrote to Timothy, saying, "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." 2 Tim. iv: 6, 7.

To these cases, that of Sister Underwood may be added. Though a member in full standing of a Presbyterian church in Auburn, yet her faith was in the Restitution, that she should meet all her family in heaven. And so calmly did the affectionate wife and kind mother view death, that she exhibited no fear of the monster, but in triumph departed from the earth, inducing the prayer in the hearts of all who saw her, "let me die the death of the righteous."

With a system, then, which combines the resurrection and reconciliation, may we not believe that God cares for us? And ought we not to cast all our care upon him, remembering that he will save us? We feel assured that the mourners on the present occasion, will fully appreciate the considerations we have offered to induce this confidence in their hearts, while we address them.

1. The aged mother of the deceased.—It could have been my wish, that you might have been addressed by the hallowed voice of the Saviour, or the instructing words of the venerable apostle, until, like an aged Simeon, your soul should exclaim, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." But as youth must address you, receive it from a person who mourns with you. You must be conscious that your days are few and your journey nearly ended. Oh, while your path is downward towards the grave in mourning, cast all your care upon God, and rejoice that in heaven you shall enjoy immortal youth with the spirit of the departed one, and all the members of a redeemed world.

2. The husband of the deceased.—To you, so long united by the ties of marriage to the departed, we tender the consolations which so obviously spring from the text. We can not understand your feelings while bereaved of her with whom you have passed so many days of alternate joy and pain. We only know that your grief is pungent—hence, we mourn with you. Comfort there is much. God is the friend of the mourner—the Saviour's love will console the wounded heart.—You know the fountain from which your deceased partner drank—that fountain is open to you—and we trust that your grief has been assuaged by it. It must be rejoicing to you, that your companion exercised faith in a reunion of all people in heaven. She is free from the pains of this world—her memory is venerated. While, then, you experience a lonesomeness which pains your heart, reflect that you will in a few days meet the beloved in immortal bliss. In the meantime remember that you are not utterly bereaved, while you have children to comfort you. And whatever may be your feelings and sorrow, cast all your care upon God, for he careth for you in his tender mercy.

3. To the children of the deceased.--Let not this scene pass without its due weight upon you. Let it be a profitable lesson to you, not to be forgotten even in the hour of joy. Let it teach you to be prepared to tread the wine-press of death. You are in health, and young, but remember, death may visit you, even in the hour of joy, and in the sunny morning of life. Be prepared, then, by looking to Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith. He died for you, he rose for you, he established the doctrine of the Gospel for your benefit. Oh! search then the divine testimony; let not your years pass in ignorance of the Gospel. It contains the record of the resurrection, bright with the love of God; there the reconciliation of the world is spoken of; there the character of your God blooms in all the grace of divine love; there is the path of virtue pointed out for your feet; there are you taught all the ways of holiness. Search, then, the testimony, and you will be prepared to submit to the will of God under all circumstances.

Above all; prepare yourselves for death by honoring your father. Remember the word of God, "Honor thy Father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Exodus xx: 12. Bless his heart by following all the dictates of virtue, by setting a pure example and by turning from all evil.—And when he shall be old and incapable of exertion, be yours the duty of administering to his wants, of adding to his comforts, and easing his way to the grave. If there is one scene which will call down the blessing of God; if there is one scene over which angels will smile; if there is one scene which will elicit the admiration of men; it is to see affectionate children attending to the comforts of their parents--I would not be impious, but it appears to me almost divine, and I am compelled to say, "God bless them." Remember, then, thy Creator in the days of thy youth, by honoring your parent, and depend upon it, when your years shall draw to a close, sweet will be your conscience, and God will bless you. May he send his blessing upon you in life, and receive you to himself in the end.

4. To the numerous relatives of the deceased, I tender the rich consolations of the Gospel; the love of God—the affection of Christ—the doctrine of the resurrection and the reconciliation of the world. May the religion of the Gospel shine in your ways, may its truths be in your hearts—guide and direct you through life—console you under every affliction,—and prepare you for the hour of death. And may you then go home to God, with the full belief of meeting your departed relative and the whole human family in a world of joy and gladness, where sorrow shall cease and happiness shall fill every heart. Amen.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

DR. LANSING IN ROCHESTER.

Whether the fact was, or was not known to Dr. Lansing, it is true, that just as we ceased publishing the Herald in Rochester, he commenced, with all his might, a protracted meeting; and, as is his custom, he employs much of his time in misrepresenting Universalism. This is the first effort of the kind that has been made for a year past. Little did we dream, that the Dr. would be called from his retreat near Auburn, and again mingle in such vile work. It was said on his arrival at Auburn from New-York, that he had intimated his determination to retire from the disgusting scenes of the anxious-room, and lead the life of a quiet citizen. We believe he would have continued of this mind, had it not happened that a certain unruly boy of his, loved as much the things of this world, as the Dr. does those of another. We hope after this, the Dr. will not be inclined to doubt that good comes out of evil; for had it not been for a certain domestic calamity, he would probably at this time have been snugly quartered at Auburn, not caring a fig for sinners, or their souls! But now, he is compelled to go to work and save souls, to procure the subsistence which he expected from another source.—We understand the Dr. takes the whole charge of the soul-saving operation going on in this city, and says he must have the whole management.

We apprehend the Dr. will find as little rest here as he did at Utica. What is a little surprising, is, a revival could not be started here without a man from Auburn, one could not go on at Auburn, without the Rev. Mr. Avery's help, of Rochester; but as Mr. Avery was never thought worthy of notice here, it would be doing him injustice to say any thing concerning him. We pity a people who are attracted by his insipid nonsense.

G. S.

A General Conference of the western and southern counties of this State, will be held at Pavilion, Genesee county, commencing on Tuesday, February 27th, for the purpose of devising and carrying into operation means demanded by the situation of the cause.

G. Sanderson.

N. B. It is confidently expected that all our ministering brethren in the southern and western counties will be present. G. S.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 17.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.*

Richmond, Va., January 27, 1838.

MY DEAR SIR—I have just received yours of the 15th inst. And although you may regard me as "a Universalian ossification," I am free to acknowledge that I would rather be without "any humor," than to be always in bad humor. I am, however, not so devoid of feeling as not to commiserate your unhappy condition.

2. It must indeed be exceedingly vexatious to have this discussion delayed so long, and to reflect that most of the delay has been occasioned by yourself—to know that "the Magazine and such other Universalist papers as took subscribers during the war," are gaining patronage by means of it, and that you can not reap the same advantage—(what can be the reason? are Universalists better satisfied with the discussion, thus far, than your readers?—) to be assured that your opponent will not accept of assumptions for arguments, nor assertions for proof of your positions—to be compelled to produce bona fide proof of endless misery, when none is to be had—is doubtless all very perplexing. I pity, but can not help you. I will, however, do what I can to restore the equilibrium of your temper, if an early copy of this letter, and these assurances can do it. I will, for once, send you my manuscript direct to Bethany, reserving a copy for Utica. I entreat you, my dear friend, not to be too much cast down. You know the old adage, "the darkest time is just before day."

3. The last sentence in your 3d paragraph, shows that the truth may be told in the form of a sneer. I am willing our readers should judge of the misrepresentation complained of in your 5th paragraph. If you did not assert that temporal rewards and punishments were the sanctions of the Jewish dispensation and not of the Gospel, then language has no meaning. And if I did not disprove your assertion, and show that temporal punishments were threatened and executed under the Gospel, as well as the law, then nothing has been proved or disproved on either side. (And for temporal rewards under the Gospel, see Mark x: 30.) But you say these were not the sanctions of the Gospel. What then were they? They were threatened by, and executed under, the preachers of the Gospel. But you may say it was not for disobeying the Gospel. What then was it for? It was for great sins: and were not these sins (yea, all sin) in disobedience of the Gospel? Thus, Sir, the foundation of your boasted 6th argument about Gehenna, being wholly taken away, the argument itself has evaporated with the other five that preceded it.

4. It is amusing to see your writhing under your own Note on Matthew v: 22, and your fruitless efforts to evade the force of its positive statements about Gehenna. But, Sir, look at your own language. You say in your note, "the Judges, the Sanhedrin, and the HELL FIRE here introduced (Matt. v: 22) ARE all human punishments." And now you deny that you said any thing more than that an allusion was made to human punishments, etc. I need say no more on this subject, till you have refuted your own note. It is as positive in my favor as language can be. If the only misrepresentation you accuse me of in your 7th paragraph consisted in representing you as conceding a point which you have for years contended for, it must be obvious that I have not used you half as bad as you use yourself. For you positively misrepresent and contradict yourself point blank, as on Matt. v: 22.

5. It will be time to consider your 8th paragraph when you have made an effort to prove that 2 Thess. i: 9 relates, not to time but to eternity. I have never denied nor opposed the doctrine of antithesis, as you accuse me of doing in paragraphs 9, 10 and 11. It is only your abuse of antitheses and contrasts, your extravagant assumptions with regard to them and their applications, that I have opposed. See your Letter VI, paragraphs 15, 21, 22, 25, and Letter VIII, paragraphs 7–11, and frequent subsequent attempts to make out an endless hell because hell was the opposite of heaven, and the word heaven sometimes (though I have shown not generally) signifies a state of endless happiness. It was with reference to your whole course on this subject that I made the remark that you would send David and Jonah, and many others, both to an endless hell and an endless heaven.

6. The rule, which you say is that of the schools, that "The words on both sides of an antithesis are taken in the same extent of meaning," is undoubtedly correct as a general rule, though there are sometimes exceptions or modifications with reference to some of the minor if not the major terms employed in an antithesis. (And for proof that aionios is used both in a limited and unlimited sense in the same text, I refer you to Hab. iii: 6, and Rom. xvi: 25, 26.) But I do not need the benefit of any such exceptions or even modifications in the case now before us. For I contend that neither the everlasting punishment nor the everlasting life, Matt. xxv: 46, expresses the immortal and endless condition of the sinner or the saint; and that entering into life or being cast into hell, Mark ix: 43–47, expresses simply entering into the faith and obedience of the Gospel, on the one hand; and the dreadful woes, calamities and destruction that came upon the unbelieving Jews, on the other. The contexts of both passages, and especially of the latter, obviously suggest this view.

7. That the eternal life mentioned Matt. xxv: 46, is not the endless beatitude of immortality is deduced, not only from the context and general scope of the passage, but especially from considering that it is the reward of good works. No number or amount of good works can justly merit an infinite and endless reward; and by parity of reasoning, no number or magnitude of sins that a finite being commits in a limited time, can demerit an infinite punishment. Moreover, the very word here rendered punishment (kolasin) forbids the idea of its being endless. "Amputatio arborum luxurantium" is one of the definitions and a very common sense of it. And its meaning in the text, and other similar ones, is obviously, correction or chastisement for the good of the punished; in accordance with the Scripture truth that God punishes his children "for their profit, that they may be partakers of his holiness," and that the correction may "afterward yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them who are exercised thereby." But endless torment could neither "profit" the sufferer, nor yield any after "fruit of righteousness." The punishments of the wicked and the rewards of the righteous, as such, must both come to an end.

8. Both parts of your two favorite antitheses may hence be allowed "the same extent of meaning" without any detriment to my side of this argument. And if I am not much mistaken, you will yet find your doctrine of antitheses recoiling on your system with an irresistible force in regard to the three texts you quote in the beginning of your 11th paragraph, and other similar texts.

9. I regard your affected criticism on the derivation of aion, paragraph 13, as a powerless effort to dust the eyes of your readers in order to help you out of difficulty. In your first critique on this word (Letter X) you allowed it to have two roots, aei and oon. As I have shown that aei, the only root that could impart to it any idea of duration, is not once used to express endless perpetuity, you have now changed your mind and concluded that it has but one root, and that is oon! Admirable consistency! and this oon "is itself the root of eternity, as I AM is the name of Him that inhabiteth eternity!" More wonderful still! The present participle of a word in a language not then known, was made the root of eternity because the Deity in the Hebrew language styled himself the I AM! Mirabile dictu! Surely you deserve a medal! You have also discovered that oon of itself absolutely "means without beginning or end;" I suppose because the word itself does not say any thing about beginning and ending. You are, however, mistaken in supposing that I wish to annihilate the signification of aion. It has quite too important senses attached to it, to allow me to indulge in such a desire.

10. You seem to have wrought yourself up at one time into such an ecstacy in view of your wonderful achievements, the "unbroken strength" of your last previous letter, the marvellous "strength of the facts and documents therein displayed and arranged," the vast concessions you think I have made, etc., etc., that you entirely overlook a considerable portion of my letter, and very important portions too. See my 15th, 17th, 18th and 19th paragraphs. But you sink back again very soon into your sullen and murmuring temper, complain of the toils heaped upon you, of the "drudgery" you have to perform to prove your propositions, ask why I did not make such and such avowals before, and save you "so much labor," etc., etc. If, my dear Sir, you can find comfort enough to pay you for all your trouble, you ought to be content, seeing you are doing so well with the argument in your own opinion.

11. You say I have made the grand concession that my theology is my philology. Though such is not the fact, yet I would sooner have it so, than, like my learned opponent, make my philology my theology. Perhaps you might read Col. ii: 8, with profit. You charge me with saying I would make no allowance for the proof of a given point, unless that point were proved from some other source of reasoning than the words of inspiration. This, Sir, is an error. I have made no such declaration, nor any thing equivalent to it. I bow to the authority of inspiration with unreserved deference. All that I have said or argued on this subject, amounts to this only, that I can not admit so horrid and God-dishonoring a doctrine as that of endless misery, on the mere force of the ambiguous words aion and aionios, when these words, by the consent of all critics, yourself among them, are frequently applied to things and times that have had, or from their very nature must have, an end: and while I at the same time gave ten very weighty reasons why these words must be used in a limited sense when applied to punishment, which reasons you have not attempted to invalidate.

12. In answer to your 17th paragraph, I remark, that my objections to endless punishment were founded, not only on its incompatibility with the character and attributes of God, such as all Christians and all enlightened theists acknowledge belong to him, and as set forth in my ten objections to endless misery, but also on the entire absence of all proof of its truth in reason and revelation, and its opposition to the desires and prayers of all good and holy beings.

13. I have no "heart-burnings against the notion of punishment," if that punishment be benevolent and salutary: but take away these attributes from it, clothe it with fiendlike cruelty and merciless vengeance, make it malignant in character and endless in duration, and well may it occasion heart-burnings; yea, and heart-breakings, too, in all that sincerely believe it. I ask, Sir, can you view it with joy and satisfaction? Can you delight in its contemplation? Can you pray for it? Can you believe it for yourself, without becoming crazy? No, my dear Sir, neither you nor any mortal living can do it. The truth is, those who profess to believe the doctrine, seldom or never believe it for themselves, or their intimate friends. The only person I ever saw that fully believed it for herself, was a lady, and she was then, and had been for years, in the agonies of despair and the ravings of madness in consequence of it.

14. Your mention of Abner Kneeland's case is quite as unfortunate for yourself as for me: for he was once, like yourself, a Baptist. And if his Baptist orthodoxy could not save him from heresy, need you wonder that his heresy did not save him, in his dotage, from atheism or monomania? Where have I said or intimated that I would stake fifty-nine to one, or that I would stake any thing at all, on my theory against fact," or on my "opinion against fact?" You know, Sir, I have made no such statement, nor any thing to warrant such a conclusion. I would, however, were it necessary, stake fifty-nine to one on an argument founded in reason and philosophy, supported by the Holy Scriptures and proved by numerous facts, against a mere philological conjecture unsupported by a single proof; and such, permit me to say, do I regard your conjecture—for you can give no proof—that aionios means endless when applied to punishment.

* Mr. Campbell's letter, in our last, should have been numbered 16 instead of 15—the error was not discovered until too late to correct it. A. B. G.

15. Again, I do not by any means admit that the proportion of times in which aion and aionios signify endless duration, is as 5900 to 100 where they are used in a limited sense. Nay, I do not admit that they are used to signify endless duration in one-half of their occurrences in the Scriptures, nor even in one-half of the instances in which you have set them down as signifying it. We have the authority of lexicographers quite as learned and quite as orthodox as yourself, for assuring us that they are used "much more frequently for an indefinite than for an infinite time." In your 19th paragraph, you attempt to show our readers the great "value and extent" of my "candid concession." I shall offset your illustration by a parody on it which will at least show our readers the extent of your ("delusion may I call it?" or) consistency.

16. You admit that hills and mountains are aionios—that the possessions of Israel in Canaan are aionios—that the covenant of circumcision is aionios—that the priesthood of Aaron is aionios—that the servant was to serve his master eis ton aiona—that Jonah was in the whale's belly eis ton aiona—that the land of Idumea was to lie waste eis tous aionas ton aionon—that deeds of land run for ever—and that the punishment of the wicked was to be aionios, or eis ton aiona; yet you maintain that the first nine are only temporary and limited, and the last one endless in duration, though all are expressed in Hebrew, Greek and English by the same words! Why this inconsistency? Why this special exception in favor of the sense of endless to aion and aionios, when applied to punishment? I have besought you time after time, and now again beseech you, to give your reasons for this strange and arbitrary sense of the words when applied to punishment. It seems you have no reasons to give but your own philological conjecture, and that the thing of endless punishment must be sustained at all hazards for the reputation of your orthodoxy! This is the triumph of individual and conjectural philology over rational and scriptural theology!

17. Was your conjecture, paragraph 21, that I shall hereafter "flee again to the mountains of philology as affording more shade than the fertile plains of my philosophy," intended to cover your retreat from a field where you found more reasons against your doctrine of endless wo, than you knew how to cope with? Am I, with all our readers, left to suppose that my friend Campbell "thinks" endless misery very useful, very salutary, very honorable to God, very benevolent, merciful, wise, just, etc.? If you think so, what are your reasons? My arguments, Sir, rest not upon "one single 'I think.'" You say I "have assumed that universal language possesses no word which could eternize a subject, unless the subject be in its own nature eternal without it." This is positively untrue. And, Sir, did you not know it to be so? Did you not know that the third proposition of which I take the affirmative, denies it? Equally untrue are your assertions, that in my "philology all adjectives are cyphers," that "aionios has no meaning of its own," and your intimation that I require a new Grammar, interchanging the positions and definitions of substantives and adjectives. Such misrepresentations, witticisms, irony and sarcasm, I can not but regard, my dear Sir, as entirely unbecoming the dignity of your profession, unworthy of yourself, and undeserving of any further notice from me. I will only refer the reader to my last letter, paragraph 18, and my letter No. XI, paragraphs 11 to 17 inclusive, for my definitions of aion, etc.

18. You seem to exult considerably in having given me "Hebrew and Greek references and criticisms to satiety." In reference to this, I will only remark that a much smaller amount than you have given, would have abundantly satisfied, had they been to the point, or gone in the least to establish the truth of your second proposition; but as they made no approximation to that point, a larger, or any supposable quantum of the same sort would have been useless. For the same reason, your repetition, paragraph 24, of the ground you took with Mr. Montgomery, is irrelevant and out of place. In all you have advanced from beginning to end, no reasons have been assigned why aion and aionios, when applied to punishment, must signify endless duration.

19. Your feverish anxiety, conjectures and speculations about my views of future punishment, your disposition, before you know what they are, to brand them with the name Purgatory, etc., etc., are mistimed and out of place. Wait patiently till you see them, and then disprove them if you can. You need have no apprehensions that they will be found to embrace what some call absolute destruction, although both myself and many of our readers were at one time seriously apprehensive that you would attempt to shelter your doctrine of endless punishment under that form. I am heartily glad such is not your aim.

20. I now proceed to the third proposition, viz. "Is there any word in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked, or which can certify us that God, angels or saints shall have duration without end?" And I here remark, that I need say but little; indeed, I am not bound to say any thing more, by way of argument, till you have answered what I have said—and which remains unanswered—in my first letter. To that letter, particularly paragraphs 11 to 16 inclusive, and paragraph 20, (especially what is said on 2 Cor. iv: 17,) I refer you and our readers for unanswered and I believe unanswerable arguments in favor of the affirmative of this proposition.

21. In my first letter, I gave four words with their definitions, viz., akatalutos, aphtharsia, aphthartos, and athanasia, which are applied to, or used in connexion with God, life, the immortal beatitude of heaven, etc., etc., and never used in the New Testament in a limited sense, nor applied to any subject of a perishable nature or limited duration. You attempted, Letter X, to turn the subject, or what I had said upon it, into ridicule, but you have not denied, and I think will not deny a single material statement I made or argument I drew from the above words and their use. My letter No. XI sufficiently answered all you said by way of ridicule. I demand a candid answer to my arguments, or a concession that they are unanswerable.

22. You yourself conceded that in all of those words, the idea of duration was embraced; and as you made no attempt to prove that they ever were, or could properly be applied to any finite or limited time, or any thing of a mere earthly nature, I take it for granted that you do not calculate to do it. Indeed, I do not see any motive you can have for attempting it. For whatever may be the fate of your favorite aion and aionios, I can not suppose you doubt the endless existence of God, angels, saints or happiness, or that you would be unwilling to allow that either of the four words I gave should signify endless duration when connected with them. I have all along supposed, and still suppose, that you wished to make some show of argument against these words, more for the sake of enhancing the value and importance of aion and aionios in proving endless duration, than because you really objected to the idea of endless being attached to the others.

23. To the four words previously named, I might add, were it necessary to strengthen my argument, the word aidios, perpetual, which is applied to God, and the word aperantos, endless, infinite, boundless, also used in the New Testament, and ask, in reference to all six of them, why neither of them is ever used in connexion with sin, punishment, or misery of any kind if the latter were regarded by the inspired writers, as really endless in duration?—why no other or stronger term than aionios—a term you acknowledge is often used in a limited sense—was applied to punishment, when so many others unequivocally stronger and less ambiguous were at hand? I pause for a reply. If in your reply you can offer nothing new, or more to the point, on the first three propositions, than what you have furnished, I shall proceed without delay to the fourth. I hope your answer to this will be forthcoming without delay.

Yours in sincerity, D. SKINNER.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1838.

MATTHEW XIII: 1-23.

To judge from the specimens of youthful compositions and exercises to which we have had access, the following are the principal topics to which the attention of the biblical student are likely to be directed.

Why did Jesus at the conclusion of this, and almost all his parables, employ the phrase "He that hath ears to hear let him hear"? In addition to the interest which a story generally excites, this exhortation might be intended to arouse the attention of the hearers of the parable still further, by insinuating that under the fable there was a meaning and a moral which much concerned them. It was of great importance to fix the fable or parable in the memory, because if that were lost or forgotten, the instructive lessons it was designed to convey, would go with it. We have no hesitation, therefore, in admitting that this was one purpose contemplated in employing the phrase under consideration. This view is confirmed by the meaning which several translators attach to the words—tanta legon ephonei—which occur in the parallel place in Luke viii: 8, and which they thus render, "having said these things, he elevated his voice and exclaimed." This elevation of the voice was well adapted to arrest the attention.

Our divine Teacher may, also, be supposed to imply by this exhortation, that another reason why he preferred to leave his parables unexplained, was, that some research and serious consideration was absolutely necessary in order that the hearers should profit them. We can readily suppose that Jesus meant that, as their own eyes and ears were of more use to them than those of other men, so the employment of their own powers in the discovery of the recondite sense of the parable, would be found to be immensely more advantageous than having himself or other men to explain it to them, without any inquiry or research on their own part. Every one who has made a single original reflection or discovery, will be sensible of the truth of the above proposition.

What is the amount of the answer which Jesus returned to his disciples, when they inquired of him, "why speakest thou unto them in parables?" To inquirers, at the present day, it is probable an answer like the following would be given:—"I speak to the multitude in parables, in order to arouse their attention and the action of their dormant faculties and have heretofore spoken plainly, but my doctrines are received by them as if they had no interest in them or in truth; they are negligent and unthoughtful; they are captious, prejudiced, contentious. To arouse them from this indolence and inaction of mind, and to disarm these feelings of prejudice, I have now adopted this method of discoursing. Having faculties they will not use them, and with eyes of their own, they submit to have them tied up, and thus hoodwinked, to be guided and dictated by others. To people in such circumstances, my present method of address seems most suitable. They seem to have forgotten what every day they might be learning, that without application, inquiry, and thinking for themselves, they can not make any acquisition which will be of any essential advantage to them—that without these, they will rather be losing than gaining, as those who improve not their talents rather go backwards—and that in submitting to any dictation or impediment which prevents the free, vigorous, untrammelled pursuit of truth, and obedience to conscience, they are binding upon their souls the chains of darkness and of slavery for ever. All this, which any man of ordinary attention and discernment may ascertain from what he experiences in his own mind, and from what he sees around him, all this, my slothful, prejudiced audience seem to have forgotten. To arouse them to the task of thinking, and to make them see in spite of their prepossessions, I have adopted the parabolic method of teaching." We are aware that some expositors suppose that Jesus adopted the use of parables, not out of condescension to the weakness of his hearers, but from displeasure, and with the intention that they should not understand and should not be benefitted or converted. But to us, this view seems utterly at variance with the compassionate and long-suffering disposition of Jesus. We allow that, at first sight, the words in the parallel places in Mark iv: 12, and Luke viii: 10, seem to countenance this view, but the turn which we have given to these, making them refer to his previous didactic manner, is equally supportable, and gives a sense which much better accords with the disposition and character of him who made himself poor and of no reputation, that we might be rich, and that by any means he might save some.

What is the general design of this parable?—To represent the fate or kind of reception which the revelation by Jesus the Anointed, should meet with in the world.

Who are the way-side hearers? They are those of a dull, uninquiring habit of mind, who find it too much trouble to be roused up to activity by any subject of thought, whatever. They are the careless, the inattentive, the slothful, the inconsiderate. Those who do not make whatever subject they are addressed upon, the theme of some attentive reflection on their own part, will find that it makes but very little impression, can not be remembered long, can not be turned to any good account, and, like grain scattered upon the high-way, is soon gone and leaves not a trace behind.

Who are the stony ground hearers? They are those to whom the glad tidings are acceptable and welcome, chiefly on account of their power to excite the feelings. The Gospel with some reaches no deeper. Its claims on the understanding, and its influence on the life, are all unheeded amidst the excitement of the imagination, of the hopes and of the fears which in some it is made to produce so strongly. The eager, the fervid, the enthusiastic constitute this class of hearers, and the leader of the hosts is the idol of protracted meetings, the loud and clamorous professor. The fate of such is either a sudden apostatising from their profession, or, the profession being retained through pride and love of consistency, that the deficiencies of virtue in the life should glaringly and practically contradict the profession.

Who receive the seed among thorns? The careful, the covetous, the voluptuous, the worldly-minded. There is a third class of Gospel recipients, not so indifferent and indolent as the first, nor so weak-minded and unreflecting as the second, and, nevertheless, though in them the Gospel of Jesus finds a worthier reception, it does not bring forth much fruit. In them the elevating, purifying tendency of the glad tidings is interfered with, and alloyed; the empire of the heart is divided between God and mammon. Secular cares and business engross the greatest share of their time and thoughts, and leave no leisure for higher pursuits. The delusion or deceitfulness of these objects of desire generally involve their pursuers in such a hurry and confusion of spirits, that no moments can be seized upon sacred to that atmosphere of calmness and composure, in which the religion of the meek and serene Jesus best flourishes. Farther, "as the carnal mind is enmity with God," as, our attachment to the world increases, our disaffection to God increases with it. As this attachment most frequently increases, with age, it generally happens that the budding promises of our spring are scathed and fruitless in maturer years.

Who are the fruitful hearers? Their chief characteristic is the possession of a GOOD AND HONEST HEART. By this we understand a mind free from prejudice—a mind sincerely and earnestly desirous to know the truth—a mind, above all things, willing and ready to sacrifice every disposition, desire, habit or pursuit which truth and conscience require. We think the same disposition or character of mind as in that saying of Jesus, "whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall not enter therein."

By an insensible process of conformity to the world going on as we advance in years, we contract views, habits and prejudices which deprive us of the beautiful simplicity, innocence, meekness and docility of children. We contract pride, high spiritedness, vanity, conceit, disdain, malignity, cruelty, harshness, unkindness: are these the dispositions which the Gospel requires?—are these the qualities which Jesus has pronounced the beatific in his sermon on the Mount? All these have to be unlearned—have to submit to the painful process of crucifixion, ere the heart can become that good and honest soil into which the teachings of our Heaven-sent Master deeply sink, and in which they luxuriate and become fruitful.

Heavenly Father! may our prayers and exertions conspire to effect the removal of all impediments to the resumption of a meek, lowly, and child-like disposition—of all obstacles to the reception and retention of the message of thy well-beloved Son. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CAUSE IN WESTERN NEW-YORK.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

In the Magazine and Advocate of January 26th, are found some very able and judicious remarks, from the pen of Br. Sanderson, relative to the "cause in western New-York."—To his suggestions I would heartily respond, Amen! May his article be read with that interest which its importance demands, and his good advice be listened to, and followed.

But I wish to say a word or two. From recent travels through the western and southern sections of New-York, and from statements made to me by ministering brethren that may be implicitly relied upon, I know that the cause in those sections is in a sad and precarious situation, and no hope need be entertained of its being better under present circumstances—not until preachers and laymen enter into organization, and have some system by which to carry on operations.

I think I know in what manner this state of things has been produced, or am aware of the causes which have operated to produce this great change in the posture of our affairs. Excitement—religious excitement—which has prevailed so extensively, (I had almost said so universally,) and the rage of speculation among all classes in the before-mentioned sections of the "Empire State," are the prime moving causes. But the "whirlwinds of fanaticism" having subsided in a great degree, and the rage with which men plunged into monied speculations having abated, we have sunk down into a lukewarm state—into coldness and apathy with regard to the great and important subject of religion.

Now there is but one way in which we may regain our "former estate." We must arouse to action—united action. We must become organized, and perseverance must characterize our efforts—a steady and an untiring zeal. There must be no compromising in this matter—no yielding to outward or inward foes—no pause in our movements, until the cause we love dearly, (or profess to) is placed upon the summit of prosperity. Let our clergymen take hold of this matter with an engagedness that can suffer no diminution—no change—with a determination to overcome all obstacles or impediments which hinder the advancement of that cause we have pledged ourselves to defend and advocate, while strength and life remain—with a warmth which no opposition can cool—no struggle abate.

My clerical brethren probably all recollect that, in a sally made by one of the Roman cohorts upon the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem, they linked their armor or shield together that they might move with regularity and order, and that their line might not easily be broken. By so doing, their charge was made more effectual—they moved onward to the strife as one man—an iron wall, which defied the storm of war, and "the battle's shock!" So it should be with us. Heart should be linked with heart. One deep, undying interest for the cause of God and humanity, should be felt by all, and then we would conquer—then neither sin, nor bigotry, nor intolerance, nor prejudice, nor that dark and fearful change that has come over us, should be able to oppose an obstacle which we could not overcome!

In conclusion, I would say that I am in favor of Br. Sanderson's proposition—the calling of a meeting of the clergymen and laymen in the southern and western sections of New-York, for the purpose of devising ways and means for the upbuilding of the waste places of Zion. As the most central place, I would name Pavilion, Genesee county, at which to appoint such Conference.

Victor, N. Y.

REMARKS.

Br. Barray will see by our last, that the brethren seem to be pretty generally, of "one mind" on this subject, and all relating to it. A letter from Br. Potter, on the same subject, will appear in our next. I am glad to find the brethren so unitedly awaked and determined in this matter, "Steady," brethren—"steady and onward" be your motto, and "success" your reward! I hope the eastern and northern portions of our State—and much of Ohio, Michigan, etc.—will also attend to the matters here discussed—all need the remedy proposed. A. B. G.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1838.

TO REV. Z. EDDY, OF SHERIDAN, N. Y.

DEAR SIR—Your reply to Mr. Eaton, has been received. I decline publishing it, because you have unnecessarily increased the postage on it, and left us to pay it. The whole letter could have been sent on one sheet of paper (postage 25 cents)—you have occupied a few lines on a second sheet with it, and then enveloped the two sheets in a third, entirely blank, save the direction, thus increasing the postage to 75 cents! Was this conduct honest—just—right? You must know, Br. Eddy, that it was not—you did not do unto us, as you would be done by, when you thus taxed us with your unnecessarily treble postage. God forgive you, and make you an honester man!

Your sneers and insinuations against the character of our paper, and of the denomination whose cause it advocates, have no influence in leading me to this decision—on the contrary, if I wished to hold you up as in the very gall of bitterness, and an unchristian spirit, I would publish your letter. Besides, I would, certainly, have required even Br. Eaton to pay extra postage, had he caused us any—it is the printers' rule. And, again—from a heart as full of gall as yours seems to be from your letter, universal benevolence, and its advocates, can expect nothing better than sneers and revilings; however they may regret that your eye is evil because God is good.

With fervent prayers to God, that he may purify your heart of its malice and uncharitableness, and lead you to deal justly with your brethren, to love mercy, and to walk humbly before Him, I remain fraternally yours in the Gospel of Jesus. A. B. Grosh.

P. S. When you pay us, what your letter cost us, it will be subject to your order—till then we shall use it as best pleases A. B. G.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

The February number has been duly received, and as much of it carefully perused as my leisure would permit. It is truly the magnum bonum (the good and the great) of American monthlies—and deserves a steady and increasing support.

"The Rings of Saturn, by Thomas Dick, L. L. D., Author of the Christian Philosopher, etc.," is a very interesting disquisition in that celebrated writer's very popular manner, and very happily applied to exhibit the wisdom and goodness of God in the universe. "Observations of sounds, thunder showers, and west and northwest winds, by G. F. Hopkins," is another dish of substantial food for the philosophic mind, of no little interest and value. "Oriental Fragments of Travel, from the unpublished MSS." of that celebrated traveller in the East, Mr. Buckingham, (now lecturing in New-York,) is another very interesting article. I shall present an extract from it, illustrating a passage of Holy Writ, much misunderstood, and therefore carped at as improbable, by many skeptical minds. "A Journal of eight years hard fighting in the Revolutionary war," by Col. Allan McLane, is a relic of olden time, interesting to every one in whom veneration, eventuality, and inhabitiveness are strong feelings of the soul. "The Editor's Table" is, as usual, a well prepared and varied dessert—candid, just, and discriminating criticisms and literary notices, well arranged. Besides these, there are several pieces of light reading and poetry, which I have skimmed over enough to see that they fully sustain the great reputation of the work. I have no doubt that every article is well worth, not only a perusal, but more than the cost of the work.

As a testimony to the courtesy and kindness of its publishers, I would notice, that, formerly several numbers failed to reach us. On being notified of the fact, the publishers immediately forwarded them. Nor this alone: by a kind anticipation of our wants, they now ask us if we have received all our missing numbers. On such kindness we do not like to trespass—but valuing the work as we do—and one number missing would break the volume—we venture to reply, that we did not receive the January number, or the first of the present volume. We have two copies of the number containing Mr. Russell's portrait—probably the second was sent in mistake for the January number—shall we return it? and will they please send us the January number? A. B. G.

TO OUR WESTERN BRETHREN.

Br. Pitt Morse having notified his congregation in Watertown, that his labors with them will terminate next Spring, designs to itinerate next season, particularly through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. While we regret to lose, even for a short period, the valuable labors and excellent society of Br. Morse from this section, we can not but rejoice that his usefulness will be so extensively exercised among our Western brethren. A more profound, clear, and chaste reasoner, or one better acquainted with the doctrine of Universalism, and with all the objections by which it is likely to be assailed, could not have been obtained for this purpose. His experience, erudition, great ability as an extemporaneous speaker, dignified deportment, and excellent moral character, will undoubtedly render his itineracy in the West eminently useful to our cause in that region. May Heaven's choicest blessings rest on him, on the people of his present charge, and on those to whom he may be called to minister in the Gospel of the reconciliation; and may Watertown be speedily supplied with another preacher of the Gospel, fully able to fill his place in that excellent Society. A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

The Essex county Quarterly Conference met in Marblehead, Mass., January 17th. Sermons were preached by Brs. Jewell, Arnold, Brimblecom, and Austin.

The York, Cumberland, and Oxford Conference met, same day, at Lewiston Falls, Me.—and in lyceum form discussed the following questions, deciding them as annexed. 1. Did the apostles, after preaching the Gospel, proceed to organize churches? Unanimously decided in the affirmative. 2. What constituted a church in the apostolic ages? It was composed of professed believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, who took upon themselves the obligations of the Gospel. 3. By what form or ceremony did the apostles organize churces? Not fully satisfied what the manner was. 4. Can any general rule for general use, be prescribed for the organization of Christian communities? Religious societies, for prudential concerns, are necessary—also, churches for the observance of Christian rules, rites, and duties clearly learned from the Scriptures. [And, in my humble opinion, both these had better be united in one organization, with proper officers for each purpose. Any person not good enough to be a member of a church, so called, is not good enough to be a member of a Universalist society. A. B. G.] On the third day, the following questions were proposed for discussion at the next meeting. 1. Water baptism—whether it is now binding on Christians? 2. Are Christians at the present day, in duty bound to observe the Eucharist, or Lord's Supper? Appointed Br. Bates to preach the occasional sermon, and Br. D. T. Stevens substitute—Br. Hawkins to write the circular—and then adjourned to meet in Norway village, on the third Wednesday in April next. There can be no doubt that the discussion of some important questions by our Conferences—questions relating to the best means and importance of promoting the Gospel in its purity—will have a very salutary effect.

New Laborers.—Timothy Clowes, (I believe a L L. D. as well as a D. D.,) of the Episcopal church, has recently embraced and avowed the doctrine of universal salvation. He is the brother-in-law of Br. Lefevre, and was led to examine the subject, by the conversion of Br. Lefevre, some eight years since. Dr. Clowes has been principally engaged in teaching a classical school, in Hempstead, L. I., and would be happy to devote himself to teaching the student for the ministry, or the general scholar in classical literature, or in practical mathematics. Dr. C. is well known as an eminent mathematician, and is probably equal as a classical scholar to any of our preachers. A good exchange for E. D. Kennicott, whose conversion to Episcopalianism was noticed by Br. Hammond in our last!

Conference at Burlington Flats.—The notice for this Conference on the 21st and 22d inst., though mailed at Clinton on Monday morning, did not reach us till Thursday! As the notice will now be a short one, I call attention to it in this place. Probably I will be able to attend. A. B. G.

A ROBBERY.

Br. A. Kinne is informed that a half sheet of paper, directed in his writing to me, postage (25 cents) paid, and post-marked "Juliet, Ill., Jan. 20," came to hand last week. It appears as if it had been opened—the first half of the sheet, containing all the writing, cut off—refolded, and then resealed by wafering a piece of paper over the former seal. There is no writing on what we received, save the direction. Will he let us hear from him, respecting it, if necessary? for that a robbery has been committed, we have no doubt.

A. B. G.

Br. Bazin—Send the Expositor to Rev. David Van Alstine, Erwin P. O., Steuben county, N. Y.

Br. Bazin—Send Expositor to Leonard Cone, Troy, Michigan, and John S. Avery, Frankfort, Herkimer county, N. Y., credit each $2, and charge Grosh and Hutchinson. Also, credit Samuel Goff, Van Buren, N. Y., and Rev. T. J. Smith, Bridgewater, N. Y., each $2, and charge Grosh and Hutchinson. Also, send Expositor to Rev. Judah Babcock, Hume, Allegheny county, N. Y., and Rev. Salmon Adams, Carrol, Chautauque county, N. Y. Also, transfer one of Rev. D. Biddlecom's copies, Perrysburg, O., to Rev. W. West, Cincinnati, O.

Br. Price—Send J. M. Brown, Indiantown, Bureau county, Ill., current volume, back numbers, and charge Grosh and Hutchinson $2.

Br. Tompkins—Send current volume Repository to Benjamin Mason, Pekin, Carrol county, O., and charge Grosh and Hutchinson $2.

Br. Tompkins—Send the Repository to Mrs. Juliet D. Wilder, and the Expositor to Milton C. Holly, and to Martin Hodge, all of Warsaw, Genesee county, N. Y.
W. E. Manley.

Br. Guild—That letter and enclosure was received.—Shall I publish your and Br. W.'s notice for a Conference, notwithstanding the one in this paper? A. B. G.

Br. N. Brown will find a letter, directed to the care of Br. Sanderson, Rochester—it was too late to send it to Centreville. G. and H.

Br. R. Thornton, supposed to be itinerating in Michigan, is informed that the Expositor and Universalist Review comes for him at Yorkshire, N. Y. Will he please inform Br. J. Lewis, Boston, N. Y., what he desires respecting it?—Com.

Br. M. Baker, of Buffalo, has consented to act as our agent in that city.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. M. B. Smith will preach in Clinton next Sunday, and in Hampton in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. Smith in this city—Br. W. Martin, at Munnsville and at Paige's school-house in the evening, —Br. Biddlecom at Hartwick and at Hinman's Hollow in the evening—Br. J. T. Goodrich at the school-house, near Br. Wheeler's in Greene, and at New-Ohio in the evening.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in March, by Br. Sias at Perch River—Br. Foster in Constantia —Br. Martin at the school-house at the New Bridge at 10, A. M., at Clay Corners at 2 P. M., and at Cold Spring Settlement in the evening.

Br. W. Martin will preach on the evening of the 19th inst., at Fayetteville, 20th at Clockville, 21st, at Cazenovia, 22d in Hamilton village.

Correction.—Br. Guild's notices in our last, after next Sunday, he desires changed as follows:—

Br. E. E. Guild will preach on Friday evening, February 23, at Colliersville—Sunday 25th, at Jacksonborough at 11, A. M., and at Worcester in the evening (instead of Walton)—Monday evening, 26th, in Sharon; and Tuesday evening, 27th, in Richmondville.

A Conference will be held at Bethany, Wayne county, Pa., on the 21st and 22d inst. Ministering brethren are earnestly invited to attend.

A Conference of the Otsego Association will be held at Burlington Flats, on the 21st and 22d inst.
M. B. Smith, Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

A B, Victor, for C B, J F and L C—A P, Jamesville—L G, Jamestown, (W T) for self, I C B, L G, S B, W S, P N and A H G—D M, Millport—J K, Jonesboro,' (Ala) for J W B and J A—P M, Liverpool, for M F—S G, Van Buren, for A D W, and Expositor—Rev A R G, Henderson, (Ill) for I F, R R, W C and T McK—P M, Suffolk C H, for B R and W N—M W D, Buffalo—S B, Elmira—P M, Sheshequin, (Pa) for self and J T jr—T B H, Hamilton, for self and J C B—Rev E E G, Cooperstown, for S W A and S O—A S G, Salisbury, for R T, A T and D H S—Rev N B, Howard, for W H, S R, S A, L A, E W L, and R T—P M, Java Village, for A B—B M, Pekin, (O) for self and Repository—J M, Nankin, (Mich) for self, A B, E D and E W—P M, Waterford, (Mich) for S B—A B, Norfolk, (O) for self and S B—P M, Mottville, for D W and N K.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE ITALIAN GIRL.

The following, with a few alterations, is from the Budget of the Utica Berean Institute.

She lay by th' open window. Calmly fell
The first, faint shadow of the coming death
Upon her pallid countenance—and passed,
Slowly and sadly, from her full, dark eye
The light of life and beauty. It was not
An unexpected messenger who breathed
A chill and blighting o'er her throbbing heart,
And called her spirit from commune with earth
To its far home of glory. She had known
Of its approach, and watch'd, nay, wish'd the time
That brought its solemn coming—and she bowed
In silent and in sweet humility,
When the strange thrill that shot across her frame
Told her that shadowy messenger was there.

Yes, she was ready. There was but one tie
That held her soul to earth, and that was twined
In the fond, bursting heart of one who stood
In agony beside her dying couch,
Shedding thick-falling tears upon her brow.
It was her mother—but e'en this dear tie,
Faith taught her how to sever, and blest Hope
Told her would re-unite in yonder heaven.

Her story was a simple one. She was
A flower of Italy, the soft, bright land
Of sunlight and of music. She had grown
In humble beauty 'neath a mother's care—
For years the sole light of that mother's home.
Retired, she lived thus, 'till she saw, and loved,
And wed a stranger from our western clime
With him and that loved mother, then she left
The scenes and shrines of childhood, for the land
Of him who won her love.—A gale arose
Upon their voyage. The ship survived its power—
But ten whose forms had glided o'er its deck, Slept in an ocean sepulchre. And he
Among them! He, her hope, her very heart,
Was swept beneath the billow and the storm!
They came here. With the little they had saved
From once-sufficient wealth, they bought a home—
A pleasant, cottage home. There she, of whom
We tell this gentle story, day by day,
Was wasting with no visible disease—
But with a growing sickness of the heart—
And though, at first, they fondly hoped, again
To tread their birth-land, and to look upon
Its vineyards and its beauty, and that she Might pass to rest beside the hallowed graves
Where slept her kindred—yet that happy dream
Soon faded, and she bowed herself to die,
Calmly, as we have seen—with a blest faith
Bright'ning with every moment, and a hope
Fledging new pinions for her struggling soul,

And thus she lay till, startled by the tears
That on her forehead fell so frequently,
She raised her eyes with a sweet, patient smile,
And to her mother breathed these gentle strains—

"I am dying, dearest mother, I am going to that land
Where our loved that went before me, dwell—a blest and glorious band—
Weep not, dear mother, but let faith still make thy spirit strong,
For in that clime of happiness we'll meet again ere long.

I know you'll want me, mother, your hearth will be so dim,
When you see no more my cherished form—and you'll miss my evening hymn,
And my voice no more will blend in prayer—nor breathe above my lute—
To you 'twill seem all pleasant tones of joy and hope are mute.

And, oh! I've yearned to look once more upon bright Italy,
Where the golden sunlight ever rests and the soft winds float so free—
'Twould have been so grateful to have died among my native bowers,
And passed down gently to my grave, 'mid the music and the flowers.

But I'm going to a brighter clime, a home that beams for me,
With a light so pure that mortal eye may never hope to see;
Where radiant streams roll fresh along, "fast by the throne of God,"
'Mid harps and songs—an angel land—by blessed spirits trod.

Oh! earth was dark, and hopes were crushed and my spirit's depths were sad,
'Till God lifted up his countenance, and all was light and glad—
Then, be thy heart not desolate—on thy vision, pure and free,
His light who lighteth all, will shine—in Him thy trust shall be.

Weep not, weep not, for time and death they can not long divide—
Soon, dearest mother, thou wilt rest in the greengrave by my side—
Let these parting words be sweet to thee as some bright seraph's song—
Thou wilt follow me, dear mother—we shall meet again ere long!"

It was at
The gorgeous time of sunset, and the hues
Of many glories lingered in the skies,
And filled the earth with beauty and with smiles.
Through the small lattice of a cottage-room,
The solemn sunbeams rested. Solemn? ay—
It was the room of death—there knelt and bowed
That mother by her dead Italian girl!

Go search the scroll of history—go read
The cenotaphs that laud the mighty dead—
Bring record of all proud triumphant deaths—
The warrior in the red fight cloven down,
'Mid helms, and glaives, and banners, and with smiles
Grasping his wreath of glory—or the sage,
Unshrinking, cold and passionless, enwrapt
Within his mantle, "sitting down to die"—
Bring all of these and others' dying hours—
And shew one trait so calm, so beautiful,
With heaven's own beauty, as the Christian's death. E. H. C.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, February 1st, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. THEODORE W. DENNISON, to Miss CATHARINE HUYCK, both of Herkimer.

In Winfield, January 4th, by Rev. T. J. Smith, Mr. JOSIAH W. WARNER, to Miss DOROTHY MORGAN, both of the same place.

In Richfield, January 7th, by the same, Mr. LATAN PALMER to Miss SYLVIA BROWN, both of that place.

In Brookfield, January 9th, by the same, Mr. LEONARD FOOTE, to Miss HANNAH CLARK, both of that town.

In Victor, January 16th, by Rev. A. C. Barray, Mr. LUTHER BROOKS, to Miss HARRIET WATERMAN, all of Victor.

In Auburn, December 31st, 1837, by Rev. George W. Montgomery, Mr. P. WELLS, to Miss BETSEY TIBBITS.

In Mottville, January 1st, by the same, Mr. CHARLES HOWARD to Miss ELIZABETH JANE NYE.

In Geneva, January 9th, by the same, Mr. JOHN ACKLEY, to Miss LYDIA GOFFE.

In Auburn, January 19th, by the same, Mr. WILLIAM DUNKISON, to Miss R. OWENS.

Same place and day, by the same, Mr. NATHANIEL JOHNSON, to Miss JANE WAKELY.

In Royalton, December 31st, by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. AMMI HILL, to Miss AMY ELIZABETH SHOEMAKER.

In Dunkirk, January 10th, by Rev. T. C. Eaton, Mr. ENOCH JEWETT, to Miss MARTHA THOMPSON, both of Stockton.

In Sheridan, January 30th, by the same, Mr. FRANCIS XAVIER BOSCHERT, to Miss ADALINE ELDRED, both of Sheridan.

In Otsego, January 18th, by Rev. O. Whiston, Mr. WILLIAM A. FULLER, to Miss MERCY ANN WILLIAMS, both of that place.

In Otego, January 4th, by Rev. L. Hyatt, Mr. NELSON HYATT, to Miss MARY WILSEY, both of Otego.

In this city on the 8th inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. RUSSEL GILES, to Miss ELSEY BOVEE, both of this city.

DEATHS.

In Springfield, Bradford county, Pa., December 12th, 1837, JOSHUA SPEAR, aged 73 years. The deceased was a soldier of the Revolution—brave and benevolent. He died in the triumphs of a more perfect freedom than that which he aided to establish for his country—the freedom of the Gospel. A numerous congregation of mourning relatives and sympathising friends attended his funeral on the 17th. Sermon by Br. Ames.

In Osnabrook, Upper Canada, October 24th, 1837, Mr. JEHIEL HAWLEY, son of Mr. John H. Hawley, of Madrid, St. Lawrence county. Br. Hawley was a practical Universalist, and died resigned to and rejoicing in the will of God. A short time previous to his death he received the Eucharist at the hands of Rev. Mr. Rolph, an Episcopalian, and brother to Dr. Rolph, the Canadian Reformer. On the following Sunday, Mr. Rolph noticed Br. Hawley's happy departure, to his congregation, remarking, that he wished he could see as much virtue exhibited by every member of his church. He also named several of their Bishops who had died believers in the Restitution.

The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning relatives, (at the re-interment of the deceased in Madrid,) by Br. E. A. Garfield.

In Sheshequin, Pa., about the first of September, 1837, Dr. AMOS PARKS, aged about 30 years. He died as he had lived, in the faith of God's impartial grace—enduring a severe and protracted illness with Christian fortitude. The immense congregation which assembled at his funeral the in Universalist meeting-house, was a grateful tribute of respect to his memory. May God bless and console his widow and fatherless children.

G. S. AMES.

In Amsterdam, December 26th, 1837, Mrs. RUTH BACKUS, widow of Mr. Absalom Backus, in the 74th year of her age. Funeral on the following Sunday, in the Universalist meeting-house. Sermon, by request, by Br. Newell.

In Manheim, January 17th, of apoplexy, Mrs. JEMIMA GRAY, consort of John Gray, of Orleans, Jefferson county, and daughter of Adam Klock, of the former place, aged 26 years. She left home, and two children, with her husband and youngest child, to visit her parents and friends, and, alas! the day she intended to return, found her clothed for the grave! She was beloved by all. We pray that her parents and husband may be sustained by their hope in a world's salvation, which hope cheered her in her last moments. Her funeral was attended on the 19th, by an attentive concourse, to whom the word of consolation was administered by the writer, from Job xxx: 23. W. H. W.

In Litchfield, January 14th, of lingering consumption, Mrs. LUCY KNIGHT, consort of Joseph Knight, aged 35 years. Her funeral was attended on the 16th—sermon by Br. T. J. Smith.

In Gainesville, December 10th, 1837, of dropsy on the brain, Miss SYLVIA REBECCA SHATTUCK, in the 20th year of her age. Her funeral was attended, and the sermon from Luke viii: 52, preached by the writer.

The afflicted mother, (now Mrs. Hill,) has been called to mourn previous to this event. Her partner, Mr. Ezra Shattuck, died of consumption, June 3d, 1834, aged 49 years—and her son Ezra R. Shattuck, died only six days after his father. All these were sustained in their last hours by the hope of universal holiness and bliss—which hope also sustains most of the surviving friends under their heavy afflictions. W. E. M.

In Augusta, January 23d, Mrs. NANCY BLOUNT, consort of Mr. John Blount, aged 73 years. She was among the first in this country that embraced the Abrahamic faith; and after living in the enjoyment of its consolations for a number of years, she found it as full of comfort in the hour of death, as it had been useful and happifying in life. She was a faithful companion, an affectionate mother, a pious Christian, and an ornament to society—charitable to the poor and afflicted. Her funeral was attended on the 25th; sermon by the writer.

D. B.

Also—on the 3d inst., Mr. JOHN BLOUNT, consort of the above, in the 73d year of his age—one of the first settlers in this country, and for many years a worthy member of the Universalist society in Clinton. In closing his earthly pilgrimage, he gave satisfactory evidence that the faith which had rendered his life cheerful, imparted perfect peace to the dying hour. Funeral on the 5th—sermon by M. B. SMITH.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH.

Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1838. NUMBER 8.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER TWELVE.

BY S. R. SMITH.

OBJECTIONS FROM GEOLOGY.

There are several objections brought against the Scriptures, on account of the supposed inconsistency of some of their assertions and facts, with sound science. These are, therefore, to be considered as among the causes of unbelief, and are, consequently, entitled to careful attention. And this, not only because it is an age of much inquiry, but because every age is alike interested in the truth. The cultivation of the sciences may render the necessity more obvious, of reconciling the least observable disagreements between the processes of physical nature, and the declarations of the Bible. And it is matter of congratulation to all lovers of science as well as of the truths of revelation, that the advances and improvements which have been made in the former, enlarge the resources for furnishing a solution of every difficulty in the latter. Hence the same materials which science drags up from the abysses of nature, and with which she assails the Scriptures, become, by proper application, the polished arms with which revelation extends its triumphs. The attempt to array physical nature against the testimony of the Bible, is an effort to divorce what God hath most intimately united. They are the respective parts of an immense whole, and both contain internal proof of their divine Original. The one leads forth the mind from chance and chaos, to the presence of an all-comprehending Intelligence, whose might, and whose wisdom, and whose benignity are impressed upon every thing; and the other carries us upward, and forward to the knowledge of the dealings and purposes of that all-governing Spirit, towards the moral portion of the universe.

The discoveries which have been made respecting the structure of the earth, and the consequent improvement of the science of Geology, have been thought to furnish evidence of the incorrectness of the chronology of the Bible. This science supposes, that our earth must have existed for a much longer time than can be reasonably inferred from the Mosaic history; and that this is proved by the structure and arrangement of the different strata of rocks, by fossil remains, and by the evident indications of changes which have taken place, on or near the surface of the earth.

There is much plausibility in this objection, whatever may be its actual validity and force. And there is great danger that many will be misled by the hasty and confident conclusions which some very eminent and scientific men have drawn respecting it. To these conclusions they seem to have been urged, by the influence of a new discovery of the elements which mingle in the structure of the earth's surface—and to which they evidently gave much more attention, than to the Scripture chronology. The appearances on which the objection is based, are all doubtless undeniable—nor need they be denied, in order to render them entirely compatible with the Scriptures. This, it is believed, will appear from the following considerations:—

1. Geology does not, and can not determine with certainty our chronology. True, it furnishes evidence of the existence, at some period, of various races of animals and species of vegetables, which are no longer known to man, and concerning which, both history and tradition are alike silent, unless, indeed, we may take the testimony of the Bible for some of them. It demonstrates, that there has been sufficient time since the "infant earth was rolled together," to congregate and mature the substances, and to perfect the crystalization of the different kinds and strata of rocks—to deposite and petrify the numerous and dissimilar organic remains—to expunge whole races and species from the catalogue of being, and to introduce those which were probably unknown before.

And what does all this prove? Neither more nor less, than that there has been time enough for effecting these things. But how long a period has been required for the performance of these astounding works? The works speak for themselves—but they have never told the number of years, or of ages that were rolled by while they were in progress. "And who is sufficient for these things?" Who is prepared to say upon the authority of the evidence at his command, that even six thousand years are not sufficient to bring about every fact brought to light by the science of geology? Who is so intimate with the knowledge of the revolutions which have taken place on the surface of the earth, during the lapse of sixty centuries, as to determine with positive certainty what has, or has not been done? The utmost that the skeptic can argue from geology against the common chronology, is, that it furnishes ground of conjecture that a longer time has elapsed since the earth was, than is generally supposed. But conjectures and facts are different things—and it is believed that the skeptic himself would ask something more tangible than mere conjecture, from any one who should attempt to overthrow even his theory.

All history, except that of the Bible, terminates in tradition, in the middle of our chronology. And yet, that portion which comes within the range of authentic record, furnishes some extraordinary instances of physical change. Mountains have become plains—volcanoes have in some instances exhausted their fires, while in others, eruptions have broken forth where all had been security and quiet, apparently from the creation—islands have emerged from the bosom of the ocean, and, for aught we know to the contrary, the vast continent on which we live; while, on the other hand, broad tracts of land have disappeared, and islands have sunk probably to rise no more. Populous territories have been overwhelmed with inundations, large cities have been buried by earthquakes or volcanoes, and the sand of the desert, or the ever-rolling tide of some mighty river, has engulphed the seat of empire, and the last remains of its deep foundations.

Had not authentic history brought the date of some of these facts so near our own times, are we assured that skeptics would not have disputed the history of the creation, on their authority? Should we not have been told, that some two or three thousand years were insufficient for scattering some of the proudest and most stupendous works of human skill, to the winds of heaven? Nay, that this period could not have admitted of such numerous and important changes in the state of the visible globe? And should we not, in all probability, have been carried back in the estimate of ages, to some imaginary period, many thousands of years anterior to the common date of the creation? Is it not much more than probable, that the very existence of Nineveh and Babylon had been considered among the number of splendid fictions—a part of the creations and machinery of enthusiasm and imposture, if profane history did not sanction and sustain the testimony of the Bible? And had not Homer identified Troy with all our conceptions of fact, and Pliny, or some one else, satisfied us that Herculaneum and Pompei were above ground a few centuries since, what speculations concerning their antiquity would flash upon the pages of geologists? We should be told that the Troad would yet furnish the monuments of ancient splendor—or that Chaldea could still show a brick from the ruins of Babylon, were they not even more ancient than the Mosaic account of the creation admits. But Troy was—and Babylon is no more; and yet their very places have perished in a period less than the half of our common chronology.

In view of these facts—and they may be multiplied to the heart's content of any one—who can say positively that six thousand years are not enough for all earth's changes? Who knows the ways and means by which the aggregation of different masses may have been brought about and crystalized?—or what influence the endless modifications of seasons and climates may have exerted?—or whither the winds and the waves, or some convulsion of the earth, may have transported the products of any given place? Who is prepared to say how many races, or what particular species of animal and vegetable being were known or unknown to primitive man?—how many, or what kinds, lived and perished before human foot pressed the vegetable productions of earth, or the race of man became sufficiently numerous and avaricious to trench upon the prerogatives of its beasts, birds, and even reptiles? We repeat, that conjecture is neither sound argument nor substantial proof, and however plausible, ought not to furnish to any mind a sufficient reason for rejecting important and well-established truth. And were the tables turned, it is scarcely probable that the unbeliever would consider a similar argument of any strength, when brought against his favorite system.

2. Geology, as a science, is in its infancy. The ashes of the distinguished men, to whose talents and industry the world is principally indebted for reducing it to a science, are scarcely yet cold. This fact deserves to be very attentively considered, before any conclusion is drawn, which, remotely or directly, shall have an unfavorable bearing upon the truth of the Scriptures. The charm of novelty is not yet dissolved respecting the developements of this interesting science; and it is highly probable that the inferences which have been drawn by some of its votaries, are extravagant. Facts may be, and often are, discolored and distorted by fancy and imagination; and those which geology for the first time brought to light, may, from their nature, number, and magnitude, be readily supposed to impress the mind with astonishment. Nor is it perhaps unnatural or surprising, that under these circumstances it should be supposed that a much longer period was necessary for the production of visible results in the operations of nature, than more experience and observation will justify.

The scientific reader need not be told, that the process of crystalization is instantaneous. The formation of ice upon water, is a perfect illustration of the manner in which this marvellous work is accomplished. And however dissimilar the form of crystals in different substances, the process is to all intents the same. Now when the materials are properly disposed, the combinations and proportions completed, that process commences its operation. Hence, when such masses as geology denominates secondary or more recent formations, were aggregated by fire and flood, and wherever deposited, the elements of crystalization or petrifaction were instantly at work. And hence, too, what is deemed the work and elaboration of many thousands of years, or ages, may in fact, have been fully accomplished in a comparatively short period of time.

A case in point came under the personal observation of the writer. He was present at a funeral in the village of Sauquoit, Oneida county, in 1822, where on account of a change in the place of burial, the remains of an individual were disinterred. The more fleshy, or rather muscular parts of the arms and lower extremities, were completely petrified—were converted into solid limestone, from which the bones were projecting as if inserted during the process of petrifaction. Hundreds of persons were witnesses of this extraordinary fact. But what we are principally concerned with, is, the certain mistake into which the speculative geologist would fall, in estimating the time necessary for the completion of this process. We have every means of knowing that these identical limbs appertained to a living and amiable woman, only eighteen years before.

The conclusions drawn by geologists, respecting the earth's antiquity, from the organic remains of extinct species of animals and vegetables, though plausible, are by no means certain. The existence of these does not constitute decisive proof of the position assumed. So far from this, the most that can be inferred from them with safety, is a bare presumption that the earth is more ancient than is consistent with our chronology. But this is not proof, nor can it with propriety be admitted as decisive against the actual chronology of the Bible, or any of its well-established facts. Neither does the existence of these organic remains prove that the state of the globe was only adapted to certain forms of life and modes of being, and which could not subsist under the present arrangement of the earth's surface. Parts may have changed, and we know that they are constantly changing; and this is sufficient to account for these phenomena. Approximated species, both animal and vegetable, would find a comfortable home, where their kindred of a different zone would perish. The change of a morass or fen to a permanent soil, might imbed innumerable multitudes of plants and living creatures deep in its bosom, whence, after petrifaction or carbonization, they are eventually brought forth by the wants or the avarice of man—the objects of his wonder, and perhaps the innocent cause of his skepticism. Climates themselves may have greatly changed—may have become inhospitable, where they were once congenial with races that can abide them no longer. Illustrations of this are furnished in the former and present vegetable productions of several countries—and why not in their animals? A number of causes, therefore, might have operated in the production of the whole mass of fossil remains, without materially affecting even the common chronology. For those parts of the earth which have principally furnished the geologist with matter of speculation, can scarcely be supposed to have constituted a suitable residence for man. The new-born earth might also have put forth an energy in the production of mutations from its latent resources, which by successive efforts have become partially exhausted—hence the affairs of the surface have become more permanent, and important changes, comparatively "few and far between." And when the charm of a new science shall have passed away, geology will become another link in the scientific chain of proof, that the Bible is what it professes to be—a record of divine truth.

3. That the argument from geology against the Scriptures is not conclusive, is proved by the fact that it has not affected the faith of some of the most distinguished geologists, in their authenticity. Were there no other considerations which weigh against the skepticism built upon geology, this fact alone is sufficient to neutralize all its force. For if we must rely on the conclusions of any set of men, those of one class are as much entitled to our confidence, all other things being equal, as are those of another. And in this case, it will hardly be doubted that the intelligence, science, and acumen of the Christian, are fully equal with those of the skeptic. If, then, we allow to each an equal attachment to his respective opinions, and an equal respect for truth and candor, the matter rests, as far as human testimony is concerned, precisely where it did before geology became a science. Hence, after all that has been inferred from it, the authenticity of the Bible is untouched by its discoveries and deductions.

It will probably be objected to this, that there are some facts in the Christian history which show that opinions are not to be decided by the credulity or incredulity of cotemporaries. And that if this were the rule by which to determine matters in controversy, the unbelief of the Jews would be justly construed against the truth of Christianity. And so it would were the cases parallel. But they are not—it being evident in the first place, that they never examined the subject, and were consequently incapable of giving any substantial reason for the rejection of the Gospel. Whereas geology has engaged the close and devoted attention of very many, whose views were never shaken by its disclosures, and whose confidence in the Bible as a revelation from God, has undergone no change. In all instances where a Jew approached the doctrine of Christianity with apparent candor, if he did not go away convinced of its truth and genuineness, he was at least "almost persuaded to be a Christian." And it is equally probable, that when the chronology of the Bible is as diligently investigated as the developments of science, geologists will perceive the accordance of nature and revelation, and the authenticity of the divine record remain unimpeached by their most profound discoveries.

4. Geology furnishes no objection to the chronology of the Bible, however it may be supposed incompatible with that of the church. If it were admitted that the earth's duration far exceeded what is commonly supposed—if all that the geologist can contend for with the least show of reason, were granted—it would not weigh the amount of a grain of sand to the globe, against the Scriptures. Such admissions are not necessarily demanded, but let them be made—and what is the result? It by no means follows, that a chronology based upon the births, and lives, and deaths of successive generations of men, must comprise the whole sum of duration since "the morning stars sung together" on the organization of our system. The Bible does not inform us in any definite terms, that this period embraces the whole time since the "spirit of God moved upon the face of the deep," and brought light out of darkness, and order from chaos. The common chronology is that of man—it follows him through all the periods of his existence, from the infancy of his being down to the present time. But it takes no account of any supposable time, prior to his creation. This is the fact on which geology fastens—concerning which it draws all its inferences—and is the only one which it pretends to sustain against the Bible.

But geology becomes its own assistant in solving the difficulty which it raises. Its developments have forced the conviction upon the minds of all its admirers, that man was the last of the Creator's works. For it is admitted, that among the multitude of fossil remains, those which indicate the presence of man are the last in the scale. And this fact is in perfect agreement with the Scripture account of the creation, in which he is brought forth as the glory and consummation of the system of physical existence. "In him the chain of being is complete." As an animal merely, he is allied to every living creature of earth—as an intellectual and moral being, he is a child of the Deity. And he was manifestly set apart and distinguished from all others, by being brought forth under the last era in the economy of creation.

On the supposition that the whole work of creation was completed in a single week as we reckon time, an immense number of facts are thrown into conjunction which are not absolutely required by the Scriptures. The same general terms in which they describe the process of forming and fitting up the world, are employed with the utmost latitude in respect to duration—with a license, every way adapted to the nature of the subject. And can any sufficient reason be given, why this is not also true in relation to the subject under consideration? If when speaking of human life, it is denominated a day—if the legal covenant which endured for many ages is called a day—and if the dispensation of the Gospel which has already continued nearly two thousand years, is also termed a day—what limit may be fixed to its meaning, when applied to a subject whose periods are beyond the reach of human computation?

No reader of the Bible can have failed to observe, that the word day is familiarly used to designate any period of time, however indefinite, of which the writer was speaking. Hence, in the Mosaic account of the creation, the period employed in the production of any set of particulars, is denominated a day. But it does not follow from the use of this term, that the author intended to convey the idea of the exact period of time ordinarily measured by a revolution of the earth. There is a great number of passages, in which such an application of its meaning, would be destructive of all harmony and consistency in the text. And as the Christian is under no obligation to limit the word to a literal day in the present instance, so there is no obvious reason, why that meaning and no other should be forced upon his acceptance. Nor does the fact that it has generally been understood to mean merely a day in the strictest sense, oblige any individual, or denomination, to adopt that signification. Each person has the right of putting any construction upon that or any other subject, which comports with his views of consistency, or the dictates of his conscience. And this is done in respect to the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, without any impeachment of the integrity of the different sects, or diminution of the confidence due to the record of divine truth.

But this use of the word day—to signify an indefinite period of time—is not peculiar to any one denomination. It has been adopted as the natural and consistent meaning of the term in its application to the creation, by some of the most distinguished men of different sects—if not as their decided opinion, as one that was at least unexceptionable.* And when the geologist has fully removed all the difficulties which interpose between his theory and the common chronology, he is earnestly desired to test the plenitude of his prowess, in an experiment upon the language of the inspired penman. Does he want more than six thousand years for condensing the materials and completing the structure of the earth?—the first chapter of Genesis will permit him to count as many ages as are necessary for the purpose! Does he desire a succession of eras for the full development of all the processes, and the perfection of each in the scale of progression?—the same chapter grants him seven, and he can scarcely ask for more! Would he have an advance in the scale of being, from inferior to superior, from brute to man?—that identical order is laid down as the rule by which the Deity regulated his conduct in peopling the earth! What, then, does the skeptic want? It plainly is not time, nor order, nor progression, in the Scripture history of the creation. He will then excuse us for saying, that his most obvious want is—a taste and a heart for the truths of divine revelation. And he is battering his weapons and exhausting his strength in unavailing assaults upon a rock, which has stood, and will stand, unmoved and unimpaired, amid all the tempests of human passion and imbecility. There is around him a troubled ocean of moral and intellectual nature, which can only be hushed into repose by the power of the truth—that truth, through the instrumentality of the Bible, is, like the spirit of God at the creation, moving upon the bosom of the waters, and will yet impart quiet and peace to all their deep places and to all their bounds.

* See Drs. Good and Chalmers—Buckland, Jameison; Profs. Silliman and Mather; Bakewell's Geology, and American Journal of Science, vol. xxv, pp. 30–41.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1838.

JOHN VI: 22-40.

We wish some of our young friends would try such exercises as the one we are now about to present to them. Among the advantages which they would derive from a repetition of such, we may enumerate these:—the exertion of mind necessary, will add to its vigor and ability; every attempt to communicate thought in writing, makes each succeeding attempt more easy and more successful; and, those subjects upon which the mind has been engaged so much as is requisite to being able to communicate its thoughts in writing, and in a systematized and digested manner, are deeply and luminously impressed there, we might say indelibly, and, at least, more so than by any other method. Besides, when the subjects which occupy the mind are those connected with the revelation of Jesus, the Sent of God, it will be a subject of congratulation to every "good and honest heart," that, like Timothy, he, from a youth, was acquainted with the Scriptures, which are well fitted to emancipate us from the delusions, the bondage and bitterness of sin, and to introduce us into the service and kingdom of God's dear Son. To him who may be resolved to try this or some similar plan, we would say, persevere, be not discouraged, for great events have often small beginnings; children creep before they walk, and Rome, the mistress of the world, was not upbuilt in one day. An abundant harvest is certain; therefore, my son, persevere.

The following is, in substance, a letter from one of our young friends to one of his sisters:—"During the unoccupied hours of last week, my dear Harriet, I have been reflecting upon the former part of the sixth chapter of John's Gospel. You will perceive, on reference to this chapter, that Jesus, in commiseration for the multitudes who were continually accompanying him, and who on the present occasion seem to have been destitute of provisions, and probably far from any village where they could be supplied, miraculously provided for them. This miracle and the events of the night subsequent to its performance, are related by Matthew and Mark; the miracle itself by Luke. It is not usual with John to narrate anything which had been previously recorded, but you will see that no one of the other evangelists has added to his account of the miraculous transactions, any notice of the instructive lessons which our Saviour appended to them. Doubtless, it was for the sake of mentioning these that John again noticed a miracle, with which the Christians of his age had already become familiar in the narratives of the other historians of Jesus. In John's narrative, allusion is made to the grass in the place, in a manner some what different from that of the other narrators. Do you recollect the remark of Paley on this subject, upon which father made some remarks in illustration of Paley's acuteness, when we were reading his works?* There is another circumstance mentioned by John, which does not occur in the other memoirs—the effect of the miracle upon the multitude. They concluded that Jesus was indeed the prophet whom Moses had taught them to expect, (Deut. xviii: 15, 18,) and they held a council and made some movements to declare themselves independent of Herod and the Romans, and make Jesus their king. Probably they reasoned in this way—'This is the best proof we have had of this man's power, and his ability to lead and provide for our armies. This must be the Messiah we have been expecting, and now we believe he could really make us an independent and victorious people. Let the five thousand who are here, declare for him; more will soon join us; and under such a Leader we will soon rid us of Herod and the Romans.' This movement could only lead to excite the jealousy of the Romans, and provoke further oppressions; in consideration, therefore, of these evils which would fall upon them, if known to have been engaged in any insurrectionary movement, Jesus kindly put a stop to it by sending his disciples away by the lake, while he himself retired into some recess of the mountain. I have not the least doubt that the disciples were quite ready to join the multitude in this attempt; they had not, even at his death, renounced their hopes of the temporal kingship of their Master. Alas! Harriet, how hard it is for truth to prevail over early-imbibed opinions, and to rise from the outward and material, to the spiritual sense and aspect of religion.

"The blinded multitude disappointed of an opportunity of conferring with Jesus, or even his disciples, go eagerly in search of him in the morning, still entertaining, we may presume, the same views and intentions. When they did find him, their first question was one of mere curiosity, and mark, he makes no reply to it. My curiosity, my dear sister, has been often checked by the recollection of this, and of the answer which Peter received as stated in John xxi: 22. I have thought that were my divine Instructor beside me, he might ask me,—'Are there not subjects of more importance which might better employ your time and thoughts?'—Instead of making a direct reply, Jesus endeavors to turn the conversation to a more profitable subject. He first of all makes them understand that he knew their motive, and that it was a low one. They had not interpreted the late miracle aright, else they would have sought him as a divine Teacher, an instructor in heavenly wisdom, and not as a mere aid and assistant to the gratification of their animal appetites and political ambition. He tells them that there are enjoyments more worthy seeking after, than those which would arise from these sources; so much superior, indeed, are the enjoyments to which he gives the name of 'life eternal,' that they ought to absorb every thought, every desire, and every effort.—Compared with their desire after bodily food and political well-being, their desire after higher enjoyments should be so great that it might even be said that they did not desire the former at all. This corresponds exactly with Matt. vi: 33, to which father has so often invited our attention. I need not give you the thoughts which naturally arise out of each separate portion and verse of the remainder of this conversation, as it will be obvious to you, on reading it over, that Jesus intended to make two impressions upon his hearers. Firstly, he intended to make them understand that the chief thing which God required of them, was to give an unprejudiced interpretation to the miracles which they were daily observing, and to admit and act upon the conclusion to which they would thus be brought, which was, that he to whom this power was committed was that prophet, that king whom God had promised to raise up. This admission would inevitably lead to another, that all the instructions and requirements of this Heaven-anointed or commissioned prophet and king, were authoritative and obligatory. Secondly, Jesus meant to impress upon the audience that, as their God and Father had provided food to supply the wants of their fathers on their journey to the earthly Canaan, so He had also provided for the supply of higher wants—a more relishing, more satisfying food—for all on their journey to the heavenly Canaan. As manna came by Moses, so this better food came by the Messiah, a greater than Moses.

"In the common phraseology about eternal life, heaven, and such like expressions, there is much vagueness if not error. It would be a hard task for even the employers of them to translate them into language used in speaking or writing upon other serious subjects. They are cant phrases, and therefore, according to the just reasoning of the elegant Foster, ought to be excluded from good theological writings.* But if I mistake not, Harriet, the too common loose phraseology used in reference to these subjects, conceals a want of deep penetration into 'the things of the spirit.' Read any of the common commentators upon the 27th and 35th verses of this chapter, and consider if you have gained any really exact information as to the meaning. It has lately appeared to me that heaven, hell, salvation, eternal life, etc., are still too much thought of as something future, more than present. To me the reverse seems nearest the truth. To me 'everlasting life' brings, chiefly and primarily, the idea of present complete and enduring felicity. I think of the 'aching void' which all the ordinary pursuits and occupations of life fail to relieve. I think of the insufficiency of fame, wealth, rank, or power to satisfy the cravings of the soul. I think that all these gratifications were made unsatisfactory that man might never rest in his search after happiness, until he had found the infinite good—the everduring enjoyment which arises from communion with God—from harmony with the Supreme, and which is expressed in the common translation by 'eternal life.' I think not, when I hear these words, of a future world, a future enjoyment; I think only of the full-souled, satisfying, and exquisite enjoyments to the knowledge of which Jesus has introduced us. May we find, Harriet, when I return, that both of us know more of these, the only true enjoyments. All others are transient and unsatisfactory. Adieu, my dear sister, adieu. ——."

P. P.

* The observation here alluded to we can not quote in the words of Paley, but the amount of it is this,—The incidental circumstance here noticed, evidently shows that the writer was an eye-witness of what he records. P. P.

* See Foster's Essay on the Causes why Evangelical Religion is less acceptable to people of Taste. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

HYPOCRISY.

BY REV. C. S. HUSSEY.

"The painted hypocrites are known
Through the disguise they wear." WATTS.

Hypocrites (slanderers perhaps excepted) are the most despicable characters on earth, and should receive their unvarnished sentence from every honest man. Why be a hypocrite, when, it is by far easier to possess an upright and honest character, than it is to feign it? "He seems to be what he is not, but is not what he seems to be,"

"He steals the livery of the court of heaven
To serve the devil in,"

and the treacherous devil is so pleased with his consummate dupe, that he exhibits him in all his naked ugliness, to every one of common sense who knows him! Notwithstanding the coat of paint with which his lengthened visage is besmeared, he can not but be known.

Oh, the professor of religion, who does not possess one particle of it, who shuts up the kingdom of heaven against man, who devours widows' houses, or who

"With one hand,
Puts a penny into the urn of poverty,
And with the other takes a shilling out"— who compasses sea and land to make proselytes, "how can he escape the damnation of hell?"

Look at him. Here is his picture, substantially correct with all its lights and shades, drawn by that "intellectual man," Josiah Gregory, quoted by Dr. A. Clarke. "People of little religion are always noisy; he who has not the love of God and man filling his heart, is like an empty waggon coming violently down a hill—it makes a great noise, because there is nothing in it."

South Lyndeborough, Mass.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DECLINE OF UNIVERSALISM.

BY REV. J. POTTER.

I noticed in your paper a few weeks since, an extract from a correspondent on the "decline of Universalism" in western New-York. While we deplore the fact as existing in some portion of this region, it may be well to seek the cause, that we may be able to find a remedy. We remark, in the first place, that the inhabitants of this region are from different States, a common thing in all new settlements. Hence a diversity of feelings and habits are brought together. The accumulation of wealth, constituted the leading motive of the community; little attention was paid by the first inhabitants to religious institutions, and few opportunities have been sought for the cultivation of mutual intercourse and friendship. Under these circumstances, confidence, so essential, not only to the building up, but of holding society together, was feeble. In this state of things, those moral tempests called revivals of religion extended over this country, (where they have been more withering in their effects, perhaps, than in any other portion of New-York,) raising, through excitement, high expectations and hopes; driving some into the church and many into skepticism, and leaving those who had escaped the two extremes, standing at an awful distance apart, like the timid sheep who had escaped the jaws of the voracious wolf with trepidation and fear. When this state of things had passed off, an awful reaction came with all its disappointed hopes and concomitant misery.

In the mean time the doctrine of impartial grace had not been without its friends and advocates, and has been a "light shining in a dark place," and through its happy influence, many souls have been brought from the horrors of Partialism on the one hand, and from hopeless skepticism on the other, to the light of the Gospel of peace and universal salvation. But let it not be forgotten, that the converts to universal grace, have approached the kingdom of heaven with extreme caution, on account of the extravagance and abuse of religion which had been practiced by the dominant sects. Consequently they have been disposed to discard the idea of church organization; some at least have said, "that looks too much like the Orthodox."—Let the subject of the Lord's supper be proposed, and the objection will be raised, that such things are "too much like the Orthodox"—and, again, if meetings are proposed for mutual prayer, exhortation and praise, objections are raised on the ground, that it is "too much like the Orthodox." More to the same effect; but to the above objections there are honorable exceptions. But such reasoning comes, indeed, with an ill grace from Universalists, who value themselves on their clear sightedness in detecting the inconsistencies and false reasoning of others. Take the above for an example, and not only every ordinance, but even religion itself would be driven from the abodes of men; for what ordinance or doctrine is there in the Christian church that has not been abused by ignorant or designing men?—we may with the same propriety, refuse food, on the ground that some men had abused it, and had died of gluttony.

There are many of the doctrines of the self-styled orthodox, which ought to be abominated; but they have given examples of faithfulness and zeal in maintaining religious worship and organization, which are worthy of a better cause, and worthy the practice of every Christian. Universalists as a denomination have been too timid in taking upon themselves the responsibility of a religious profession, and thus have prevented mutual confidence more than has been done by all other causes combined. For this there is but one remedy, and that is, to throw off the garment of false delicacy, and be willing, not only to assume the name of Christian but to put in practice the Christian virtues and unite with each other in a more close organization. Then, and not till then, will each be willing to share in the responsibility which alone will inspire confidence, and each layman will then feel a responsibility in being in his proper place, realizing that he has a duty to perform as well as the preacher.

Dependence is the strongest bond of society—mutual responsibility will constitute mutual or joint interests, and furnish materials by which society can be permanently maintained and held together—an intimacy will be mutually sought, confidence strengthened, virtue promoted and happiness be the result.

He that proclaims to the world the superiority of Universalism over every other religious faith, evidently declares to the world a desire that his opinions should ultimately prevail; and, if sincere in his professions, he will use his influence to disseminate them to the world. Suppose he unites with others of the same mind in circulating a subscription and settling a preacher--are responsibilities lessened or increased by these acts?—Public expectation has undoubtedly been raised, and thereby obligations created to fulfil them;—but in all this who has become more responsible? the preacher has been settled, but is this the end of the whole matter? Some would come to the conclusion, that nothing more was required of the lay members, as the preacher was bound to fulfil his appointments at all events, and so all will be well of course. But are not the obligations of those who settled him, also increased?

The secret spring in all this standing aloof from organization, is the fear of personal responsibility—the fear of taking upon themselves the obligations of the Christian profession. The man pays his money for the support of Universalism, but neglects to give his own personal influence by his continued aid and attendance. Does not such a man know that he evinces to the world the greatest disrespect for his opinions, (and also of himself,) of which he is capable; and not only so, but he casts a gloom of discouragement over the congregation; and were he to tax his ingenuity to the utmost, he could not offer a greater insult to the minister. Is the minister bound by any obligation relating to the welfare of the cause, to be in his place? All will answer in the affirmative. For what purpose? To preach to empty walls and vacant seats? If the preacher is bound by his duty to the cause to be in the pulpit, the congregation are bound to be in their seats, by the same obligation. That cause which is worthy of support, should be promptly supported, or be abandoned altogether. To attempt to build up and maintain a healthy and respectable society out of materials who are unwilling to be mutually responsible to each other, is as impossible as it would be to build a fire of icicles.

To the remiss in duty we make our appeal.—Shall the predictions of opposers be verified, and the "daughters of the uncircumcised rejoice?"—May the respect for our own opinions, our own happiness and that of our families—for the bleeding cause of the Saviour of all men, and the well-being of the purchase of the Redeemer's blood, prompt each to commence the work, and by the time each shall have commenced the work in earnest, the result will be triumphant. "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things."

Lockport, January 31, 1838.

REMARKS.

Believing that I know well the tolerant and liberal feelings of Br. Potter towards those who conscientiously differ from him in opinion, and fearing that some expressions he has used may be understood as at variance with his kindly disposition, I presume to add a few remarks.

That a closer, more effective organization is needed among us, I am well persuaded—and that such organization should embrace moral qualifications in every stage, I have long contended—I can not, therefore, be misunderstood on this point. I have also used all my trifling influence to increase social feeling and intercourse, and to render religion more experimental and practical as well as rational, among Universalists. On this subject, also, I do not think my views or feelings can be misunderstood. But it would seem (falsely, I believe) that Br. Potter censures all who are opposed to what is called church organization, (meaning thereby church separate from society organization,) and the observance of what are called the ordinances, as baptism, eucharist, etc. I would condemn any man who should reject these, merely because to observe them "is too much like the Orthodox;" but all who reject them are not of this class—have other reasons for their opposition to them, and believe that instead of being beneficial, they are injurious to any good cause. I am free to confess myself, to a great extent, one of this class. However beneficial the ordinances may be to some, or in particular cases and modes of their observance—nay, even, however free I might be to administer or to partake of them if observed or administered free from objectionable adjuncts and views—yet I do believe that the making of them a sine qua non—attaching to them an undue importance—enforcing them as a duty obligatory on all, will do far more injury than good—will, in fact, do more injury than the present want of social organization, and practical piety and devotion. For one, I will not consent to attend even as a spectator, where, on their administration, a part of the ceremony consists in lecturing and censuring me for neglecting them! Let those who wish to observe them, do so in peace—let those who do not wish to observe them, abstain from their observance, in peace, also. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LETTER TO BR. T. J. SAWYER.

Dear Brother—Your opponent of past days, and of Maria Monk-memory, the Rev. Mr. Slocum, has lately visited Salina for the purpose of enlightening the people concerning Universalism. He delivered seven lectures in the Presbyterian meeting-house on the difficulties of Universalism, while Br. Barnes, pastor of the very excellent Universalist society in Salina, was absent, South. He commenced on Sunday evening, January 21st, and closed on the succeeding Sunday evening.—The first difficulty which he urged against our faith, was its denial of a future place of punishment. The second difficulty was, the denial of evil spirits, or fallen angels, or devils. The third difficulty was, the denial of a future general day of judgment. The fourth difficulty was, that Universalism denies all responsibility to the laws of God and men, and sanctions every vice committed since the creation of the world. The fifth difficulty was, that it denies the freedom of the will. The fourth and fifth lectures were occupied with an examination of Ballou's Atonement; or rather, in taking disjointed fragments of it, and like a school-boy, throwing spitballs at them. The sixth lecture was an abortive attempt to set aside the strong passages which prove the Restitution. The seventh lecture was occupied with recapitulation, unjustifiable slang against Universalists and their preachers, and was closed by an earnest request to his congregation not to hear my lectures, but to keep away from my sophistry. Suspecting, however, that his people would look upon this request as the offspring of fear, with dog-like courage when retreating, he declared that he was not afraid to meet every Universalist preacher in the United States.

By the request of our friends in Salina, I visited that place, and on the eve of Tuesday, January 31st, commenced a course of seven lectures in defence of Universalism, in the Presbyterian meeting-house, which was very liberally and kindly granted for our use. In the first lecture, the difficulties of endless misery were pointed out. In the second, the passages urged against our faith, were examined. In the third, the doctrine of punishment was considered. In the next three, the direct proofs of our faith were advanced. And in the last, its moral influence was set forth. In these lectures, the prominent objections advanced by Mr. Slocum were met; while it was shown, that his descriptions of Universalism were mere caricatures, or dreams of his own imagination. The lectures were well attended; much better than were Mr. Slocum's--while many of the Presbyterians did themselves and us the justice to hear the defence throughout. The whole affair has resulted in much benefit to the cause of Zion—many minds have been brought to ask themselves whether these things are so—inquiry has been awakened, and truth has been strengthened. And I may safely, in behalf of our good friends in Salina, return Mr. Slocum thanks for his attack; though it must, peradventure, be said to him, as Joseph said to his brethren, "but as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good."

While Mr. Slocum's lectures were in progress, a very gentlemanly letter was addressed him by Br. Sanderson, requesting his notes, that they might be publicly reviewed in the village of Salina. A letter was also forwarded to him from me, requesting him to attend my lectures, pledging myself that he should have ample time to reply to whatever he considered contrary to truth. In regard to both these letters, he preserved a contemptuous silence, thus giving us a practical commentary upon the sincerity of his declaration, that he had no fear in meeting Universalist preachers!!

Mr. Slocum descended to anecdotes, stale stories, and, as I should judge, apocryphal declarations, in order to substantiate his charges. He affirmed that Universalists often renounce their faith upon a death-bed; and he declared that he had been instrumental in altering the belief of a Universalist young lady in her last hours. He also affirmed that Universalism was not a good anchor in times of danger—and to illustrate this affirmation, he told of an individual, who was noisy in his Universalism, being upset either in the North or East river, and remaining in the water an hour or two, holding to the side of his boat, when, on being taken out, he confessed that his Universalism was all washed out of him. He also affirmed, that Universalists were evil-doers who waxed worse and worse—to prove which, he said that he was turned out of doors five times in one day while distributing Bibles in a place not over fifty miles from Salina. These stories were told without proof, names, dates, or definite circumstances; and as he refused to give more satisfactory statements concerning them, or rather, when addressed by me, preserved a profound silence in regard thereto, I think that we may class them with those things which are not true. And certainly, if he was turned out of doors five times in one day, every one will admit, that he must have been very unruly to deserve such treatment, and especially for five successive instances.

He mentioned his debate with you, and said that he had been treated like a gentleman by you, at the time he delivered fourteen lectures on the subject in New-York—which lectures, he said, were attended by a signal blessing; though on which side, whether of Universalism or Partialism, the blessing was found, he did not say. He also said, that you honorably acknowledged to him, that you could not set aside his arguments, and that the Universalist society in New-York thought so much of him, as to take up a collection for him, which he refused to take, and accordingly threw it back to them. (I give the sense of his statements, but not his words.) In addressing this letter to you, my object is, to get you to write a short letter in regard to these things, for the purpose of furnishing the inhabitants of Salina with information concerning them; as they, not having had means of such information, remain in the dark as to the truth of the matter. And, I trust that you will do so, if it should not be too great a trespass upon your time. GEO. W. MONTGOMERY.

Auburn, February 14, 1838.

LETTERS TO ROBERT OWEN.

Willing that good may be done by any one, whatever his views—and believing with the venerable writer of the following letters, that the rightly educated in science and in morals, are more likely to embrace Christianity and be ornaments of society, than the neglected, the ignorant and the uncultivated, I have consented to publish the following letters, although dissenting as widely from the views of the writer and Mr. Owen, on the practicability of the community system, as I do with the writer, from Mr. Owen's theological views. In my opinion, Mr. Owen's views of society can only be carried into effect under a despotic system of government—where one man's self-esteem and acquisitiveness shall be allowed arbitrarily to overrule and govern those of all the others. So that the nature of man must be changed, or the system fail just in proportion to the individual liberty granted by it.

But even admitting the system, in itself, to be adapted to the selfish, social, moral and intellectual powers of man, it can never be successful, so long as the religious faculties are not presented with something for their perfect gratification in accordance with the others.—Even Mr. Dudgeon acknowledges, that skepticism, or infidelity, is dis-social in its very nature and operations—consequently opposed to any social system—that this was the rock on which Mr. Owen has hitherto split his barque. Is no religion any better than skepticism and infidelity, that he hopes to succeed on the plan he now proposes? I fear not. I fear this scheme, should it be commenced, will fail as miserably as all that have preceded it. I fear it for the sake of the poor children, who will thus miss a good education and preparation to fill their place in the world; for that they will remain in the community where they were reared, after they have attained manhood and received liberty to depart, I no more believe, than I believe that Rasselas, as drawn by Dr. Johnson, is a libel on the wishes of the human heart. However, here are the letters—they speak for themselves of the views, as well as of the faith, benevolence and Christian charity of their writer. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate

LETTERS

From Thomas Dudgeon, of New-Hartford, Oneida county, New-York, to Robert Owens, Sen., Esq., of New-Harmony, Posey county, Indiana.

LETTER 1.

12th January, 1838.

DEAR SIR—The first time I had the pleasure of meeting you, was at your own home at New-Lanark, in Scotland, on the 2d of March, 1821.—On that occasion you made me a present of your publications on the New Views. After a careful perusal, I became a convert, as much so, perhaps, as one professing a belief in Christianity could be, to publications which rejected the Divinity of Christ. Many years ago I called on you at your lodgings in one of the Squares in the west end, London, and have occasionally heard of your unremitting and zealous efforts in the cause of humanity. About fifteen years ago, and previous to my leaving Scotland, being convinced that all appeals to kings and rulers had been (and in the present deplorable state of mankind, would be) fruitless, I projected a Seminary for orphans, founded on a conviction that nothing but early and good education, under favorable circumstances, could alter the moral condition of man. But owing to slender pecuniary means, perhaps my own incapacity, and the counteraction of prejudices in my domestic circle, I was not able to make even a commencement. However, I am not yet without hope that, old as you and I now are, we might still lay the foundation of progressive practical morality, trusting as I at least do, that the Creator might stir up means for its final accomplishment.

If fifty or a hundred illegitimate children under two years of age, were associated under your sole and exclusive management, with a few very select assistants, and located on a piece of good land, devised to them and their heirs in perpetuity, such an association would afford an opportunity of making a fair trial. I would prefer illegitimate children, because there would be less risk of the after interference of their parents. Perhaps the only conditions on which persons of different religions might co-operate in such an Institution as that alluded to, would be, that no religious doctrines or creeds of any kind should be taught to the members under 20 years of age; and of course, that nothing should be taught contrary to moral obligation. I allude more particularly to the case of the members entering into a marriage agreement:—fidelity in the broadest sense of the word, being, as you well know, paramount in all contracts, and in none involving weightier consequences than that of marriage.

You must now suffer me to speak a little of myself. Being sixty years of age, my usefulness, in a worldly sense, is past, excepting in such things as gardening, feeding silk worms, and tending bees. I have fifty acres of unencumbered property in this town. My wife and family, with it and my other property, can support themselves; and if it should please the Almighty to make me an instrument in the lowest capacity, to teach little children to do His will as contained in the Book called the New Testament, I would most willingly devote my few remaining years to the task, either in this country, or in Britain. And it is unnecessary to say that, excepting yourself, I know none with whom I could associate in prosecuting with hopes of success, so delightful a duty. In the matter of political institutions, perhaps this country would be preferable to Britain for the safety of a first experiment, but in the latter, better and more intelligent assistants could be much more easily obtained than here. Perhaps your sons would be the most suitable of any. I should require no compensation for my services, except the plainest food and clothing, and my travelling expenses to the Institution.

It is possible that you may desire to know why I left Scotland about six years ago. It was briefly this—I had been instrumental in 1818, of bringing before the public, the distressed situation of five hundred tenants effected on the Stafford Estate, in Sutherlandshire. I was dragged into litigation by the parasites of that powerful family, and I was apprehensive of a continuance of similar persecution, and ultimate ruin.

Whatever may be the result of this letter, I hope I have done my duty. And I remain with the greatest sincerity and respect, etc., etc.

LETTER 2.

20th January, 1838.

HONORED SIR—Although I know that you neither court nor value praise or honor, my Master desires us to give "honor to whom honor is due," and truly and sincerely, in my opinion, there is none to whom more is due than to yourself. Being ignorant of your address, I wrote you a letter a few days ago through your son Robert, addressed New-Harmony, Posey county, Indiana, and being very doubtful of its reaching him, I have sent a copy of it to Scotland, so as you may see it, perhaps in the Perth or Edinburg newspapers, or possibly in the Inverness Journal.

Since the year 1821, I have been more and more, as years increased, a convert to your admirable Views. It has occurred to me that, with equal benefit to your views, and to my own, which I think essentially the same, and with your permission I might publish at present, with good effect, another edition of those your works, which you kindly presented to me on the 2d of March, of that year.

You are a lover of candor, and I know that you will follow truth wherever it may lead us. I trust and hope that these are also my principles—my Master grant that I be not a self-deceiver! I propose to write in foot notes, commentaries on your works alluded to, namely "A New View of Society, 4th Edition, 1818, Report to the county of Lanark, 1821." As truth, and a fervent wish that an experiment of your plan should be instituted immediately, are my only objects, the commentary shall be a free one. But it will be drawn by the warm heart and hand of a friend to Jesus Christ, and to Robert Owen. As we are now old men, there is no time to lose in prosecuting both objects.

You may possibly recollect that, I more than once expressed my opinion in love to you, that your light had come, unknown to yourself, from HIM, and that you had happily adapted it to the present state of the civilized world. He says faith is a gift, and that few have received that gift; both you and He tell us distinctly that charity is greater than faith or hope. HE, 1 Cor. xiii: 13. You passim. Both of you condemn Sectarianism, religious persecution, and intolerance in every shape. And how often both have enjoined us to LOVE ONE ANOTHER it is impossible to enumerate. This is the rock of ages on which man is to be made rational, moral, and wise. Referring to my letter above alluded to, I am, with the highest esteem and regard, etc., etc,

HERALD OF TRUTH.

THE CAUSE IN WESTERN NEW-YORK.

Not the least among the evils which embarrass our cause in western New-York, may be reckoned the inefficient organization of societies. I have observed, that in most cases, the organization recognizes merely the letter of the statute law. Seldom have I known any written compact adopted, binding members to a faithful discharge of those duties, which relate to their permanent welfare as a society, and the cause in general. What objection can be urged against such a compact? Certainly no reasonable one. What is the ostensible purpose of religious societies? is it not to improve in an associate capacity, those religious privileges, which can not otherwise be conveniently enjoyed? Why, then, exclude the very thing which is the soul of your existence? Is the advancement of religious truth the primary object? Why, then, refuse to own the rules of those, on whose word your faith is predicated?

In your political conventions, you enthusiastically adopt resolutions, pledging, at the same time, your fidelity to them. Are you ashamed to do as much for the cause of Christ? what reason have you to do the one, that is not binding on you to do the other? An organization which merely complies with the statute law, is virtually a rejection of the very thing, for the good of which the society professes to be organized.—We can not but suspect that there is some unworthy motive concerned, when such a meagre organization occurs. If it has taken place only to more effectually oppose other sects, it had been good if it had not been born. Such an object is farthest imaginable, from the work which Universalists have to do.

If any thing, contrary to the commands of Christ, and of his apostles, was proposed, then might there be an unwillingness to our measure; but to acknowledge Christ as our Master, and his religion as the object of societies, and then refuse the salutary discipline which that religion affords, is to me a paradox of the worst kind. Why, men and brethren, look at it! Does your conscience approve your course?

Let the duty of each member of your society, as such, be prescribed. Then will you understand what you are to do; then will you understand each other; then will you know what to expect; then will you prosper, and not till then. It is not my design to suggest here what is a proper organization; every society must do what they, in their wisdom, conceive to be best? at another time I will give my views on this subject.

Every person, it is said, knows what his duty is.—This may be, but are there not duties wholly of a conventional character, as sacred and binding as those of an individual nature? There are, and we are summoned to obey them. Let the conference which has been called at Pavilion, be attended by our friends generally, and then let us see what can be done. G. S.

CONFERENCE AT PAVILION.

I wish to call the attention of our brethren, laity and clergy to this conference. We are expecting that something will be done, to more effectually advance the cause, in our western and southern counties. From these sections therefore, a very general attendance is expected. Do, brethren, give your attention to this matter at this time. Let there be a throng, whose united voices, shall reanimate the drooping, and revive the dead. The absence of any ministering brother, particularly, living within counties mentioned, will be exceedingly regretted. G. S.

A GENERAL CONFERENCE of the western and southern counties of this State, will be held at Pavilion, Genesee county, commencing on Tuesday, February 27th, for the purpose of devising and carrying into operation means demanded by the situation of the cause.

G. SANDERSON.

N. B. It is confidently expected that all our ministering brethren in the southern and western counties will be present. G. S.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1838.

TO YOUNG WRITERS.

There are many persons whose ideas are very excellent, but who, for the want of a little care and practice, express them weakly or awkwardly on paper. I have thought that a few brief hints might aid them very much, and, by encouraging them to practice the art of committing their thoughts to paper, not only lead them into a useful and pleasant acquisition, but benefit the public through them.

1. When a subject of more than ordinary beauty or importance occurs to you, commit it to paper very widely ruled, in the words and phrases that come most readily to mind, and in the order in which its several thoughts occur. Now you have the subject.

2. Look over it, and see whether the several portions of the subject most naturally and easily follow each other, and number or otherwise mark their place, on the sheet, until you have all the parts arranged in regular order. You now have the divisions, and the order thereof, of the subject,

3. Examine the first sentence, and see if there are any improper words in it—by which I mean, not only uncouth terms, and abbreviations, as can't, won't, etc.; but words which do not fully, or clearly express your meaning. Strike out all such, and think over in your mind those you would substitute, (selecting the most expressive and plainest, as well as smoothly sounding,) and insert them above those you have crossed out. You now have the proper words.

4. Carefully examine the order in which the words follow each other—imagine how you would speak your subject to a parent, or a teacher; or try to remember how they occur in similar sentences in some good authors. Having ascertained their proper dependence on each other, and how they will best convey your meaning unbroken, without concealing or weakening the most important idea in each sentence, letter or otherwise mark them, so that you may know in what order they should be arranged. You now have the order of all the sentences and all the words.

5. If you have made many erasures, interlineations and other marks, it will now be necessary to copy off what you have written. In doing this, see what alterations are necessary in the connectives and particles (small words, as of, with, and, or, but, etc.)—also in the terminations (as—ing, ant, ly, ry, etc.)—in order to accommodate the changes already marked in the order of the words and sentences. When copied, look over the whole article once more, strike out all unnecessary words or sentences, and add those you yet find necessary to express your meaning, and make such other improvements as your mind may suggest, in order to render the article a perfect transcript of your best and chasest thoughts on the subject.

6. One caution here.—Be not too hasty in rejecting what is already written, or in adopting what at first view, may seem an improvement. Read the whole connection with, and then without the alteration, and see that it corresponds with the rest of the article. ALSO—endeavor so to regulate the order of your thoughts, that the sentences or paragraphs may keep improving in interest, beauty, or strength to the close—and, in the language of Dr. Witherspoon, altered so as to apply to writing instead of speaking—"Be sure never to begin, till you have something to write; and always be sure to quit, when you are done writing"—i. e. when your subject is neatly closed. Many a piece loses all its effect, by having a dull, prosing draining of the grounds, after all the clear liquor has been drawn off!

7. Having thus corrected your article, copy it off in a neat, clean, fair hand, and submit it to the inspection of a father, mother, or some kindly elderly person of your acquaintance, in whose judgment you can confide, and whose affection for you will lead him or her to point out all its defects, and teach you how to correct them.

8. Another caution.—Never seek your model in the editorial of the Magazine and Advocate—they are too often written because they must be written, to be according to any rules its Editor may give for the use of others. Doctors, you know, never take their own medicines!

The above may seem a laborious mode, but it will soon become easy, and will well pay those who practice it, by their improvement. Gibbon wrote over the first parts of his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, about half-a-dozen times; and Goldsmith owes all his celebrity as a poet, to frequent and careful corrections and transcribings. He wrote but little, but who would not wish to write as well!

This is enough for one lesson—in a future number I will add a few further directions. A. B. G.

PHRENOLOGY.

The system of mental and moral philosophy, known by the name of "Phrenology," is one, upon which to remark is harping upon a theme, almost as trite, perhaps, in the newspapers, as the subject of a temperance address, or of a fourth of July oration. Yet, although frequent allusion to these things has made them somewhat wearisome, the principles which they involve should never be unknown or forgotten.

So with Phrenology. It has been much before the public these few years past, in one shape or another, until the eyes and ears of many have, possibly, become disgusted. It may be, therefore, that our readers are weary of the topic, and would rather that we should occupy these columns with a dissertation upon some other subject. But we trust that they will excuse our frequent recurrence to it, when we tell them—that we consider the principles of Phrenology of great importance—that if rightly understood and practiced, its public and private utility will be great—and that it is a science which has as yet comparatively few defenders, and therefore we would that it should have a hearing and a prominent place before the community.

With these preliminary remarks, we would say, that our object in speaking of Phrenology at this time, is to enter our protest against the manner of propagating a knowledge of it, which is pursued by some. There are those who traverse the length and breadth of our land, telling people their characters by feeling of their heads, and who thus degrade the system to a level with the performances of a dancing bear or of "the learned pig." Many people, we presume, regard Phrenology as a kind of fortune-telling jugglery, being of the same stamp with nosology, chiromancy and wizzardism in general. So much for the favor which itinerant bump-feelers confer upon Phrenology!

Let us be understood. We do not deny that Phrenology professes to decide upon character by the configuration of the head—health, education, temperament etc., being taken into consideration—this is one of its great doctrines, and, indeed, the exactness with which true Phrenologists have been enabled to pronounce upon individual character under various circumstances, is, we deem, an unanswerable argument in favor of its truth. Neither do we object to lectures delivered in our towns and villages by travelling lecturers, who are men really acquainted with the principles and the application of the science—men capable of illustrating, defending and improving the yet crude system. Neither are we opposed to the examinations of the organs upon individual heads, when performed by such men for the purpose of illustrating their lectures, of convincing or endeavoring to convince the skeptical, or even of satisfying occasionally, private curiosity. Persons of science will, of course, or should, so treat the science as not to degrade it in the eyes of scientific individuals who do not believe its doctrines. These we are not objecting to. But we are objecting to those who possess but a superficial knowledge of the system, and that more craniological than phrenological, and go before the public as lecturers upon, and expounders of the science.

Here are some of the evils of this practice. In their decisions upon individual character, they as often, perhaps, hit wrong as right, ay, perhaps oftener, and the uncandid and the ignorant call all the mistakes of their lack of knowledge, carelessness or vanity, evidences against the truth of Phrenology itself. Again, scientific men, those whose influence and knowledge would be of powerful avail if enlisted in favor of Phrenology, become disgusted with these exhibitions of it, and refuse to examine into its principles, and thus their aid, so much needed, is lost to it. Again, the public become so wearied with it from what they have previously seen and heard, that they refuse to come near the lectures of one qualified to explain and defend the science, when such an one does appear. Thus Magazines and Reviews carricature and ridicule it—scientific men laugh at it and treat it as a humbug—the credulous on the other hand, look upon it as a sort of weird mystery—the great mass of the people who should be enlightened by it, remain in ignorance of it, or view it through false mediums—and the real objects of the system, in reference to philosophy, education, morals and religion are almost wholly lost sight of.

Now we do beseech those who would be informed concerning Phrenology, not to look for light upon the subject from the superficial lecturers who travel here and there. Scientific Phrenologists are generally well known, and are the proper persons to look to for information in regard to the system. But we venture to predict, that you will find such rather averse to the feeling of heads. Spurzheim taught them better. We also hope that inquirers into Phrenology will look upon it as something superior to a mere theory of bumps.—We would say to them, study the living head. Read Gall, and Spurzheim, and Combe, and Macnish. Form societies—take journals devoted to or treating of the science—gather together casts, busts, masks, charts, etc.—and bring into your regular meetings the products of individual information. By these and any other practical means, learn thoroughly the theory and the principles of Phrenology. When that theory and those principles are better known, and understood, and practiced upon, then will Phrenology assume its true dignity and importance, and be regarded as one of the greatest and most beneficial discoveries of modern times. E. H. C.

UNIVERSALISM.

In Richmond, Va.—It appears that the doctrine of God's impartial grace must be gaining ground in this section, as its opponents seem to attack it covertly, without allowing its friends an opportunity for defence. We have received a closely printed pamphlet of 12 pages, entitled—"The Faith of Universalists: Being a defence of this denomination of Christians and their views, against an abusive article published against them by Rev. William S. Plumer, in a paper edited by him, entitled, the 'Watchman of the South,' of the 28th of December, ult., who declined publishing a reply, or correcting the gross misrepresentation. By the committee of the First Independent Christian Church, Richmond, Va."

The meeting which appointed this committee was held January 21st, at the close of public service—R. Poore, chairman—and the committee consisted of R. Poore, S. S. Saunders, and W. W. Dunnavant. The pamphlet contains a statement of the facts—that Mr. Plumer, pastor of the first Presbyterian church in Richmond, published an article classing Universalism with infidelity, representing the former as worse than atheism, and declaring that it held forth endless bliss as the reward of the thief, robber, assassin, pirate, liar, perjurer, fornicator and adulterer! A mild letter, correcting these foul misrepresentations, was sent to Mr. Plumer for publication; but it not appearing or being noticed for two weeks, a polite note was sent him, requesting its return, if he had made up his mind not to insert it. It was returned, in silence! Then follows a full statement of the organization of Universalists—that the Bible, only, is their creed—and giving an outline of their views, similar to the General Profession of Faith, Covenant, etc., published a few years ago by the Universalist church in Utica. This is followed by a general reply to several classes of objections urged against Universalism, and a brief list of many eminent men who in former ages held the sentiment. It can not but be that this candid appeal to reason and the Scriptures will have a salutary effect on the minds of candid and rational people, aroused to examine the subject, by the ungenerous, one-sided conduct, and unfounded calumnies of our opposers.

Buffalo.—An esteemed friend informs us that the society in Buffalo is increasing in numbers, and is well pleased with the labors of Br. Pickering in building up the cause of the Redeemer.

Scipio, Cayuga county.—Br. H. Boughton writes us, that the cause of truth is going forward there with as much rapidity as could be expected. He says—"I have labored here between two and three years, and have had all those difficulties to surmount, which, I suppose, beset the pathway of every young minister of the Gospel—such as prejudice, want of confidence, and scarcity of friends. But, thank God! times have somewhat changed—prejudice has been removed to a great extent, confidence has increased, friends have multiplied, and we have now the amount raised for building a house of worship—a deed obtained for the lot, and next Saturday (27th January) a contract will be consummated with a mechanic for building it." God prosper the good work, and continue to bless our brother's ministry.

St. Lawrence county.—Br. Sias informs us, that during his recent tour in this county, he found the cause in a prosperous state. He says—"the labors of our faithful brethren in St. Lawrence county, have been blessed, indeed. The practical influence of Universalism has been particularly enforced, and thus the superficial and merely speculative believers have been led onward into the practical application of their faith, and filled with the joy and rejoicing of obedience to the Gospel of Jesus." I am persuaded that no man can be considered as firmly rooted and grounded in the principles of the Gospel—nor even secure and unwavering in his belief of Universalism until he has practiced it—perceived and felt by happy experience, its perfect adaptation to the whole nature, condition and wants of man. Such a Universalist is proof alike to the terrors of Partialism and the doubts of skepticism.

A. B. G.

Agents in Philadelpaia.—Subscribers in the vicinity of Philadelphia city, may pay to Br. A. C. Thomas, 130 Walnut-street; or to Br. S. W. Fuller, 133 Vine-street. G. and H.

CONFERENCE AT WORCESTER.

In our last, the question was asked whether we should publish the notice of a conference at Worcester, notwithstanding the one already published of a conference at Burlington Flats. In the absence of Br. Grosh, who has gone to the last named conference, we would inform our readers that we have received a letter from Br. Whiston, in compliance with which we publish the following notice. E. H. C.

Conference.—There will be a conference held at Worcester, Otsego county, on Wednesday and Thursday 28th of February and 1st of March. Preaching may be expected three times on each day.

O. Whiston.
E. E. Guild.

To Correspondents.—We learn that some of our money flush farmers and others are "salting down" New-York Safety Fund bills, believing that they will be as good at any other time as at the present. Now we poor Editors and Publishers are fain to spend faster than we can get them, and to buy more at an advance of 6 or 7 per cent, on Eastern bills, in order to meet some of the payments that are continually falling due—for we can not meet all, even then. But I will tell you how we imitate our great capitalists. Next Spring and Summer will, we fear, be a scarce time for communications. So we "salt down" some of those you send us, which we believe will keep till that time. This will account in some cases, for the non-appearance of a few of the articles you may send us. We would put away more, but the demand for present use will not permit.

A. B. G.

ITEMS.

Richard Quinton, of Berlin, Illinois, is informed that we have received no communication from J. B. Broadwell, for more than two years.

Br. Perry, Reading, will please do as he suggested.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. Biddlecom at Hartwick, and at Hinman's Hollow in the evening—Br. Bullard at Libertyville and at Ithaca in the evening—Br. W. Rounseville at McLean and at Groton Hollow in the evening.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in March, by Br. Sias at Perch River—Br. Foster in Constantia—Br. Martin at the school-house at the New Bridge at 10, A. M., at Clay Corners at 2 P. M., and at Cold Spring Settlement in the evening—Br. M. B. Smith in Clinton, and in Hampton in the evening, on the Parable of the sheep and goats—Br. Grosh in this city; subject for the evening, Mark ix: 43-48—Br. Sias at Perch River—Br. Bullard at Tully and at Lafayette in the evening (instead of March 11th)—Br. Rounseville at Cortland and at Truxton in the evening—Br. C. B. Brown at the Court-House in Pulaski—Br. Goodrich at Preston Corners.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in March, by Br. Biddlecom in Stockbridge and Br. Woolley in Marshall, and in the evening at Oriskany Falls—Br. C. B. Brown at South Onondaga, and in the evening at the Baptist meeting-house on South Hill—Br. Waggoner at Carthage and at Lowville in the evening.

Br. Sias will preach on the evenings of March 5th, at Theresa, 6th, at Oxbow, 7th, at Sommerville, 8th, at Foster's Settlement, 12th, at Boilston as Br. Baker may appoint, 13th, at Orwell as Br. Fox may appoint, 15th, at Mannsville.

Br. Waggoner will preach on the evenings of March 4th, at Trenton Falls—5th, at West Martinsburg—6th, at Burrville—7th, at Adams village—8th, at Ellisburg.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

C L, Camillus, for self, W T, and S D—P M, Denmark, for L P and J F—Rev. O W. Fowler, for J G—T H, Lodi, (Ills.) for self, T E, J T, and J V—P M, Elba, for J G—S B W, Cobleskill for G T—S P, Newburg, (Ills.) for self and J L— P M, Barre Centre, for T S B—P E, Utica, (Mich.)—Rev. G W M, Auburn, for F M, and C H A W—J B M, Plato, for self, P H Jr, and J D—E T, Louisville—P M, Geddes, for G H D—P M, Middleport, for L S, and D W—Rev. W B, Cortlandville, for B H, A G, C W, and A F—P M, Lodi, (Mich.) for self, L L B, and D H—J K, Belvedere (Ills.) for self, and S P L—P M, Cooperstown, for J W C, S M, and E B—G C, Louisville, (Ky.) for self, W O, E A and J M S—Rev. L P, Panama, for sundry subscribers—P M, Willoughby, (O.) for J W, and G and S—Rev. C H, Royalton, for J W, L J B, H S, S H, S R D, and C P N—M H G, Avon—P M, Cortland Town, for self, and J A.

POETRY.

There is a breathing of delicate and beautiful thought through the following lines, and, though exhibiting the traits of a young and inexperienced writer, they contain, in our opinion, the buddings of poetic excellence. They will possess an additional interest to our readers, when we inform them, that they are the production of a young lady in delicate health. The following and other articles which we have from the same pen, were not intended, when written, for publication. We trust, if it be His will, that the writer may be spared, to teach us and many, through the hallowed medium of poetry, "the beauty of holiness," and the things of peace. E. H. C.

For the Magazine and Advocate

LINES.

"For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven."

With joy I leave the heartless throng
Who follow pleasure's train—
To share with them the mirth and song
Will ever be in vain.

Oh, I can ne'er be happy, where
No kindred soul I find—
Where all is false as meteor's glare,
And rude and unrefined.

When I amid the dancers stand,
Where hearts are light and glad,
'Tis I alone, of all the band,
Whose thoughts are drear and sad.

Gay forms move on before my sight—
I hear sweet music's tone,
And 'mid the melody and light,
I feel I am alone!

I've heard the voice of flatt'ry long,
But oh! it does not please.—
I'll listen to the low, sweet song
Borne on the evening breeze.

And, when I hear its magic tones,
'Twill calm my troubled breast—
'Twill whisper softly of a home,
Where all the weary rest. L. H. W.

Gainesville, 1837.

FAITH AND HOPE.

One morning, as the sun arose, two spirits went forth upon the earth.

And they were sisters. But Faith was of mature age, while Hope was yet a child.

They were both beautiful. Some loved to gaze on the countenance of Faith, for her eye was serene, and her beauty changed not: but Hope was the delight of every heart.

And the child sported in the freshness of the morning; and as she hovered over the gardens and dewy lawns, her wings glittered in the sunbeams like the rainbow.

"Come, my sister," she cried, "and chase with me this butterfly from flower to flower."

But her sister was gazing at the lark as it rose from its low nest and warbled among the clouds.

And when it was noon, the child said again, "Come, my sister, and pluck with me the flowers of the garden; for they are beautiful and their fragrance is sweet."

But Faith replied, "Nay, my sister, let the flowers be thine; for thou art young, and delightest thyself in their beauty. I will meditate in the shade, till the heat of the day be past. Thou wilt find me beside the fountain in the forest. When thou art weary, come and repose on my bosom.

And she smiled and departed.

After a time, Hope sought her sister. The tear was in her eye, and her countenance was mournful.

Then Faith said, "My sister, wherefore dost thou weep, and why is thy countenance sad?"

And the child answered, "Because a cloud is in the sky, and the sunshine is overcast. See, the rain begins to fall."

"It is but a shower," Faith replied; "and when it is over, the fields will be greener and the flowers brighter than before."

Now the place where they sat was sheltered from the rain, as it had been from the noon-day heats. And Faith comforted the child, and showed her how the waters flowed with a fuller and a clearer stream as the shower fell.

And presently the sun broke out again and the woods resounded with song.

Then Hope was glad and went forth to her sports once more.—

After a time, the sky was again darkened. And the young Spirit looked up, and, behold! there was no cloud in the whole circle of the heavens.

Therefore Hope marvelled, for it was not yet night.

And she fled to her sister, and cast herself down at her feet, and trembled exceedingly.

Then Faith raised the child, and led her forth from the shade of the trees, and pointed to the sun and said,

"A shadow is passing over the face thereof, but no ray of his glory is extinguished. He still walketh in brightness, and thou shalt again delight thyself in his beams. See! even yet, his face is not wholly hidden from us."

But the child dared not look up, for the gloom struck upon her heart.

And when all was bright again, she feared to wander from her sister, and her sports were less gay than before.—

When the eventide was come, Faith went forth from the forest shade, and sought the lawn, where she might watch the setting of the sun. Then said she to her young sister,

"Come and behold how far the glories of the sunset transcend the beauties of the morning. See how softly they melt away, and give place to the shadows of night."

But Hope was now weary. Her eye was heavy, and her voice languid. She folded her radiant wings, and dropped on her sister's bosom, and fell asleep.

But Faith watched through the night. She was never weary, nor did her eyelids need repose.

She laid the child on a bed of flowers, and kissed her cheek. She also drew her mantle round the head of the sleeper, that she might sleep in peace.

Then Faith looked upwards, and beheld how the stars came forth. She traced them in their radiant courses, and listened to their harmonies, which mortal ear hath not heard.

And as she listened, their music entranced her soul.

At length, a light appeared in the east, and the sun burst forth from the portals of the heaven.

Then the Spirit hastened to arouse the young sleeper.

"Awake, O my sister! awake!" she cried. "A new day hath dawned, and no cloud shall overshadow it. Awake! for the sun hath risen which shall set no more!"—Miss Martineau.

NATURAL LAWS.

The following extract, showing the necessity of understanding and obeying the laws of nature, is taken from Combe's Moral Philosophy.

Although the natural laws act independently, in the manner pointed out in the immediately preceding lecture, certain relations have been established among them, which tend to support the efficacy and authority of the whole. Obedience to each law increases our ability to obey the others, and disobedience of one disables us to some extent from paying deference to the rest. The man who, by obeying the physical and organic laws, preserves his body in vigorous health, is thereby better enabled to obey the moral and intellectual laws: he is rendered capable of laboring for the necessaries of life, a sufficiency of which is indispensable to the due action of the higher faculties of the mind. In like manner, by obeying the intellectual laws, in studying the constitution of ourselves and the material universe, and the relations which subsist between them, we enable ourselves to obey the organic and physical laws to a far greater extent than would otherwise be possible. In short the whole of God's laws are found to support each other, and to act together harmoniously for our welfare.

Descending now to particular duties, we may first consider those prescribed to man as an individual, by his own constitution and that of the external creation. The constitution of man seems to show that the object of his existence on earth is to enjoy his being, and to prepare for a higher sphere of life hereafter: its indications thus essentially agreeing with the Assembly's Catechism, which represents the chief end of man to be, "to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever." By the glorification of God, however, we understand not only obedience to his revealed will, but also the study and observance of his laws written in the book of nature—laws which, when obeyed, lead to virtue and happiness, but, when infringed, to vice and misery. Obedience to the Divine laws—or, what is the same thing, performance of our duties—is the prime requisite; then comes enjoyment; and the glory of God shines forth as the result of these two combined. His wisdom and power are strikingly conspicuous when we discover a system apparently complicated, to be in itself, simple, clear, beautiful, and beneficent; and when we behold his rational creatures comprehending his will, acting in harmony with it, reaping all the enjoyments which his goodness intended for them, and ascending in the scale of being by the cultivation and improvement of their nobler powers, the glory of God strikes every intelligent mind as surpassingly great.—A deep conviction then arises, that the only means by which we can aspire to advance that glory, is to promote, where possible, the fulfilment of the Creator's beneficent designs, and sedulously to co-operate in the execution of his plans. When the object of human existence is regarded in this light, it becomes evident that obedience to every natural law is a positive duty imposed on us by the Creator, and that infringement or neglect of it is a sin or transgression of his will. Hence we do not promote the glory of God by merely singing his praises, offering up prayers at his throne, and performing other devotional duties, if, at the same time, we neglect the physical, organic, or moral laws. Every law of God, however proclaimed to us—whether made known in his word or in his works—has an equal claim to observance; and as religion consists in revering God, and obeying his will, it thus appears that the discharge of our daily secular duties is literally the fulfilment of an essential part of our religious obligations.

If these views be sound, the first duty of man as an individual is obviously to acquire knowledge of himself, of revelation, and of nature. He has intellectual faculties clearly intended to be used in making this acquisition; a wide range of action is permitted to all his powers, with pleasure annexed to the use, and pain to the abuse of them; and he is liable to suffer grievously from the objects and beings around him, unless by means of knowledge he accommodates his conduct to their qualities and modes of action. Being little guided by instinct, he must either employ his understanding or suffer misery. Important, however, as knowledge of nature thus appears to be, it is surprising how recently the efficient study of it has begun. It is not more than three centuries since the very dawn of philosophy; and some of the greatest scientific discoveries have been made within the last fifty or sixty years. We, who now live, perceive only the day-spring of intelligence. The greater part of the world is still in utter darkness; and even in Europe, it is only the more gifted minds who see and appreciate their true position. These, from the Pisgah of knowledge, gaze upon the promised land of virtue and happiness stretched out before their intellectual eye; distant, indeed, but not inaccessible—and sufficiently near to permit them to descry, however faintly, its beauty and luxuriance.

"If there is any sentiment of most value, for the comfort, the character, the virtuous sociability of the young—one that will shed the greatest charm over society, and make it the most pure—it is that which inculcates perfect delicacy and purity in the intercourse of the sexes. Virtue of any kind never blooms when this is not cherished. Modesty and purity once gone, every flower that would diffuse its fragrance over life, withers and dies with it. There is no one sin that withers and blights every virtue—none that so enfeebles and prostrates every ennobling feeling of the soul, as to indulge in a life of impurity. How should purity dwell in the heart; breathe from the lips; kindle in the eye; live in the imagination, and dwell in the intercourse of all the young!"—Barne's Notes.

MARRIAGES.

In Ulysses, Pa., September 23d, 1837, by O. A. Lewis, Esq., Mr. John Monroe, to Miss Lucy Lewis, all of that place.

Also, December 24th, by the same, Mr. Elijah Gridley, to Miss Esther A. Lewis, both of the above named place.

DEATHS.

In Constantia, February 1st, of dropsy on the brain, Mr. Charles Traver, Jr., in the 22d year of his age. Funeral on the 2d, attended by a large concourse of relatives, friends and neighbors. Sermon by Br. W. Martin, from Job xiv: 14.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH.

Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 1838. NUMBER 9.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER II.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

EARLY ASSOCIATES.

The love of society is an emotion deeply implanted in human nature. To be in the presence of our fellow-beings, to interchange thoughts, emotions and opinions, upon subjects mutually interesting, is a source of high intellectual and social enjoyment. This inclination for society, termed by Phrenology "Adhesiveness," has been exhibited in all ages. Amid the blooming beauties of Eden, the happiness of our father Adam was not complete, until a companion was provided to be the sharer of his thoughts and his joys. In childhood, this propensity for society is early developed. Children evince an exceeding fondness for each other's company; and soon they form those friendships and attachments, which frequently continue through life.

The social inclination appears to exist more strongly in woman than in man. Under the influence of misanthropic feelings, man sometimes so far violates the promptings of his nature, as to withdraw from all intercourse with his fellow-beings, and in the gloomy mountain cavern, or the far recesses of the forest, pass his days in dreary solitude. But in the whole history of our race, I know not that there is an instance recorded, where woman thus voluntarily banished herself from society. It is well known that females in the years of childhood and youth, exhibit to a high degree this love of social intercourse. They delight to mingle together; and by a mutual disposition to please, they confer enjoyment upon each other. These feelings are natural and proper; and the young should be allowed to indulge them to a consistent extent.

The influence exercised upon young ladies by their associates, must necessarily be great, and will exert an important tendency in the formation of character. "We are all," says Locke, "a kind of camelions, that take a tincture from the objects that surround us." It is a maxim of Solomon, that "he that walketh with wise men shall be wise, but a companion of fools shall be destroyed." And the same wise man utters another admonition of similar import—"Make no friendship with an angry man, and with a furious man thou shalt not go; lest thou learn his ways, and get a snare to thy soul." These maxims are founded upon the well known propensity in human nature, to imitate the characteristics of those with whom we associate. We slowly, yet surely, imbibe a certain degree of the disposition, tastes and habits, whether good or bad, of our companions. Their peculiarities in thinking, speaking and acting, gradually become ours, and we ere long, in a measure, see with their eyes, and hear with their ears.

How necessary, then, young ladies, that you should exercise great precaution and circumspection, in the selection of your associates of both sexes. You should not trust this matter entirely to chance—you should not mingle indiscriminately with whatever company you may casually come in contact; but with prudence and care, should you select those with whom you would associate and form intimacies. You can not be too careful in regard to the character, habits and accomplishments of those whom you choose for companions. An associate of loose morals, of low and indelicate habits, whose conversation is vulgar, and whose general demeanor is uncultivated, will exercise an influence over you, the deleterious consequences of which may be ruin and wretchedness. Mankind seem to imbibe vicious habits more readily than those that are virtuous. This can be accounted for on no other principle, than that exertion, industry and perseverance, are necessary to acquire or retain virtuous habits against the assaults of vicious temptations—while to become corrupt and depraved, it is only requisite that we allow our mental and moral powers to remain in a quiescent, indolent state, and permit the passions to obtain that control which they are ever seeking. Hence, one corrupt companion with whom you are intimate, will often counteract and overthrow all the admonitions and persuasions to virtue, that can be brought to bear upon you. But the influence of pure and virtuous companions, can not but be salutary and beneficial.

Community will judge your character by the character of your associates. If you seek the company of those who are circumspect, prudent and well-informed, it will evince to the world that you highly estimate these qualifications, and you will be proportionately exalted in public estimation. But if you mingle with the rude and vulgar, people will readily conclude you are drawn into such associations by a similarity of taste and inclination, and will judge you accordingly. And when a young lady once awakens suspicions in this manner, as to her character, it is difficult—exceedingly so—to free herself from dishonorable imputations!

The counsel of parents, and of tried friends more advanced in life, should be duly heeded in selecting associates. You may be blinded by prepossession to the faults of those with whom you would mingle; but others, uninfluenced by improper bias, can more distinctly perceive the imperfections of your companions, and are thus enabled to warn you of the dangers to which you may be exposed—and wise is she, who will listen to and obey such precautions.

That the young should be fond of sprightly company and of cheerful conversation, is to be expected—it is the natural inclination of their age, when all the emotions are vigorous and elastic. When these bouyant feelings are controlled by modesty and characterized by sense, they may be indulged to advantage. But while you are at liberty to select associates who are cheerful, see that you do not choose those who allow their animation to degenerate into levity and immorality; but rather those whose free flow of good feeling, is the medium of the acquisition or communication, of useful information or accomplishments. Wisdom and knowledge may be arrayed in garbs that are cheerful and pleasing.

I would not have young ladies too fastidious in the choice of associates, or imagine they must look alone to the higher circles in society, either for companions or examples; for, unfortunately, these circles are often deficient in both, of value. It is better to select those with whom you would form friendships from the circle to which you belong, than to choose unworthy associates from a higher class. You should not look for perfection in any of your fellow-beings—you will perceive failings in the most perfect. But there are certain general characteristics which those with whom you associate should possess. They should be kind and amiable in disposition, and discreet, prudent and modest in deportment—they should possess sound morals, and have a due regard to religious subjects—they should be free from habits of fault-finding and tale-bearing, free from indolence and slovenliness—they should not be attached to gaieties of a frivolous character, or in love with those amusements which exert a deleterious influence upon public morals—they should possess sound understandings and well-informed minds, or minds that are inclined to seek for useful information. With such, associate, and from among them choose those with whom you would form friendships and intimacies. But shun those who are deficient in these valuable qualifications.

While the greater proportion of the above will apply to associates not only of your own sex, but of the opposite, I, nevertheless, would indite a few precautions in especial reference to the latter. It is very proper that you should associate with young men, under the salutary restrictions of propriety and good breeding. But if it is necessary that you should be cautious in regard to your companions of your own sex, how much more important that you should exercise great prudence in relation to the character of the young men with whom you associate—especially of those with whom you are intimate! Make it a fixed principle of conduct, never to countenance the attentions or the company of young men who are profane, or dishonest, or intemperate, or addicted to any improper or dissolute habits. Their society is dangerous—your respectability and happiness are hazarded by associating with them—and to form a connection with them for life, would be extremely liable to entail wretchedness upon you.

Avoid, also, the society of flatterers. They are an unworthy, and generally an unprincipled class. The man who endeavors to flatter you, insults your understanding, by taking it for granted you are so weak-minded as not to perceive the emptiness of his fulsome adulation. The flatterer has never a good motive in view—he never flatters to benefit you—and although his words may fall upon your ears with honied sweetness, yet remember, they are filled with the poison of pollution and moral death. William Penn, in writing to his daughters, gave them this salutary advice—"Avoid flatterers, for they are thieves in disguise—their praise is costly, designing to injure those they bespeak—they are the worst of creatures—they lie to flatter, and flatter to cheat—and, which is worse, if you believe them, you cheat yourselves most dangerously." With young men who are moral, virtuous and industrious, who have some laudable occupation, whose habits are pure and upright, who honor and respect your sex, and are under the sway of correct religious principles, you can freely associate, with mutual improvement and benefit.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1838.

MATTHEW XVIII: 21-35.

The passage selected for this week's consideration, is that which contains the parable of the unforgiving servant. There is no difficulty for the veriest tyro to understand this parable; it is so very plain that it requires scarcely a line of explanation. The difficulty is not in understanding it, but in getting the lesson which it conveys, impressed upon our moral constitution and habits. As we are writing, principally, to and for the benefit of those who are just entering upon the practical study of the "oracles of God," and upon the Christian life and warfare, we shall be sparing, in what seems little needed, explanatory remarks; and make it our chief object to inculcate the duty and the habit of long-suffering, gentleness, placability, and readiness to forgive. We think an inquiry into the sense of the many passages in which we find this virtue recommended and enforced, is one of the principal duties of the young disciple of Jesus, inasmuch as the ordinary occurrences of life must very frequently remind him of his imperfections and short-comings in the regulation of the angry and revengeful emotions. In this respect we "fail and come short" daily. The want of happiness attendant on this state of imperfect goodness, should urge still farther to discover and to adopt the regulations of these feelings which our Father in heaven requires.

We can all perceive, that our offences against our heavenly Parent are as numerous, compared with those of any of our brethren against us, as the higher sum here mentioned, about ten millions of dollars, exceeds the less or fifteen dollars. Were we as entirely the creatures as well as the children of any earthly being as we are of our Father in heaven, where should we find among the parents of this world, a long-suffering kindness that could compare with the overflowing clemency of the ocean and fountain of Love? Our unmindfulness, ingratitude and perverseness, would exhaust the ordinary streams of parental kindness, but, happily for us, there is an inexhaustble fountain. The other references in this parable, particularly to the great power of the creditor over the insolvent debtor, are very clearly illustrated in a work which is most probably in the hands of the majority of our readers—Whittemore on the Parables. The object of the parable, or the intention of Jesus in delivering it, is also very plainly and ably expounded in the same. Indeed, we may say to those who are accompanying us in these weekly biblical studies, and to those who are desirous of understanding the sacred Scriptures generally, that we know of no work of the same compass which would prove to them so great an assistant in their biblical researches, as the very elaborate and elegant work which we have just named.*

Let those who would become disciples of Jesus, look into their own hearts, and survey their past conduct and the conduct of those around them, and they will readily perceive that the natural propensity of the human heart, and the ordinary practice among men, is to retaliate and revenge all injuries done or intended. The national motto of Scotland is that of every man—Nemo me impune lacessit—no man shall injuriously treat me, with impunity. "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," is the law all the world over; injury for injury; and even this scarcely satiates the cravings of revenge. Indeed, the appetite of revenge is, like that of the horse-leech, insatiable. Among the Indians of our forests and the Arabs of the deserts we see the workings of revenge in all its ferocity. Among a civilized people this fierce spirit is restrained; but in our own bosoms and among savage tribes, we perceive it in all its wild workings.

This generally prevalent spirit of revenge, the disciple of Jesus must learn to overcome. In its place he must substitute the spirit recommended in this parable, and in many other of the instructions of his Master, which is that of forbearance and patience under provocations, affronts and injuries. In proportion as he becomes perfect, in proportion as he approximates to God, will be his approach to this God-like spirit. As he advances in the Christian life, he will less and less be overcome of evil; more and more will he be able to "overcome evil with good." He need not fear that this spirit will lead him to tame submission to oppression or wrong; he can better provide for his defence against aggression, by proceeding, not in the spirit of revenge, but in a benevolent, kindly, indulgent spirit; solicitous as much for the reformation of his offending brother, as for his own protection in future, or reparation for the past. Our criminal laws, as well as our private conduct, might be much amended by the infusion of a larger portion of this brotherly, Christian charity and forbearance. Injuriousness, we think, would be more effectually suppressed rather than encouraged, and the peace of our own minds and that of the world at large more certainly secured.

All this may be readily admitted, but the perception of the advantages which would accrue from following peace with all men is not sufficient to inspire the moving spirit. Whence is this to be obtained? how may it be imbibed? This parable points to the only sure source. The long-suffering kindness of our Father towards us, is the spring whence alone can flow the indulgent spirit among brethren by which the disciple of Jesus must be characterized. When any of our brethren provoke or annoy us, let not the sun go down upon our wrath, but let us immediately think of the evil of our own hearts and the offences which, perhaps, no eye hath seen but that of our heavenly Father, and considering that notwithstanding our innumerable offences He still yearns over us, still is kind although He punishes, we can not, without a feeling of impropriety and self-condemnation, yield ourselves to resent the trifling provocations of our brother. Let our conduct to our enemies approach as near as possible, to that paternal indulgence with which our heavenly Parent treats us. Instead of devising retaliation, instead of meditating revenge, if we will but turn our thoughts to the evil of our own hearts and to the long-suffering of our heavenly Parent, we shall feel a better spirit springing up within us—even a disposition to palliate, to forgive, to bless and to do good. As we desire to be the children of God, and like him kind to the unthankful and the evil, let us meditate upon his character and our own remoteness from it, rather than upon the slanders, the unkindnesses, or the offences of others. Seeing and magnifying the faults of others is generally a sign of worse faults in ourselves.

P. P.

* Considering the great labor bestowed upon the composition of the work, and particularly upon the very useful indexes appended to it, likewise its typographical beauty and elegance, the "Notes and Illustrations of the Parables of the New Testament," by Rev. Thomas Whittemore, will be found a very cheap as well as a very useful book. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

BLESS, AND BE BLEST.

BY REV. W. BULLARD.

"In blessing I will bless thee; and in multiplying I will multiply thee."

Reader, what are we to understand by this passage, which was addressed by Jehovah unto Abraham? It strikes me that it contains a very important sentiment—one from which profitable reflections may be drawn. To Abraham the promises were made—promises which not only apply to himself as an individual, but which extend equally to his vast and numerous posterity—to all the families, kindreds and nations of the earth—to the whole world of mankind. All are equally and alike concerned. Whatever is true in the case of Abraham, touching the promises, is equally true in respect to all. Abraham is our representative in the Gospel. We receive and inherit the promises on the same terms with him. We enjoy the proffered blessing on the same conditions, if conditions there be. Our views thus far, are neither disputed, nor disputable. Well, then, how and upon what terms is the promise above made to Abraham? How does the matter stand as to propositions? How in respect to condition? Let us see. "In blessing, I will bless thee." How? O, I see now. The case is a plain one. In blessing, we are blest. In blessing others, we bless ourselves. This is as it should be. It is sound doctrine. It is the genuine philosophy of the Bible and of nature. Throughout the wide universe of mind and matter every principle begets its like. Every efficient cause produces a corresponding effect. While heat reflects heat, cold increases its own intensity. So in morals, as in physics. While love is returned for love, hatred begets hatred in the heart of its victim. Blessing is returned for blessing—cursing for cursing. The principle here laid down, is clearly demonstrated throughout universal nature and in man. The wisdom of God hath so constituted man and things, that it is impossible that virtue should go unrewarded, or vice unpunished. And lest there might be same want of proportion or equity in the administration of these infallible laws, virtue is made the safety of her own reward, and vice to carry along with it its own due and proper retribution. The Scriptures are full of this sentiment—varying only in point of expression, amounting to the same in point of view. "Blessed are they who do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the city." How beautiful! What an exalted privilege! How great the encouragement—to sin? No—no! to holiness. To the practice of all that is good, and great, and noble. Happy, thrice happy incentive this—the assurance that blessedness, the steady, the uniform desire of all hearts, stands in blessing—that happiness, our being's end and aim, consists in making others so. Such an incentive, it would seem, could not fail to produce the desired effect—duly considered, could not fail to lead to the practice of virtue and benevolence. And O, how charming—how reasonable—how consistent with itself and every thing—is the doctrine of our text. It carries demonstration on its face—it speaks conviction to every heart—it leaves room for no objection to arise—it puts to silence all murmurs and complaints—it asks no more than all must be willing to give. Its demands are such as all should be willing and ready to comply with.

Pause, gentle reader—reflect a moment upon the subject before you. Indulge the question. Wouldst thou be happy—really, substantially happy? We know that thou wouldst. It is the great object of all thy pursuits—of all thy toil and labor under the sun. Well, and hast thou toiled, and labored, and sweated, all thy life time, without attaining thy object? An object, if pursued aright, so easily attained? Yes, easier, much easier attained than avoided. And wouldst thou yet be happy, after so many fruitless attempts—so many disappointments, and at this late period? Thou hast but one thing to do, and that easily done. Promote as much as in you lies the happiness of those around you. Use no partiality—make no distinction between friends and foes. Use your endeavors to advance the highest interests of all of whatever rank or character. Pursue this course steadily, whatever may be the treatment you receive—persevere in this delightful employment a while—and you will have no enemies, you will find yourself happy amid happy friends. Our duty, by a little practice, becomes our highest and dearest privilege. Who for instance that knows anything of the joys of social life, would for a moment be deprived of the pleasing privilege of promoting the happiness of his fellows? Who would be happy, if he could, short of this? Who would consent to be? Certainly no rational man—no one capable of enjoyment. Why should a man desire a blessing without imparting one to others, or feeling a disposition so to do to the extent of his ability?—for this is all that is required. Why should a man expect to receive what he feels no disposition to give? What reason—what consistency is there in such a case—what foundation for such expectations? A blessing would do such an one no good if he had it. Such a disposition could enjoy nothing. In the midst of thousands, its possessor would be poor, miserable, blind and naked. As by multiplying our species we multiply and increase our offspring around us, so by multiplying and extending our blessings to others we draw and multiply blessings around ourselves. The blessedness of God consists in his power and disposition to multiply and extend his work of creation, and in pouring out his bountiful blessings upon all flesh. Should Jehovah cease to create and to bless, his glory and blessedness would depart from him, and he himself would cease to be God. But it is his unchanging nature to bless—therefore, he can never cease to be blest, nor can his glory ever depart. Man, whose duty it is to imitate his Maker, ought not—must not expect to promote his own happiness by adopting a course contrary to the necessary order and fitness of things—by doing violence to that grand rule of moral rectitude from which his Maker never departs. It is both reasonable and necessary that the creature should be as his Creator, and act like his Creator, in order to be blessed with him. Our Saviour, in his sermon on the Mount, treats the subject under consideration in a most beautiful and logical manner. "Bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you. That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven; who maketh the sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain upon the just and upon the unjust. Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect."

Cortlandville, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

EXTEMPORANEOUS PREACHING.

Br. Grosh—To you, personally, I am a stranger; but I trust that in faith, and in spirit, we are brethren. And this conviction has been fastened on my mind, from a perusal of the productions of your pen, in the columns of your truly valuable "Magazine." And to the frequent calls you have made for "short articles" for its pages, most gladly would I have responded, occasionally, by the humble productions of my pen, could I have kept the impression from my mind, that there are more able and more useful helpers in abundance, to keep it worthy the high character it sustains.

The selection of topics, for "short" or long articles, where so much has been written, I am aware is involved in some difficulty. And, although I am sensible that the one which follows, does not possess so much immediate interest to readers in general, as many that I might have chosen, yet, as the subject is one which must have important bearing on the future well-being of our denomination, I solicit its insertion, if in your view it is of any value.

Extemporaneous Preaching.—This is a subject which has, of late, in some of our periodicals, elicited considerable controversy. And it is a subject which, in our view, should be fully and fairly canvassed. For no one will pretend that the practice of reading sermons that have been fully written, on the one hand; and that of preaching without manuscript, and without committing to memory, on the other, can have precisely the same effect.

Hence, the advocates of the two different modes, are, each, on their side, desirous of urging the attention of our clergy, to the practice to which they are inclined.

Now, in what I would suggest touching this subject, I prefer, from one consideration, to address myself directly to you. You are a Phrenologist, scientifically. I am only able to say, that I am a friend to that science. I believe it has foundation in truth. But I am not sufficiently acquainted with it, to make application of it to the solution of the queries I would propose.

Prefacing my questions with one or two remarks, I would here observe, that with any controversy now pending, I desire to have nothing to do. Indeed, I desire to elicit none. And, moreover, as far as my own judgment is concerned, I should prefer to hear what is called the "extemporaneous preacher," if he be tolerably successful in keeping his subject of discourse connected and clear. But it seems to me, and, indeed, I venture the assertion, that all who practice this mode, either in our own denomination, or any other, do not succeed thus far. But it is certain, that any one who is qualified at all, for the Gospel ministry, may, with proper industry, study, care, attention and practice, succeed in writing, and reading, or preaching sermons in an acceptable manner. Indeed, a man may make himself highly useful in this course, for thousands have done it.—(1.) But can every one, or nearly every one, who may make a successful preacher of written sermons, make an equally successful extemporaneous preacher—however closely he may apply himself to the work?—(2.) Is there not (phrenologically speaking) a certain combination of mental capacities requisite to success; which all, and, indeed, the generality of preachers, do not possess in sufficient strength to ensure success?—(3.) And if so, would not an indiscriminate recommendation to young clergymen to adopt such a course, tend greatly to their disadvantage?—(4.) Would it not induce many, who may be ignorant of the mental requisites, to begin, and persevere in the hope of final triumph against impossibilities, and against their own good, because against nature?—(5.) And may not our cause thus suffer the loss of those, who, pursuing a safer, and surer course, might make themselves very useful? (6.) And now, Br., may I, in closing this "short" article, request you to state, (if you favor me with a reply, and especially if you answer my last question in the affirmative,) what, in your view, are the powers of mind which should be indicated by strong development, in order to the probable success of the extemporaneous preacher?

Yours very truly, T. J. Greenwood.

Marlborough, Mass., January, 1838.

P. S. In the above I have used the word "extemporaneous," not to mean speaking without previous thought, or preparation, but in the sense in which it is commonly understood. T. J. G.

REPLY.

Br. Greenwood—Compliments aside, I have ever regarded you as a brother in the right faith and spirit. I am pleased to learn, for the first time, that you always felt the will to write for the Magazine—but that diffidence—how many desires has it thwarted?—what talents has it hidden in a napkin?—what orators has it kept hesitating, confused extemporizers—and even, sometimes, bungling, awkward readers!

You have given me a "hard stint" if you expect me to answer your queries to the satisfaction of the brethren interested in the subject. An Editor, you know, must—at least, will write on many things of which he has a very superficial knowledge; and pays for his presumption in being required to answer questions far beyond his depth by those who are charitable enough to believe his seeming is all substantiality. I am a Phrenologist by faith, rather than by knowledge and practice. However, I will endeavor to give you all the light I can—I pray that it may not seem like darkness!

For the sake of many of our readers, permit me to state, what is well known to you—that Br. T. Whittemore, of the Trumpet, and Br. C. Gardner, of the Gospel Banner, (as also some other Eastern brethren, have been earnestly discussing the relative merits of what they call extemporaneous preaching, and reading sermons. Notwithstanding the difference implied at first sight of their terms, it appears to me, that, allowing each one to explain his own meaning, there is very little difference between them. By extempore preaching, Br. Whittemore means that the sermon shall be well studied, well arranged, well imprinted on the memory, and be delivered without any other notes than, perhaps, the mere heads of the discourse. On the other hand by reading sermons, Br. Gardner means that the sermon shall be as well digested and arranged, then put on paper, and be read over so often that it may be delivered without having the eyes confined to the manuscript.—Both agree in every particular—in having the subject equally well elaborated, equally well arranged, and equally well committed to, or impressed upon the memory—with this difference. Br. Whittemore prefers the repeated impressions of thought, to fix it on the memory; and that the ideas rather than the words should be thus committed. Br. Gardner, on the other hand, prefers that writing and reading should fix the subject on the memory, and in nearly the precise words in which the ideas are clothed. In the heat of argument, and the desire for victory, they may have understood each other differently from the above, or dropped expressions denoting a greater difference than above stated; but, in the main, and allowing each writer to state his own views, I think the above presents a fair statement of their respective opinions.

Br. "Apollos," a writer in the Union, has proposed, very lately, a plan which splits even the above difference, trifling as it is—and Br. Whittemore gives it his cordial approbation, as containing his views! If Br. Gardner does the same, there will be no difference between them at all, at all!—another exemplification of "much ado about nothing"! "Apollos" proposes that the sermon be first written, then the sketch of the "heads" be prepared from it, and written on the last page; and that the preacher use the sketch, only, in preaching. If the sketch, or a sketch, is prepared first, and the sermon is written from the sketch, it will be, sometimes, the better for it. The memory, also, will be greatly aided, and consequently the feelings will be more free to give warmth and energy to the speaker's delivery—i. e. if he needs them; for some preachers have an excess. So much for the controversy at the East—now for your questions.

I agree with you, generally, in your prefaotry remarks, except your unfortunate and embarrassing reference to my phrenological skill. To save room, I have numbered your questions, in parenthesis, and answer them in the same order.

1. I think not; for to succeed as an extemporaneous speaker, will require more labor, and a higher degree, or a more peculiar combination of talent, than to succeed as a preacher of written discourses. I admit that, as a matter of course, the best extemporaneous speaker, will rank higher as a speaker, than the best speaker of the other class.

2. There is, I am persuaded, such a combination necessary—indeed, each different mode ever yet suggested, will be best adapted to some peculiar organization of mind, not common, in equal degree, to all. Yet nearly all have the necessary faculties sufficiently developed to enable them to become extemporaneous speakers—i. e., to succeed, after sufficient labor, to as great an extent as by reading sermons. But to each one there are other and sufficient reasons which should induce them to prefer writing and reading as aids to the memory.

3, 4, 5. Yes—certainly.

6. This is the "poser"—I can only "guess" at the answer. Had I leisure, I might start out on a mission, and feel the bumps of all our great preachers "down East," until I had collected facts enough to demonstrate my theory—viz., that it is as erroneous and injurious to recommend all speakers to pursue any one mode in particular, as it is to prescribe one routine of study for all students—one medicine for all diseases—one remedy for all evils—or one measure for all men's coats and shoes! But as you want an answer before I will have time to build up my theory, in opposition to Brs. Whittemore, Gardner, "Apollos," and others, I will try and accommodate you with theories instead of facts—reversing the Phrenological motto, "things, not words"—I give you words, not things.

Concentrativeness, to keep the mind fixed on the subject—firmness, to give the speaker collectedness or calmness, and perseverance in his purpose—and self-esteem, to give him confidence in himself, and inspire him with a feeling of superiority in the subject, over his audience—these seem to me the necessary qualifications of a successful extemporaneous speaker, as distinct from the note preacher. For however useful this combination may be in writing—it is more so in speaking without previous writing—and however necessary other faculties may be, in combination with these, to the extemporaneous speaker, they are equally necessary to the one who commits his sermon to memory by writing and reading.

As to delivery, after the mode of preaching has been acquired, one with too little energy and feeling, will find a remedy in any mode that will leave his mind most free from thinking out what he has yet to speak. One who has too much warmth, will find a few trammels on his mind beneficial. One deficient in language, whether as to number of words, arrangement, purity, or beauty of style, will find writing beneficial, if not too great a task for him to write, correct, revise, rewrite, recorrect, etc., until he has made his sermon what it should be. And so on, for all other defects, and their remedies. The memories of some are best aided in one way, of others in another—but generally the greater the number of senses and other faculties, brought to aid the memory of any faculty, the better. Hence I prefer Br. Gardner's mode, as that combines thought, writing, and reading, (or thought, the hand, the eye, and the ear,) in aid of the verbal memory. But, in conclusion, I would also say, that as it often is necessary for the preacher to use both methods, he should, if possible, strive to acquire both methods—pursuing constantly that which is the easiest to him, most useful to his flock, and which yields the most improvement to his own mind in the least time.

And now, behold, Br. Greenwood, how you have caused me to trespass on your patience, and that of our readers!—how you have seduced me into the magisterial tone, which, however, it becomes the name, does not become the character and abilities of your brother

Aaron.

A Conference meeting was held on Wednesday evening, January 31st, at Charlestown, Mass., in the Universalist meeting-house. The meeting was opened by remarks from Br. T. F. King, after which a prayer was offered by Br. B. Whittemore. Br. Streeter then addressed the assembly, which entirely filled the house, and afterwards Br. E. N. Harris, late Baptist clergyman of Malden, the recent convert to Universalism, spoke for upwards of an hour. Many members of other sects were present, particularly of the Baptists.—"It is described as an occasion of high hopes and holy joy."

Removal.—The Rev. M. B. Smith has removed from West Burlington, Otsego county, to Clinton, Oneida county, and requests all communications for him to be addressed accordingly.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TRACTS.

The joyous greetings of a Happy New-Year just cease to be heard. The fond anticipations of the future are read on happy countenances, and heard in the social laugh and kindly salutation.—Now is the wonted time for resolves, and now too, we can look on a departed year and linger on things that were. Come, memory, guardian angel of the past, lend thy rejuvenating hand while we con over a scene of the last week of the departed year.

In a smiling village on the banks of the placid M———, were seen treading the well flagged walks, several females, married, it may be, with here and there a little Miss, just entering her "girlish days." Singly and sadly they pass, and a "call" is made at each house by the wayside. The stay is not long—the mission ended, at the next door is heard the gentle rap. This is an inquisitive world, and may we inquire what can be the errands repeated thus at the close of the year? These mature matrons and lisping girls—messengers of peace they may be, bearing "glad tidings" to the sorrowful and broken hearted, or relieving pining want and staying premature decay. The Saviour "went about doing good," giving hope to the desponding and comfort to the afflicted. Sure these must be messengers of mercy sent on missions of love.—Would that we too might share the happy news. Follow me, reader, to yonder house, just the object of visitation—tread softly, for the corse of a loved child lies within. We are alone—the mother is leaning over the cherished and departed one, wiping the tear of affection. She holds in her hand the "present" just left by the messenger—a small tract—"PREPARE TO MEET THY GOD!" It falls from her hand! She takes another—"The Sinner's Friend"—she reads—"Sinner! this tract is for YOU, to give you hope and comfort, and joy and peace—'Look unto me and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth'—were the holy angels to call forth their loftiest strains of song, they could not express the vastness of the love of God to sinners!! GOD only knows the love of God—sinners can never be so willing to be healed as Christ is to heal them." Sure this must be "The Sinner's Friend!"—she reads again—"This may be the LAST warning you may ever receive; embrace it then with all your heart that you may be as a brand plucked from everlasting fire.—The eye of God is upon you—take warning!! Do you then linger?—Do you tarry?—Do you halt?—Do you refuse to enter into heaven? Do you prefer the downward road to HELL!! O SINNER! stay—stay and turn to GOD! To-morrow may be your last! Seek him to-day; this very hour—this very moment, and escape for your life—escape before the flames of hell surround you and your soul be lost forever! trifle not with time but instantly seek the favor of God or be forever lost." Is this the "Sinner's Friend?" you ask—can the messenger who just left this tract, in the sincerity of her soul, say—"the Lord hath sent me to heal the broken hearted; to preach deliverance to the captives and set at liberty them that are bruised?"

Gentle reader, we will turn from this death bed scene;—I know thou art pained, but thou hast but heard the "balm and consolation" of the American Tract Society. I had heard of their "benevolent" labors; I would know the truth, and I called at their repository and requested the privilege of seeing their publications. To sell them they would not, and after hesitation, deliberation, and inquisitive interrogation, permission was given for a hasty perusal. Why this reluctance and question about "propriety," thought I. Why scatter them in lavish profusion, among timid women and frightened children during the absence of their protectors, but even almost refuse the loan to one who would know "the truth—the whole truth?" Are your doctrines so baseless, so evanescent, so like dust and ashes, that you fear to expose them to scrutiny and candid investigation. Is TRUTH unable to stand save in the fears and distorted visions of the weak and defenceless? But I examined them. Reader, I would lay them before thee, that you might see things as they are. In them you would find much to commend, much worthy of men, of angels: but far more that which fiends incarnate only could approve. You would find "more than fifty reasons for attending public worship," which if you and I adopted, the world would know by our works that we loved the institutions of our Father. You would find an excellent pamphlet on "Indecision in Religion." I would that thou couldst peruse it—(we all think for our neighbors, you know, forgetting our little self!)—it might lead thee to "search out the whole counsel of God," and to fear not to believe the truth, and to defend it too, e'en though the multitude "pass by on the other side," and point at thee the festered finger of scorn. Again, you will find a tract entitled "Future Punishment, or the Universalist refuted, by the Rev. Archibald Alexander, D. D." Read it—it will do thee good—it will show thee how even a Rev. Professor can stoop to spurn reason and argument, misrepresent the opinions of those he would "refute," and support the darkest theories by puerile exhortation.

But thou wilt read others, that will fill thy mind with visions dark as the fabled shades of Erebus. Lethean streams will flow through your dizzy brain, as you read, that you and your fellow-mortals "are utterly incapable of a good thought or word or deed, and as prone to do evil as the sparks to fly upward." Yes, dear reader, you will read in a little tract called "THE SINNER HIS OWN DESTROYER," that, "Death makes no change in the moral character. It disengages the soul from the trammels of the body and gives expansion to its powers; but he that was "unjust" will be "unjust still," and he that was "filthy" will be "filthy still," though removed from earth to the world of spirits. The passage through the dark valley is but a single step, and in its agony and gloom there is no such mighty efficacy, as to convert a hardened sinner into a saint;—Nor will death divest the soul of any of its passions and propensities:—all that belong to the soul, as anger, malice, revenge, will not only be retained in the disembodied state, but acquire greater capacity and power of action." Gentle reader, look once more on this pall of blighted affections. The author is speaking of envy—"This passion is not felt here so generally as some others—but in the spiritual state it will be fully developed. You will then contrast the condition of the saints in glory with your own. Once you and they lived in the same neighborhood, met in the same social circle, and assembled in the same place of worship. Now they have taken possession of 'an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away;' they are clothed in robes of white, with 'everlasting joy upon their heads,' and the smiles of God's countenance pour an enduring flood of light upon their enraptured spirits! But where are you? a voluntary exile from heaven; having no capacity for the enjoyment of paradise and no means for ever acquiring it! And as you advance in eternity and appreciate more and more the treasures they have gained and you have lost, will you not envy them more and more, and constantly be more and more wretched?" Dear reader are these not indeed

> "—like a wave of wormwood o'er the soul > Rolling its bitterness?"

Once more and we bid adieu to the painful theme. In the absence of husbands and fathers, these emissaries of the American Tract Society distribute their soul-chilling "consolation." The year of '37 had nearly told its round—Mrs. A. was alone with her child—the husband was absent, and one sweet babe, like the tender rose bud, was borne away ere its unfolding petals disclosed its beauties. Mrs. A.—I know her well. A daughter, a sister, a wife, a mother, endowed with high mental qualifications and a pleasing grace of manners, she cherished those generous and ennobling affections that adorn the private walks of life, and give to society so agreeable a relish. A messenger called and left with her a—"tract." She took it, glanced at its caption—imagine her emotion as she read:—"A WHOLE FAMILY IN HEAVEN!" She read as a fond mother would read:—"What a glorious sight it will be to behold all Christ's redeemed family in heaven!!" Such a prospect would make a genial current flow through even the misanthrope's bosom, and did this alone brighten the horizon of futurity, he might look upon his fellow-beings and exclaim—"behold how they love one another!"—Mrs. A. read on—the scene began to change, and she read "a part of a family in heaven!" She looked on her lovely daughter prattling by her side—"A part of a family in heaven!"—can I enjoy heaven and look down from its crystal portals and see sweet Helen in ——? Have I nurtured the helpless infant to the smiling girl, that she may be the more responsible even as she is the more beautiful? Must each day that adds to her loveliness, add, too, to her accountability and wretchedness, and separate her farther from me through a long, long eternity? O God! rather let me share hell with my child than heaven without her!" And the fond mother turned the page, and there she read, "A whole family in hell!" Reader, draw the curtain of oblivion. Mrs. A. returned the "present," and found the tract-distributor in tears. "I wonder not that you weep—I should weep away my life did I believe a creed like yours. If this be the good tidings of great joy, heralded by the Star of Bethlehem, O let me not know it!"

And, kind reader, I am telling thee no high wrought fiction of mine. The half is not told!—These are the tidings of the American Tract Society, distributed by females and children! I would ever respect the freedom of opinion, nor blame my neighbor though he differ ever so widely from me, if his opinion be but founded on careful examination and unbiassed deductions. These tracts I examined, not to blame but to know their contents. I find every thing assumed and nothing proved. Reason is set aside as carnal, and the most figurative expressions of Scripture, quoted without explanation and used as the direct and literal sanction of Jehovah, to the darkest and most dismal theories erratic imagination ever created. Fear is the noblest passion appealed to, and the soothing influence of love, regarded as the delusive dream that chains the slumberer while the assassin bares the bosom to deal the more deadly blow! "Believe or be damned," is the harsh but plain language of their arguments.—To "prove all things and hold fast that which is good," is forgotten or unheeded, and wrapped in the garb of "holy mystery," they would lead the human family, blind-folded and hand-cuffed, through a life of sighs and groans and tears to earn heaven and win the smiles of Jehovah!—O charity! we need thy soothing cordial. Dear reader, adieu! the last week of the last year has gone, and may its horrors never return, aided by the American Tract Society.

KAPPA.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

UNIVERSALISM IN BRISTOL.

Our cause in this section is onward. The chariot wheels of Gospel emancipation from sin and all its consequences, are moving majestically forward. The pure principles of Christianity are spreading in every direction, and triumphing over the violent persecutions of its opposers. It is almost impossible to conceive the change which has taken place in this county, within seven years, in the religious views and feelings of its inhabitants. Under the elevating influence of public worship, many have found that truth which is able to make them wise unto salvation, and instead of trembling and cringing before a God of revenge, they sweetly repose under the protection of our heavenly Father. The beauty of the doctrine of Christ so far exceeds the heathenish notion of the doctrine of eternal punishment, as to eclipse it, and to draw the affections of the more intelligent part of community from it to be placed upon that system, whose beauty and heavenly qualities rejoice the hearts of men.

The spirit of inquiry which has been awakened in this county, should in some degree be attributed to the free circulation of the "Evangelical Magazine," and the "Herald of Truth," which have found their way into many families and social circles where a clergyman of our order would not meet with a cordial acceptance. The result has been most glorious. Superior information has increased, and has led to the explosion of many cruel doctrines which have long been tenaciously taught and adhered to. As we mingle in society, we find but few who dread the decrees of endless reprobation, or the inability of their friends to save themselves from the flames of an endless hell.—I truly believe that all Christians are approximating towards truth and liberality—they believe, with a few exceptions, that Christ died for all flesh, and that destruction is the effect of the conduct, rather than of a decree. Here much is removed which formerly marred the beautiful form of Christianity. These facts must be truly cheering to every friend of our cause, and especially so to those persons who have witnessed it advancing for the last ten years in the might and majesty of Israel's God, and asserting its supremacy over a multitude of hearts. No obstacle has been too great for it to encounter and overcome.

But successful as has been the cause of impartial grace, it has as yet hardly commenced its great work of moral renovation, much less accomplished all that its friends can desire, or that it is capable of achieving. Hundreds of our fellow-citizens are still in the darkness of ignorance and blinded by superstition—viewing their heavenly Father as a cruel Being whose countenance glows with concentrated wrath against earth's bewildered sinners. These erroneous opinions are highly calculated to fill the mind of the believer with distrust and gloomy apprehension, which alway destroy the peace and happiness of their unfortunate possessor. In view of this wretchedness, it is very natural that those who have been led by Christ the Saviour of the world beside the still waters of salvation, and made to lie down in the green pastures of God's boundless love, should desire that all created intelligences might be brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God.—Such is the wish and prayer of every believer in primitive Christianity. As so much has been accomplished by public worship, and the free circulation of our periodicals, let us keep in requisition the old causes and untiringly nourish them. I would say to those persons who compose my congregations, and who do not take a religious paper, that I believe it would be for your spiritual advantage to do so. The cause which we are engaged in is of God and will prevail. It is a work of glorious mercy, to lend the helping hand in the emancipation of our fellow-creatures from mental bondage. Heaven smiles upon it. The hand of the Almighty beckons, go forward, until truth reascends its throne and reigns in its simple grandeur, and peace and plenty crown all intelligences forever and ever. And oh! God forbid that any should neglect the means of hastening onward this great and glorious work. W. QUEAL.

Bristol, January, 1838.

J. G. A.

I hope to be able so often to present articles to our readers, followed by these initials, that I am tempted to tell to whom they belong. I have so long been in the habit of keeping no secrets from our readers—of writing the name of each writer at the very head of his or her article—that I fear they will not be satisfied with my departure from the rule in the present case. Indeed, I would not be satisfied, were I merely a reader. There is that in the few articles now on hand bearing this signature, that will frequently prompt the inquiry—"WHO IS HE?" Well, then, he says, himself, in a private note to me, "This is my first letter to your worthiness! God bless you. Wish I could behold you, and take your hand; but we are too far apart to reach—and, besides, the Green Mountains are too high! Having an opportunity to send these few scrawls along, I offer them for what they are worth. Do with them as you please.—Don't say over them 'by Rev. J. G. Adams'—only give initials at the end." Now Br. Adams, (when the above was written, of Claremont, N. H.—now of Malden, Mass.,) was Editor of that excellent paper, "The Star in the East, and New-Hampshire Universalist," lately merged in the Trumpet, and will therefore excuse us for gratifying the laudible curiosity of our readers, by publishing the above extract, and, at the same time excusing ourselves to them for giving merely his initials. They will know, from henceforth, who "J. G. A." is—and I can assure him that none will be more welcome to them—none more gladly hailed by us, than his "scrawls," as he calls them—scrawls, by the by, clear as print—ready for the press, and full of truly evangelical thought and—but, read them for yourselves.

A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SATURDAY NIGHT.

The busy week is gone, with its toils, cares, perplexities. Its last evening has come—Saturday evening—preceding the Christian's holy Sabbath. Let me seek repose—not for the body, merely—but the repose of meditation for the spirit. Thanks to my heavenly Parent, for his guardian care and protection during another week of my existence. How many mercies within this short span of time have I received, and yet how unmindful. Base ingratitude! How should I hide myself in shame and confusion of face. Yet God is gracious and long suffering, forgiving the waywardness and folly of his children. May his forgiving love reach and pervade this spirit!

Saturday night! Who can hail its presence with more joy than the believing Christian? As the last beams of the fair king of day are reflected up from the evening horizon, he there reads the promise of a morning of delight to come; a morning which shall remind him of his spiritual duty, and which shall elevate his affections, and raise his devotion. He loves to anticipate the joys of that meditation and delight which the Sabbath will bring; for they are the feasts of the soul, as it feeds on the bread of God that cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world. He has laid down his weekly burden to rest awhile at the foot of the cross. O, what peace he will find while he remains there! For what sinner was ever refused comfort and peace at Jesus' feet? Who sat at his feet and heard his words? And was it not said that she had chosen the good part, which should not be taken away from her? That good part is the Christian's bliss—the Christian's life.

Let me think. How many more Saturday evenings may I behold? What a question?—Is it presumptuous? Nay, rather solemn. God alone can answer it; and to him let my spirit be given. Let the sentiment of the poet be mine:—

"The Christian lives to Christ alone,
To Christ alone he dies."

Come life or death, joy or sorrow, success or adversity, let me prove myself a son of God—a son having the spirit of adoption—an heir, spiritually, really. Then shall I be able to comprehend something of that love which "passeth knowledge," and fills the soul with "the fulness of God." Sacred, overwhelming thought! Let it inspire me this night, and prepare me to behold the joyous morning of the Christian's spiritual feast day, and spend its sweet hours in the delights of devotion, the duties of love, the consolations of peace, the beauty of holiness! "Let the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer!" J. G. A.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ECONOMY.

Economy and honesty stand first in all our temporal affairs. Good economy helps honesty along, but honesty can not in all respects help economy along—therefore let us, in all our affairs, endeavor to use good economy. I shall present a few remarks for the consideration of the reader, whether received with approbation or not. In the first place, publishers depend upon patrons for their support, and accordingly, set a price on their paper to that effect. Now let us use good economy, and pay for our paper in advance in all cases. Our scheme of economy may be small and limited in many cases, but let us always use it to the best advantage.

There are several classes of economy of which I shall mention four in this case. The first, is paying for our paper in advance—the second, is paying within the year—the third, at the expiration of the year—and the fourth, (or rather no economy,) is in not paying for our paper at all. The last is the worst of all. Now as publishers are satisfied with the advance price, let us in all cases pay in advance. S. M.

Fort Ann, December, 1837.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

SPIRIT OF CHRISTIANITY.

Much of the good which otherwise might be done, is lost by an illiberal, and what we conceive to be an unwarrantable method of interpreting the Scriptures.—Unless the mere letter of the text fully warrants particular Christian usages, they are at once, by some, condemned as unchristian. If it is believed that certain institutions are calculated to assist in cultivating and refining the feelings, it is then asked, "Are they scriptural?"—"What passages sanction their usage?"—and because no particular portion of the Scriptures do by word favor them, they must be discountenanced. This arbitrary way of construing the Scriptures, and thereby occasioning a hindrance, as we believe, to the more general diffusion of the spirit of Christianity, is more prevalent among Universalists than we wish it was. If what is called by some a Concert of Praise, is recommended, we must stop and inquire—"Is it scriptural?" The good which such meetings exert, must be left out of the question—the thing is, is it supported by Scripture? If it is said that any practice is scriptural which begets a Christian spirit, then such reasoning is complained of as wholesale. "Did the Saviour, or any of his apostles, engage in such meetings? or did they enjoin their observance on others?—these are the questions," say they. Thus it is that many institutions which are productive of good, and sustained by the spirit of Christianity, are discouraged and discountenanced; and thus it is too, that we invite others to sit down beneath the branches of a tree, stripped of their foliage.

To us the great question is, What is the object of Christianity? We have but one answer among us. It is to do good by faith, hope and charity; at the same time we allow, that "if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." Whatever, then, operates to produce this spirit, is commanded, perhaps not by the letter of Scripture, but evidently by its spirit. Every institution which has for its object the advancement of the cause of Christ, ought to be fostered; nor can they be too numerous, unless they infringe on duties of a domestic nature. But this they need not do. Christianity presents a field for improvement, as boundless as the universe of mind, and vast as eternity. The means of improvement are not merely such as were adopted by the apostles, but all such as will diffuse through the world the good which it is the legitimate object of Christianity to promote.

It is true, we may be mistaken as to the results of any particular institution of our own adoption. Its merits, therefore, may be discussed, and when it can be proven to be a good institution, then it is proven to be a Christian institution. This is the ground we take when urging the necessity of certain ordinances—conference or praise meetings and benevolent societies. We care not whether there is or is not in the Scriptures, any verbal authority for them—we know them to be right, because they are required by the spirit of Christianity.—

There is not the least fear of finding in the Scriptures any language forbidding them. Is it not, then, binding upon all who love the cause of Christ, to engage in the work with full purpose of heart; giving encouragement to every thing which comes within the scope of the spirit of Christianity. We say again, that it is the Christian utility and expediency of a thing which gives it sanction, and which commends it to our observance.

G. S.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 1838.

RELIGIOUS INFLUENCES OF NATURE.

Much has been eloquently said and written upon natural Theology. The grandeur of the visible universe—the beauty and harmony of the myriad of creations which we behold in it—the wonderful mechanism, and the various uses and importance of the things around us—the relations of minute and apparently insignificant objects to each other, and their connection in the chain of the grand and universal whole—and all these, whether taken collectively or individually, shewing forth the love and the glory, the wisdom and the power of the great Creator—have furnished inexhaustible themes for the pen, the tongue, and the heart.

By the pen and the tongue, as we have said, these themes have been frequently and eloquently set forth and celebrated—but have they had a like influence upon the heart? We may be told, again and again, that a flower is a specimen of beautiful and delicate workmanship—that the human frame is a production of wondrous skill and power—but do not these expressions, "beautiful and delicate workmanship," "wondrous skill and power," fall too often upon listless ears? Is not their meaning vague to us? Do they not seem trite and commonplace remarks?—or, do they convey distinct ideas into the mind, generating high and hallowed thoughts? Do they call forth from the secret place of the heart, aspirations of gratitude, love and praise to the great Source of these wonderful creations? Are there lessons read by us in the simple autumnal leaf, falling from the tree? Is there something more than mere beauty in the dew-drop glittering in the sunbeam? In short, do we know by personal experience, that every object in nature has teachings of religion, to which the devout soul, strung to heavenly influences, will respond?

It is not likely that many who read this, need aught to convince them of the existence, attributes, and superintending providence of God. The study of natural Theology to them, then, should be for the purpose of enlightening, expanding, and purifying the soul. To them, every sentence written on the page of the universe, every minute object strewn in their daily paths, should have its lessons and its morals.

Let us go out, for a while, and sit down in the depths of the great and solemn wilderness. No sound of the axe, or the hammer, or the voices of busy men, has occurred in this dwelling-place of ages—but the old winds have shouted here, and the torrent has chimed up its everlasting anthem. Here have been wreathed no human banners, nor trophies of victory, but the storms and the years have left the record of their triumphs. What a place for reflection is this!—how many subjects upon which to exercise thought, are here! Yonder lies a mighty oak. Yesterday it stood up, like a leader among men—and now it has fallen, and the time of desolation has come upon it! Is there one who can not see in it an emblem of something among human affairs? There is a pure, rippling stream. A little farther on you will find its source—a simple rill, gurgling from beneath a rock. Around it, how green and pleasant is the sod!—how does it gladden the recesses of this lone forest! Journey on, and you will find it rejoicing in its course—a deep-rolling river! Do you know of nothing among men of which this also is an emblem? There lie scattered abroad, withered and dying leaves—how long is it since they shone in their robes of beauty, and quivered with delight in the sunshine? Is there nothing in human experience as gay and as fleeting as these? Truly, what a place is here to commune with nature, and to worship its God. How feebly and scantily have we illustrated the circumstances and the analogies, and the thoughts that would occupy our minds in such a spot. Here are no man-reared shrines—no swelling notes of the organ—no murmur of many human worshippers—no voice of the robed teacher of his fellows—but here is "a temple not made with hands:" here are the unceasing choruses of nature; here are teachers of religion from the humble wild-flower beneath the feet, to the lofty tree nodding in the breeze; here is a place for the spirit's undisturbed communion with its God!

Let us gaze now upon the vestal stars. Here is a glorious scene for contemplation. How soothing is it to the spirit, to look up from earth and its cares to the clear calm sky of night!

> "Oh! one could wish for wings to soar away
> To yon calm, silent orbs, and be at rest—
> They look so like the bowers our God has made
> To shield the lonely and the broken heart."

How they glide out into the great area of the heavens, silently, meekly, and pure, like worshippers at some high altar! There have they stood in their loveliness, night after night, since the time when "the morning stars sang together." And what changes have gone over this globe since then! Generations move where generations sleep beneath—desolation rests on the places of beauty and of pride—the harvest waves where once the wheels of battle rolled over and thunder-charred the green earth—deserts are where cities were, and cities stand where was the wilderness. Men have builded, and destroyed, and triumphed, and worshipped, and made theories, and sung, and laughed, and wept, and hurried through the busy things of life—and the billowy time has swept over all, and borne them onward to the places of graves! Yet the stars have hung in their stations—the earth has wheeled among them in its course—and our Father still guides and superintends the whole, and keeps them in the bounds of their habitation! These, and other and more glorious thoughts, come to us as naturally as the air, when looking upon the stars. They are not the sole thoughts of any one—they belong to our common humanity—they are original and innate feelings of the soul. Why it is that we wish to be there among them, is one of the mysteries of our nature. "It may be," to use the beautiful idea of one of our female writers, "that from an orb that looks calm and bright to us, some habitant may be gazing at our planet and wishing himself here." But we feel in viewing them, that we are not always to be bound to earth—that we shall know more of them hereafter. We hope to mount up and learn the way of their courses—to hear the music that is pealing from orb to orb, through the illimitable arches of heaven—to tread their radiant pathways, and to pass from sphere to sphere, from knowledge to knowledge, forever and forever!

Here, then, we have taken only two scenes of contemplation which are in the universe, yet, how vast the view!—how little have been our ideas!—how few the objects of thought which we have hinted at! What themes for the soul to live upon, have passed before us! These things are all common—we see them in our usual walks—we call them the natural course of affairs. But do they impress our hearts as they should? In this daily round of occurrences, in these common objects, do we find food for religious reflection? When in health we behold the morning light, do we feel that health and light are great blessings? When "the evening shades" fall around us, do we feel that night and sleep are beneficent gifts of Heaven? In the routine of the seasons—the rays of the sun, and the beams of the moon—our daily meals—our intellectual and moral advantages—in the social relations—in all that to us are usual things, is continual and various religious instruction. Are not our sympathies too callous to the mute yet eloquent appeals of objects around us? Should we not open our hearts more than we do to the religious influences of nature? Shall we pass through the world, as though it were only a great mart for traffic, gain, and secular labor—or a splendid arena, fitted up for one continual gala-day of empty pleasure? Shall we be entirely absorbed with its roll, and roar, and glitter, and hurry on through the rush, and the bustle, and the business, with scarcely any regard to our spiritual improvement? It should not be so with us. Let us read the deep religion of nature, and grow wiser, and better, and purer by the perusal. Let us go abroad among the objects of creation, and gather from every leaf and every flower, as well as from the vast, and strange, and sublime, knowledge, and strength, and light, that shall render us superior to the changes of earth—fit our spirits for the circumstances of immortality—and carry our affections outward to our fellow-men, and upward to our God.

E. H. C.

NEW ATTACK ON UNIVERSALISM.

"An Impartial, Critical and Scriptural Investigation of the Biblical views of Universalism and Destructionism: And after a careful examination of all those passages in the New Testament, in which the word hell is used, it is proven that there are but two passages which have any reference to the literal grave. By Theophilanthropos, Richmond, Va. Printed by James C. Walker, 1837." 46 pp. 12 mo.

Such is the title of a pamphlet just issued from the press in this city, (Richmond, Va.) On an attentive perusal of it, we should have concluded at once that it was wholly undeserving the least notice from any sober, enlightened or literary person on earth, were not the fact known that the anonymous bantling has been taken up with all avidity, and cherished as a favorite and peculiarly meritorious child, by the leading Methodists of this place. It is by them circulated with zeal, advertised in their papers, and even in the daily political papers of the city, kept on hand at the office of the Methodist "Conference Journal," and by their adherents considered a triumphant argument against the supposed heretical opinions it attacks. It is, therefore, only by the position and importance given it by the leading Methodists here, that we are induced to notice it.

One can not but smile at the singularity of the title, and the curious association of ideas and of doctrines in the mind of the sage author—"Biblical views of Universalism and Destructionism!" Queries. Are these views Biblical in the estimation of our author? And more: are they in any wise related to each other? Can two systems be well imagined, that are more complete antipodes than these? Why, then, associate them together?

But if the title cause a smile, how much more laughable the body of the work! Our sage author employs 22 pages in examining the passages where Gehenna (rendered Hell) occurs, and in proving positively that it does not in those passages signify—the grave! Be astonished, oh ye wicked, and obstinate, and misguided Universalists, and never open your mouths again, for shame! This profoundly erudite Methodist has actually proved, and that beyond a doubt, that Gehenna (Hinnom our author once calls it!) does not signify the literal grave! By the by, did not this modern savant know, or rather, did not his Methodist keepers know for him, that no Universalist ever dreamed that Gehenna meant the literal grave? But, anxious as he appears to convince his readers that Gehenna does not mean the grave, (an idea which he unfortunately mistook for Universalism,) he seems equally as intent on proving (for the sake of wresting those abused texts where the word occurs, from the hands of Destructionists) that gehenna does not mean (in the elegant verbosity of our author) "to be eternally annihilated with the damnation of the annihilation of the literal grave!" Oh, how must the Annihilationist shrink back with shame and confusion from such overwhelming arguments against his system!

Our author seems horror-struck beyond expression, at the awful idea of any of the human family being allowed to sleep the dreamless sleep of annihilation, or endless nonentity, and thus escape the horrors of endless and infinite wo in hell. He says, speaking of annihilationism, "an ism or doctrine more appalling, horrific and gloomy than which, can scarcely be presented to the mind of any rational intellectual being." Though we readily admit such a doctrine to be "appalling, horrific and gloomy," and far from the truth, yet it is as light to darkness, as health to sickness, and as joy to sorrow, when compared to the doctrine of endless misery. The one is the greatest of all possible and positive evils, the other the mere negation both of good and evil.

The next seventeen pages of this critical and learned work are devoted to the examination and definition of hades and the passages in the New Testament, where it occurs. His criticisms here are just about as learned and consistent as those on the word Gehenna. It affords in one instance, viz. the parable of the Rich man and Lazarus, a fine field for his declamatory powers. He foams and swells here with great pomp and parade, and is almost as successful in proving that hades here does not mean the literal grave as he was in the case of gehenna: nay, more, in proving, also, that it does not mean, "to be eternally annihilated with the damnation of the annihilation of the literal grave!" This parable and the 20th chapter of Revelation afford him, as well as our Methodist brethren generally, a glorious theme for declamation on the delightful subject of hell and damnation. After having delivered himself of all his learned criticisms on the subject of hades, he closes, verbatim et literatim by the following grammatical, pathetic and eloquent appeal:

"And now, candid reader, let me ask you once more, that if from the facts, which have been laid before you, you are not influenced to believe, that there is some future endless punishment, other than annihilation, which will be imposed upon the finally impenitent sinner? O reader! there must, according so the Scriptures of Divine Truth, be a hell, a place of everlasting punishment, and without regeneration,—the author, with the reader, will soon be ingurgitated in the gloomy abyss of this hell, soul and body—lost—ruined—damned everlastingly—damned to all eternity—damned world without end!" The author then adds the following most apropos quotation from Pope's "universal payer:"

> "Let not this weak and unknowing hand,
> Presume thy bolts to throw,
> And deal damnation round the land
> On each I judge thy foe."

But what next? Let not the reader start, although new wonders should meet his view at every page, or even every line. The next thing is (chapter 3.) "OF ZOPHOS." Here we have another and entirely new Greek word for hell! Our learned critic thus begins, "2 Pet. ii: 4. God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, (Zophon,) and delivered them into chains of darkness to be reserved unto judgment."—Here we find by the wonderful discoveries of this Theological Newton, that all Biblical critics, commentators, and lexicographers, both orthodox, and heterodox, Wakefield, McNight, Campbell, Stewart, Clarke, Balfour, Schleusner, Parkhurst, and all, are sadly at fault, not one of whom (nor any body else) ever dreamed of such a word being used in the New Testament for hell.—Surely the orthodox of modern times will owe our author a debt of everlasting gratitude for discovering so important a fact, that there is a new word for hell, even zophos. Verily, darkness will no longer remain darkness when it comes into the light of the flames of hell!

Not to be too critical on our learned critic, we may just inform our English readers, who have never become like our author, deeply versed in Greek, that he has unfortunately mistaken the word rendered darkness in the text, for the word tartarosas, rendered "cast down to hell." But notwithstanding this small mistake in the word, and the caption placed at the head of the chapter, "OF ZOPHOS," our author goes on very deliberately to transmute zophos in tartarus and then to treat of the latter as the word under discussion. This comes from all his criticisms being quoted (without credit) from others. He gives us several quotations from pagan authors, poets, etc., in relation to tartarus, showing it to be the place of the damned, and located exactly in the centre of the earth. Our critic thinks these heathen poets mistook as to the location of tartarus but were right in every thing else respecting it! After collecting and repeating all the texts he can find in the New Testament about hell, he finally closes the pamphlet by filling one page with blasphemies against the Divinity from the pen of Polluck, wherein this poet run mad, attempts to make out the Deity as much worse than the Evil One as his power is greater, in devising and employing all the means in his power to make his own offspring infinitely and endlessly miserable.

To conclude, we do not blame the author of this miserable apology for Biblical criticism, for it is fairly presumable that he knew no better: but we blame his spiritual keepers for allowing or encouraging him (by their press, and efforts to vend the pamphlet,) in a publication which violates alike the English Grammar, the common sense of mankind and the theology of the New Testament. If they are alarmed at the prevalence of Universalism, as doubtless they are, let them employ a scholar, or at least a man of common information, to write or preach against it, or both if they please.

D. S.

UNIVERSALISM.

IN MISSOURI.—The following letter from the "farthest west," indeed, will probably be read with much interest by many of our readers. Universalism spreading at Du Buque, Galena, in Florida, the British Provinces, and flowing onward towards the Rocky Mountains!—Where are there no Universalists, even widely spread as in our native land! And yet, about seventy years ago, in the life-time of some of our grey-haired sires, it might have been asked, with the same propriety, where are there any Universalists? Truly it is the Lord's doing, and to him be all the praise!

"Boonville, Mo., December 17, 1837.

"Friends GROSH and HUTCHINSON.—Discovering that some communications from the 'far West' would be acceptable to you, I venture from this farthest West, with my poor ability, to indite a few lines, which may not, perhaps, be entirely destitute of interest.

"Our town (Boonville) is situated on a healthy and pleasant elevation upon the South side of the Missouri river, 200 miles from St. Louis, and contains about 1500 inhabitants. A rich, fertile and extensively populated country, extending itself, 200 miles to the South, or as far as the Arkansas line, is to us, what western New-York was once to Albany. The country, at present, is its own market; the immigration being so great as not to allow of produce exports.

"Society here is remarkably good, considering the heterogenous character of the materials composing it. Almost every State in the Union has contributed its mite to the mass, but Virginia, of late, has been pouring in its floods of gold and silver, its negroes, horses and waggons; and what is better, some of its highly talented, enterprising and valuable citizens. Little of a proscriptive and illiberal spirit is, as yet, suffered to discover itself in matters of faith, for the reason that strength and unity of action are wanting in all of the sects, to declare their independence of each other. The Cumberland Presbyterians, under the direct ministration of one of the founders of the order, is probably, numerically, the strongest.

"The cause of rational and liberal Christianity, although checked, as in other countries, by the frowns, the coldness, the iron-hearted grasp of Partialism, is growing with our intelligence, and will mature with our increase of reason and experience, as surely as truth will prevail when set in the strongest light against error. It is true, that to the narrow and selfish mind, there is something extremely consolatory in the idea of basking in the sunshine of theocratic favor; yet a more extended and universal feeling must predominate, or genuine Christianity must irretrievably fall.

"Among the many arguments which may be urged against the doctrine of endless misery, the following in my opinion is most unanswerable; and I wish you to lay it before your correspondents, that it may either be satisfactorily answered, or the doctrine of endless wo be abandoned as unfounded and absurd.

1. I assume that there are but three rational objects of punishment; viz. Example, Reformation and Restitution. 2. That neither of these ends or objects can be answered in the endless punishment of the soul; then, lastly, I draw the conclusion, that eternal punishment will not exist.

"Now, what I desire is, either to be shown that there are other, and more than the three rational objects of punishment enumerated above, aside from, and not merging into either of the three; or that eternal punishment can answer, or be subservient to either of the three; then, and not till then, will I relinquish my opposition to Limitarianism; and, until then, its advocates should maintain a sealed, eternal silence. With the greatest deference, I am yours truly, ATHANASIUS."

LIBERALITY.

On the third Sunday in February I preached in Marshall, and in the evening in the vicinity of Br. Dick's, in Brothertown. In the evening the desk was occupied by three Freewill Baptist preachers, (Elders Newell, Fowler, and another,) and Elder Sweet, a preacher of the Christian denomination. The latter made the introductory prayer, and added some remarks, approbatory of certain portions of the discourse. I was informed that a fourth Baptist preacher would have been present, had his health permitted. The school-house, which was erected by our excellent Indian brother, A. Dick, a "Peacemaker" among his people. (his is, indeed, the kingdom of heaven!) is very neat and commodious, easy to speak in, and is furnished with a very pretty pulpit in a recess at one end. He opens it to all denominations, and whoever may preach, all denominations attend. To add to the liberality of my ministering brethren, Elder Newell obligingly offered his services on Monday morning, with the use of Br. Dick's horse and cutter, to carry me home, which he did.—May God bless such a truly Christian spirit with its appropriate reward, and render the people in that vicinity more and more worthy of the name of the settlement where they live—Brothertown. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. BIDDLECOM in Stockbridge and Br. WOOLLEY in Marshall, and in the evening at Oriskany Falls—Br. C. B. BROWN at South Onondaga, and in the evening at the Baptist meeting-house on South Hill—Br. WAGGONER at Carthage and at Lowville in the evening.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. BROWN at Mexicoville, and at Union Square in the evening.

To the societies comprising the Ontario Association.—Brethren, The Association at its last session recommended that a collection be taken up in each society for the purpose of defraying the expenses of delegates to the New-York State Convention, and that the amount thus collected, be forwarded to the Standing Clerk of this body. K. TOWNSEND, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Willoughby (O.) for S M, and J H—P M, Barre Centre, for A M and S S—P M, Portageville, for D E—W P, North Norwich for S W—P M, Cooperstown, for C C, R C, L M and P F—P M, Windsor, for E W, and W H M—S P, Little Falls, for M R, D B, and T A—D R A, South Shaftsbury, (Vt.) for H M S—Rev, J H S, Centreville, for self, O P, N B, C H, R C, J R, H M, S H, C G L, and E N—Rev. T D C, Gaines, for E W and E B—P M, Depauville, for self, and N N N—P M, Onondaga Hollow, for A N Jr, and J D McD—Rev. W L W, Bath, for C R, H S, P H and T C—P M, Cheshire—F P, Elba, for J P and J G—Rev. N B, Nundy Valley, for C G, A G, T W, P G, S S S, and L C W—P M, Preston, for self, D M C, L S, L G, A G C, and E C C—P M, Barcelona, (O.) for G B—P M, Concord, (O.) for D T, G M, and G C—J C H, Lebanon, (O.) Rev. G M, Springfield, (O.) for W K, R A P, M W C, and L B—P M, Newton Falls. (O.) for N L—J G, Seneca Castle, for self, and J D—P M, Moreland, for S C, and M B—P M, West Bloomfield, for G G, C L, and S H—H F, Pittsford, for self, and J L—J I E, East Sheridan, for self, L H W, J I E, and O E.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE POWERS OF MUSIC.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

Come, strike the harp, that o'er the soul
The lightly trembling sounds may roll—
Harmonious numbers can control
The billows of despair—
Can check the tear, or bid it flow—
Make the sad heart with rapture glow—
Dart sunny rays through clouds of wo,
And calm the waves of care.

Awake to melody the strings—
Sublime emotions music brings—
A halo round our senses flings,
That sanctifies the soul.
Its genius, rob'd with azure bright,
Came down to earth with magic might,
When the first beams of rosy light
O'er dewy Eden stole.

The morning stars together sung,
The heavenly domes with music rung,
The sons of God with joyful tongue
Announc'd creation's birth,
The rolling spheres harmonious join
To praise the forming hand divine,
That did so wondrously combine
Intelligence with earth.

The Author saw his work was good,
As man in his own image stood—
Imbu'd with noble gifts, he should
To noble deeds aspire.
Long ages passed, and then, again,
The heavenly hosts o'er Judah's plain,
Glad tidings sung in lofty strain,
And angels tun'd the lyre.

Now life and immortality,
Are brought to light and man is free—
Let mortals join, with bended knee,
To sing th' exalted scheme—
Come, let the thrilling numbers roll
O'er every fibre of the soul
Throughout the world—from pole to pole,
SALVATION be the theme.

Henderson, N. Y., 1833.

ETERNITY OF GOD.

We receive such repeated intimations of decay in the world through which we are passing; decline and change and loss follow decline and change and loss in such rapid succession, that we can almost catch the sound of universal wasting, and hear the work of desolation going on busily around us. "The mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place. The waters wear the stones, the things which grow out of the dust of the earth are washed away, and the hope of man is destroyed." Conscious of our own instability we look about for something to rest on, but we look in vain. The heavens and the earth had a beginning and they will have an end. The face of the world is changing, daily and hourly. All animated things grow old and die. The rocks crumble, the trees fall, the leaves fade, and the grass withers. The clouds are flying, and the waters are flowing away from us.

The firmest works of man, too, are gradually giving way, the ivy clings to the mouldering tower, the briar hangs out from the shattered window, and the wall-flower springs from the disjointed stones. The founders of those perishable works have shared the same fate long ago. If we look back to the days of our ancestors, to the men as well as the dwellings of former times, they become immediately associated in our imaginations, and only make the feeling of instability stronger and deeper than before. In the spacious domes, which once held our fathers, the serpent hisses, and the wild bird screams. The halls, which once were crowded with all that taste and science and labor could procure, which resounded with melody, and were lighted up with beauty, are buried by their own ruins, mocked by their own desolation. The voice of merriment, and of wailing the steps of the busy and the idle have ceased in the deserted courts, and the weeds choke the entrances, and the long grass waves upon the hearth-stone. The works of art, the forming hand, the tombs, the very ashes they contained, are all gone.

If every thing which comes under our notice has endured for so short a time, and in so short a time will be no more, we can not say that we receive the least assurance by thinking on ourselves. When they, on whose fate we have been meditating, were engaged in the active scenes of life, as full of health and hope as we are now, what were we? We had no knowledge, no consciousness, no being; there was not a single thing in the wide universe which knew us. And after the same interval shall have elapsed, which now divides their days from ours, what shall we be? What they are now.—When a few more friends have left, a few more hopes deceived, and a few more changes mocked us, "we shall be brought to the grave, and shall remain in the tomb, the clods of the valley shall be sweet unto us, and every man shall follow us, as there are innumerable before us." All power will have forsaken the strongest, and the loftiest will be laid low, and every eye will be closed, and every voice hushed, and every heart will have ceased its beating. And when we have gone ourselves, even our memories will not stay behind us long. A few of the near and dear will bear our likeness in their bosoms, till they too have arrived at the end of their journey, and entered the dark dwelling of unconsciousness. In the thoughts of others we shall live only till the last sound of the bell, which informs them of our departure, has ceased to vibrate in their ears. A stone, perhaps, may tell some wanderer where we lie, when we came here, and when we went away, but even that will soon refuse to bear us record; "time's effacing fingers" will be busy on its surface, and at length will wear it smooth, and then the stone itself will sink, or crumble, and the wanderer of another age will pass, without a single call upon his sympathy, over our unheeded graves.

Is there nothing to counteract the sinking of the heart, which must be the effect of observations like these? Is there no substance among all these shadows? If all who live and breathe around us are the creatures of yesterday, and destined to see destruction to-morrow; if the same condition is our own, and the same sentence is written against us; if the solid forms of inanimate nature and laborious art are fading and falling; if we look in vain for durability to the very roots of the mountains, where shall we turn, and on what can we rely? Can no support be offered; can no source of confidence be named? Oh yes! there is one Being to whom we can look with a perfect conviction of finding that security, which nothing about us can give, and which nothing about us can take away. To this Being we can lift up our souls, and on him we may rest them, exclaiming in the language of the monarch of Israel, "before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world; even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God." "Of old hast thou laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure, yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment, as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed, but thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end."

Here then is a support, which will never fail; here is a foundation which can never be moved, the everlasting Creator of countless worlds, "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity." What a sublime conception! He inhabits eternity, occupies this inconceivable duration, pervades and fills throughout this boundless dwelling. Ages on ages before even the dust of which we are formed was created, HE had existed in infinite majesty, and ages on ages will roll away after we have all returned to the dust whence we were taken, and still HE will exist in infinite majesty, living in the eternity of his own nature, reigning in the plenitude of his own omnipotence, for ever sending forth the word, which forms, supports and governs all things, commanding new created light to shine on new created worlds, and raising up new created generations to inhabit them.

The contemplation of this glorious attribute of God is fitted to excite in our minds the most animating and consoling reflections. Standing, as we are, amid the ruins of time, and the wrecks of mortality, where every thing about us is created and dependant, proceeding from nothing, and hastening to destruction, we rejoice that something is presented to our view which has stood from everlasting, and will remain forever. When we have looked on the pleasures of life, and they have vanished away; when we have looked on the works of nature, and perceived that they were changing; on the monuments of art, and seen that they would not stand; on our friends, and they have fled while we were gazing; on ourselves and felt that we were as fleeting as they; when we have looked on every object to which we could turn our anxious eyes, and they have all told us that they could give us no hope nor support, because they were so feeble themselves; we can look to the throne of God; change and decay have never reached it; the revolution of ages has never moved it; the waves of an eternity have been rushing past it, but it has remained unshaken; the waves of another eternity are rushing toward it, but it is fixed, and can never be disturbed.

And blessed be God, who has assured us by a revelation from himself, that the throne of eternity is likewise a throne of mercy and love; who has permitted and invited us to repose ourselves and our hopes on that which alone is everlasting and unchangeable. We shall shortly finish our allotted time on earth, even if it should be unusually prolonged. We shall leave behind us all which is now familiar and beloved, and a world of other days and other men will be entirely ignorant that once we lived. But the same unalterable Being will still preside over the universe, through all its changes, and from his remembrance we shall never be blotted. We can never be where he is not, nor where he sees and loves and upholds us not. He is our Father and our God for ever. He takes us from earth that he may lead us to Heaven, that he may refine our nature from all its principles of corruption, share with us his own immortality, admit us to his everlasting habitation, and crown us with his eternity.—Greenwood.

EXTRACT.

"It is the belief of the Arabs that to the earliest places of human worship there clings a guardian sanctity—there the wild bird rests not, there the wild beast does not wander, it is the blessed spot on which the eye of God dwells, and man's best memories preserve. As with the earliest place of worship, so it is with the earliest haven of repose—as with the spot where our first imperfect adoration was offered up, our first glimpses of divinity indulged, so should it be with that where our full knowledge of the Arch Cause begins, and we can pour forth a gratitude no longer clouded by the troubles and cares of earth. Surely if any spot in the world be sacred, it is that in which grief ceases, and from which, if the harmonies, of creation if the voice within our hearts, if the impulse which made man so easy a believer in revelation, if these mock and fool us not with an everlasting lie, we spring up on the untiring wings of a seraphic and pangless life—those whom we loved, around us; the aspirings that we nursed, fulfilled; our nature, universal intelligence,—our atmosphere, eternal Love!"

BULWER.

MARRIAGES.

In Middleville, February 8th, by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, Mr. STANDISH BARRY, 3d, of Newport, to Miss ALMIRA ELIZA, daughter of John Kniffin of the former place.

In Columbia, Herkimer county, on the 8th inst., by Rev. Mr. Wightman, Mr. THOMAS V. YOUNG, to Miss ELIZABETH M. MINER, all of that place.

DEATHS.

In Alabama, Genesee county, February 5th, Mrs. AMARILLA HOVEY, aged 23 years. Some years since, the deceased connected herself with a Unitarian church, but, by a more candid investigation of the Scriptures, she became convinced of the truth of the doctrine of "the restitution of all things," in which faith she lived and died, respected and beloved by all who knew her. A very large concourse of friends and relatives, assembled on the 7th, (among whom were three Partialist preachers) to pay the last tribute of respect to the dead, and to sympathise with the afflicted mourners. May the God of all consolation support those that mourn! The funeral sermon was delivered by the writer. C. HAMMOND.

In Newport, February 6th, JONATHAN HURLBURT, aged 84 years. The deceased was respected in life—adorned the Gospel of Jesus—and left the world "lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting."—His funeral was attended at the Baptist meeting house in Newport village, by a sympathising people, to whom the writer dispensed the word of life and salvation.—May God bless and sustain the aged consort of Br. H., and comfort all who mourn. W. H. WAGGONER.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH,
Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Cashurine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MARCH 9, 1838. NUMBER 10.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER III.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

FORMING THE MANNERS.

"Manners maketh man," is a motto inscribed in the celebrated school of William of Wykham, at Winchester, England. And it is no less true, in the same sense, that manners maketh the lady. If a lack of good manners, if vulgarity and indelicacy, are failings disgusting even in man, how much more unbecoming are they in woman! A due cultivation of the manners, the general deportment, is of high importance to young ladies. Next to purity of character and sweetness of disposition, you depend for success in life, upon a well-regulated outward deportment. In regard to exterior appearance, "manners, and not dress, are the ornaments of woman." The dress may blaze with jewels—the brow may be encircled by a glittering tiara of diamonds—yet if the manners are haughty and scornful, or coarse and vulgar, in vain is the costly attire assumed; it can not inspire affection or respect in those who are discriminating. But a demeanor characterized by modesty, circumspection, frankness, and good temper—not too forward, nor too reserved—will secure for you the confidence and esteem of your acquaintance, even though your dress be of the most plain and simple character. Let me assure you, young ladies, that, let young men say what they will, they are much sooner captivated by a modest, delicate demeanor, than by a brazen boldness. I do not assert that a set, ceremonious deportment is necessary to render a young woman engaging; but I insist that propriety in manners, is an essential requisite to a pleasing appearance.

In no country is it more important to cultivate good manners than in our own; and yet there is a great deficiency of care and instruction in this particular. "A young girl often grows up, without ever being told that to laugh audibly in public, or in crowded assemblies, is not good manners; that presenting herself at the end of a crowded bench, and looking for a seat, till some gentleman feels himself obliged to give her his, is very ill-bred.....You will be careful not to wear any head-dress that will prevent those behind you from seeing well; you will never, by whispering, hinder those around you from hearing easily; you will never seem to claim any particular seat as your right; you will never attempt to keep seats for those of your party who come later than you; you will never suffer, much less oblige, a gentleman to relinquish to you the good seat which he has fairly earned by going very early, and sitting long in patience. You will carefully avoid going in late, and disturbing the company after the lecture has begun; but if you do chance to arrive late, you will step softly, and take the first seat you can find, instead of making further interruption, by parading through the room in search of a better.....If you are the first to occupy a seat, and it is open at both ends, you should take the middle of it; if open only at one end, you should take that part next the wall; because by not doing this, you either oblige people to crowd past you, or you make a great stir by moving every time one is added to the number.....Always think of the good of the whole audience, rather than of your own individual convenience. This rule is often transgressed in crowded assemblies, in warm weather. The windows are opened for the good of the whole; but the air comes too powerfully on the neck of some individual, and she very coolly desires that the window may be shut, entirely regardless of those who, in the middle of the building, are panting for that breath of fresh air which she is shutting out. Health and life may depend on your not sitting in that draught of air; but if so, you should protect yourself by additional clothing, change your seat, or leave the place, rather than incommode hundreds by having a window shut on your account. I have seen a large assembly of people almost suffocated for want of fresh air, in consequence of one window after another being closed, at the request of some two or three persons sitting by them."*

The first impressions we receive in regard to persons, are often lasting. And in mingling in society, the stranger forms his first conclusions of your worth, from your manners. It is true, a fair countenance, or a symmetrical form, may attract the eye of a stranger; but if, in his farther scrutiny, he discovers superciliousness or vulgarity in manners, the charms of person vanish, and disgust takes the place of admiration. But when your deportment is dictated by propriety, you have the advantage on introduction of making a favorable impression at once. People generally will draw some conclusion from your manners, in regard to your real character and disposition; for the outward demeanor is always understood, without something is distinctly known to the contrary, as indicating the moral principles and the emotions of the heart. "You may take two individuals of precisely the same degree of intellect and moral worth, and let the manners of the one be bland and attractive, and those of the other, distant or awkward, and you will find that the former will pass through life with far more ease and comfort than the latter. For though good manners will never effectually conceal a bad heart, and are, in no case, any atonement for it, yet, taken in connection with amiable and virtuous dispositions, they naturally and necessarily gain upon the respect and good-will of mankind."

Let it be understood that the real source of good manners and a pleasing deportment, is in the heart. They must rest upon kind, amiable, benevolent feelings—upon a disposition of good-will towards your fellow-beings, and a desire to minister to their enjoyments. Unless these emotions dwell in the soul, and influence the conduct, young ladies can not display that pleasing, attractive demeanor upon which, from their condition, they so much depend for prosperity in life. The dancing and the posture masters may give a certain polish to the manners, but without these kind emotions of the soul, they will be cold, hypocritical, and repulsive; and in such an instance, the least discernment is sufficient to satisfy the spectator, that although bows, and smiles, and simpers plentifully abound, yet the heart is uninterested and insensible. Such efforts to please are thrown away. But when the heart possesses the proper feelings—when you are kindly disposed toward all—it will require but little training to cause the manners to become proper and pleasing. Be it remembered, then, that in acquiring pleasing manners, the attention must first be directed to the heart! Banish from it all improper desires and evil dispositions, all emotions of haughtiness, pride, envy, jealousy, hatred, and enmity—let no feelings obtain ascendency there, but such as are amiable, kind, and praiseworthy—and without the shade of a doubt, your deportment will be appropriate and attractive.

You should not mistake in what the characteristics of a genuine "lady" consist. Remember that "in this privileged land, where we acknowledge no distinctions but what are founded on character and manners, she is a lady who, to inbred modesty and refinement, adds a scrupulous attention to the rights and feelings of others. Let her worldly possessions be great or small, let her occupations be what they may, such an one is a lady, a gentlewoman! Whilst the person who is bold, coarse, vociferous, and inattentive to the rights and feelings of others, who is haughty and overbearing, let her possessions be ever so great, and her way of living ever so genteel, and her beauty ever so fascinating, is a vulgar woman. Thus we may see a lady sewing for her livelihood, and a vulgar woman moving in fashionable circles, or presiding over a most expensive establishment."

In forming the manners, it is well to adopt some model for imitation. To this end, select from the circle of your acquaintance, some one or more females who are your seniors in age, whose general deportment is worthy of your imitation—allowance being made for diversity of age and condition. Let your model combine every qualification that is useful and agreeable—remembering that "those who speak well and do well, should alone be imitated." I would not have you servilely imitate every word and action; this would beget a formality that would be disgusting; and there are peculiarities in manners which are becoming in some, that would be disagreeable and repulsive in others. But by having an example before you, and by conforming therewith in your general deportment, your demeanor will soon naturally become characterized by an attractive propriety.

Affectation and vanity are to be sedulously avoided by every young woman. To assume manners, attitudes, and forms of speech, that are not natural or becoming—to take upon you an appearance of accomplishments and refinements, which you do not possess—in fine, to pretend to be what you are not—is a practice exceedingly repulsive; it is unworthy the female character, and will subject you to ridicule and contempt. It is assuming a gloss which is easily seen through—it is adopting a deception which is readily detected; and the results of these false assumptions, will be greatly to your injury. Never be guilty of puerile affectations and indications of false modesty. Let your conduct be characterized by prudent frankness, simplicity, and candor, and it will be far more agreeable and winning. "Delicacy is, in truth, a shy and sensitive plant, which shrinks from observation, and is frequently most abundant where the least of it is obtruded upon our notice. There are, doubtless, some ladies, who from nourishing a morbid sensibility, are delicate to excess. But, generally speaking, they who make a troublesome and ostentatious display of delicacy, affect that which they do not feel. The young reader may be assured, that this affectation is not only wicked for its hypocrisy, but very injurious to the reputation of those who display it. Real piety shuns all singularities, and never courts observation by ostentatious rigor. It is the same with delicacy. That which is real, is always unobtrusive and unstudied. The innocent, having nothing to conceal, practice no art; and an open simplicity of manner, the very reverse of affectation, is an infallible symptom and sure companion of true delicacy."

*Young Lady's Friend.

You should also avoid a haughty, overbearing disposition and air. This is deprecated when seen in men; but it is far more unnatural and disagreeable in women. With those who, from their vices, are unworthy your respect, you should hold no intercourse whatever. But whoever, from their virtues, are deserving your respect, should be treated in accordance with their merits. Your conduct towards them should be marked by affability, condescension, and esteem, whatever may be their rank or condition. A haughty woman is disliked by her own sex, and shunned by the other, as one who is, or will be, a termagant.

There are several qualifications indispensably requisite to the deportment of ladies, and without which, all other conceivable accomplishments are vain. It is hardly necessary to inform the young lady, that among these, modesty holds the highest rank. Modesty is a bright jewel in the character of woman. It imparts a loveliness and attraction to all accomplishments, which we look for in vain in its absence. "It heightens all the virtues which it accompanies; like the shades in paintings, it raises and rounds every figure, and makes the colors more beautiful, though not so glaring as they would be without it." Modesty is not only an ornament to the female character, but one of its surest safe-guards. It is a monitor that warns of approaching danger, and causes its possessor to flee from evil, and to shrink from even the appearance of impropriety. Addison asserts with truth, that "if you banish modesty out of the world, she carries away with her, half the virtue there is in it." And I would add, if you banish modesty from the characteristics of woman, you destroy one of the highest attractions she possesses. Modesty atones for the absence of many other accomplishments. The young lady who is unskilled in many of the technicalities of refinement, is still attractive when modesty characterizes her demeanor—while the reigning belle, who is a proficient in all the accomplishments of the age, is repulsive and disgusting, when exhibiting an immodest demeanor.

In connection with this subject, there is a practice against which I can not avoid cautioning young ladies. I refer to public "fairs," or auctions—one of those modern schemes in which ladies have been induced to engage, to filch money from community. In these "fairs," young women present themselves to the gaze of a miscellaneous multitude, as public traffickers; and every device is put into execution, to draw "the filthy lucre" from the pockets of gentlemen. Is it not evident, that on these occasions, many ladies place more dependence upon a display of their charms and the fascination of their manners, to obtain money, than upon the real value of the articles exposed for sale? These "fairs" could, with more propriety, be termed "public marts for the display of female arts and fascinations."—These public exhibitions—these scenes of bantering and trickery—require in the ladies engaged in them, a boldness, a brazen confidence, a masculine air and manner, little according with that retiring modesty, that sensitive delicacy, so pre-eminently becoming in woman! I would caution young ladies against this public display of their persons—this practice of extorting and begging money from the male sex. It has an indecorous appearance, and its tendency upon their modesty and innate purity of heart, must be any thing but salutary. I am aware that these schemes are generally got up under the ostensible name of charity. But who does not know that there are other, and more commendable and appropriate ways, in which ladies can exert themselves in the cause of true benevolence, without violating that delicacy which is the crowning charm of their nature?

Gentleness is another necessary ingredient in the manners of the lady. A harsh, headstrong disposition, is peculiarly unbecoming in woman; it gives a masculine cast to her character, which is far from being agreeable. Superior talents and elegant accomplishments, are entirely nugatory, unless accompanied by a gentle, docile disposition. Gentleness is peculiarly a womanly endowment. It imparts a sweetness, an attraction, to the whole character, that is truly prepossessing.

Young ladies can not be too cautious in regard to their deportment towards their associates of the male sex. In this respect, there are two extremes to be avoided—a forward, coquetish familiarity, on the one hand, and a prudish, affected reserve, on the other. To shun both these extremes, and occupy that medium ground which is dictated by propriety, is that peculiar province of woman, in which her own good sense must be her director. You should, however, be aware, that the conversation and manners of young men in your presence, will depend much upon your own tastes. You have no inconsiderable power in causing their demeanor toward you to be agreeable. If, as has been remarked in another chapter, their language or deportment is not such as you would have it, much of the blame can be attached to yourselves; because you have the remedy in your own hands. By withdrawing from their presence, or by a firm, decided reprimand, you can show your displeasure, and the evil is remedied. For, believe me, when young men ascertain your principles and tastes, they will studiously endeavor to conform to them, if they desire to frequent your company.

Never aspire after the name of a "belle." Young ladies of this character, may be followed by a crowd of flatterers for a season; but they are utterly incapable of inspiring that true affection which is so requisite to the peace and happiness of woman. They are despised by their own sex, and distrusted by the other. And after reigning for a season, they generally throw themselves away on some senseless fop, incapable of cherishing true esteem, to pass with him a wretched life. "Men of loose morals or impertinent behavior, must always be avoided; or, if at any time you are obliged to be in their company, you must keep them at a distance by cold civility. But in regard to those gentlemen with whom your parents or guardians think it proper for you to associate, and who give no offence by their manners, to them behave with the same frankness and simplicity as if they were of your own sex. If you have natural modesty, you will never transgress its bounds whilst you converse with a man, as one rational creature with another. You should endeavor to distinguish real esteem and love from idle gallantry and unmeaning fine speeches. The slighter notice you take of these last, the better; but the first must be treated with seriousness and well-bred sincerity—not giving the least encouragement you do not mean, nor assuming airs of contempt, where it is not deserved."*

The subject of female manners can not be better summed up, than in the words of a late writer, who thus speaks of Mrs. Hannah More, the celebrated English authoress:—"It was my privilege, a few years ago, to make a visit to the residence of this distinguished female; a visit which I have ever since regarded as among the happiest incidents of my life. At that time she numbered more than four score years; but the vigor of her intellect was scarcely at all impaired. In her manners she united the dignity and refinement of the court, with the most exquisite urbanity and gentleness, which the female character, in its loveliest forms, ever exhibited. She impressed me continually with a high sense of the intellectual and moral qualities by which she was distinguished, but still left me as unconstrained as if I had been conversing with my beloved child. There was an air of graceful and unaffected ease; an instinctive regard to the most delicate proprieties of social intercourse—a readiness to communicate, and yet a desire to listen—the dignity of conscious merit, united with the humility of the devoted Christian—in short, there was such an assemblage of intellectual and moral excellences beaming forth in every expression, and look, and attitude, that I could scarcely conceive of a more perfect exhibition of human character."

*Young Lady's Own Book.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. I.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

"For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul"?—MATT. xvi: 26.

It is well known that this passage is a standing text for the frightful themes held forth in protracted meetings and elsewhere, to frighten men, and show them the supposed utter worthlessness of all worldly wealth, when compared with the hazard of obtaining it at the expense of endless wailing. It is taken for granted, that the word "soul" means the immortal spirit, and that to lose this soul, is to live in the ever-burning wrath of Deity. It is not a little unaccountable, how this view should be entertained by so many of the professed teachers of the day, when, if they have at all examined the subject, they must know that the passage can not have any such reference. The word in Greek is psuche, and is rendered life in verse 25: "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall find it." Now, if we substitute the word soul for life, and by soul understand the immortal spirit, we shall discover the absurdity of the modern notions. "For whosoever will save his immortal soul shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his immortal soul, shall find it"—that is, he who strives to secure his salvation, shall most certainly be destroyed; but he who strives to ruin his salvation, shall most certainly gain it. If this monstrous absurdity is true, people should be exhorted to give up all earnestness in reference to future salvation; for carelessness will only serve to secure it. And yet this absurdity grows out of understanding psuche to mean the immortal spirit, either in verse 25 or 26. But the question arises, what is the correct view of that word, in this instance? This question we shall answer by the light which the deeply critical portion of our (so called) Orthodox brethren furnish.

1st. Parkhurst expresses the sense of psuche in this passage, by the phrase "animal life." See his Lexicon, word psuche, section 2.

2d. Dr. George Campbell translates verse 26 thus: "What is a man profited, if he should gain the whole world, with the forfeit of his life? or what will a man not give in ransom for his life?" His note is as follows: "With the forfeit of his life—ten de psuchen zemiothe. English translation, lose his own soul. Forfeit comes nearer the import of the original word, which Doddridge has endeavored to convey by a circumlocution, should be punished with the loss of his life. But the chief error in the English translation, lies in changing, without necessity, the word answering to psuche, calling it, in the preceding verse, life, and in this, soul. The expressions are proverbial, 'it signifies nothing, how much a man may gain, if it be at the expense of his life.' That our Lord has a principal eye to the loss of the soul, or of eternal life, there can be no doubt. But this sentiment is couched under a proverb, which, in familiar use, concerns only the present life."

3d. The note by Dr. Clarke is very explicit. "Lose his own soul.] Or, lose his life, tenpsuchen auton. On what authority many have translated the word psuche, in the 25th verse, life, and this verse, soul, I know not; but am certain it means life in both places. If a man should gain the whole world, its riches, honors, and pleasures, and lose his life, what would all these profit him, seeing they can only be enjoyed during life?"

4th. To these authorities others might be added, showing that the simple meaning of psuche in this instance, is life—but those quoted are sufficient.

It is evident from the context, that the disciples, in common with the rest of the Jews, expected that the Messiah was a temporal Prince. And hence, when they heard him speak of being betrayed and crucified by the Jews, Peter rebuked him, because his crucifixion would be death to their great expectations of exalted offices in the earthly kingdom they believed he was to establish. One great object of our Saviour, was to eradicate this notion from the minds of his disciples, and shew them that his followers must give up earthly aggrandizement. The instruction of the 25th and 26th verses of Matthew xvi, aimed at this very point, and may be given in the following paraphrase: "That person who seeks to save his life, by eschewing the persecutions which my disciples must experience, and by remaining attached to the institutions of the Jews, will lose it in the destruction which will fall upon this land and nation, when the Roman armies shall sweep away this devoted people—but that person who is willing to yield up his life in defence of my cause, shall save it; for when punishment shall come upon this wicked generation, none of my followers shall be killed; for he that endureth to the end of these troubles, shall be saved. Seeing this is the case, of what benefit would it be to you to gain the whole world, if you must lose your life at the same time? Would you not give the whole world in exchange for your life? Give up, then, this strong desire for earthly aggrandizement, and trust to Him in whose care you are, and who will render you immortal so long as he has a work for you to do.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LOVE OF GOD.

BY REV. SAMUEL GOFF.

Much has been said and much written upon the love of God, but still the subject is not exhausted. The theme is yet fruitful and will ever continue to be so. It is more boundless than creation inasmuch as the cause must exceed the effect. Yea, it is as unbounded, unlimited and fathomless as the infinity of Jehovah! Being the very nature and essence of the Deity, it is necessarily incomprehensible by weak and finite mortals. Should all the posterity of Adam blend their voices in sweet accord to celebrate the love of our Father in heaven—should they be joined by all the angelic hosts in the joyous anthem of "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men"—and should they sound their harmonious notes till the latest period of time—they would have but just begun to sing the praises of redeeming grace and dying love.

When we contemplate the love of God to sinful man, as exhibited in the mission, life and death of his Son Jesus Christ—when we reflect, that when he created man he designed him for a glorious and blessed immortality beyond the conflicting scenes of this transitory existence—when we reflect that we, together with every intelligent being that has ever existed, or ever will exist, upon the earth, shall ere long be raised from the dead to eternal life and ceaseless beatitude—and realize that all this is in consequence of the love of God—we are lost in the vastness and sublimity of the theme! It defies the force of imagination, and the powers of description! It is vast, mighty, incomprehensible!

"But not to earth's contracted span" should we limit the love of God, "when thousand worlds are round." Scattered throughout the immensity of space are innumerable worlds, some of which are several hundred, and even thousands of times larger than our sublunary sphere. These, in all probability, are the abodes of rational and intelligent beings. If, then, with the eye of philosophy, we see in each star that glitters in the nocturnal heavens, not only a mighty globe, but the centre of a system of worlds, and these the habitation of intelligent beings, what a sum of intellectual and rational existence do we behold! Over this vast assemblage of worlds, and this mighty concourse of intellect, God presides. He sways the sceptre of unlimited control over the universal empire of creation. Of all the innumerable beings that people the regions of matter throughout universal space, he is the Creator, Upholder, and Preserver. And how pleasing, how rejoicing, is the reflection that they are the offspring of infinite and unchanging love!—that they are preserved by, and daily experiencing the effects of unbounded goodness!

Now it is the happy privilege of the Universalist, to believe, that wherever rational and intelligent beings exist, there exists also the germ of immortal, unfading and happy existence.

If, then, the love of God in the redemption and salvation of man so far transcends the powers of the human understanding—if we can not form even a tolerable conception of the Creator's love for us—and if our admiration and veneration of the eternal Mind are thus excited in contemplating the immortal felicity of the inhabitants of one globe—how high must be our admiration, how great beyond description the sensations of our hearts, when we reflect that the same infinite and changeless love watches over, guards and preserves, and will finally bring to the enjoyment of immortal joys and endless life, the vast concourse of intelligences which almighty Power has called into existence!

"Oh, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men." "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Van Buren, N. Y., January, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DIALOGUE.

The following conversation, in substance, took place between myself and a student of the Theological Institution in this village, after listening to a discourse delivered by Mr. Knapp, (the great manager of protracted meetings,) the design of which was to overthrow Universalism.

S. I was once a Universalist myself.

M. You once a Universalist!

S. Yes—I once believed that doctrine, and advocated it as earnestly as any other man.

M. There are now, and have been, quite too many who have pretended to believe the doctrine, and brought forth arguments in defence of what they called Universalism, when, in fact, they are and were totally ignorant of the doctrine and its requirements. They never search the Scriptures to ascertain if these things are so, but merely pretend to believe that all mankind will be saved, (no matter how,) because some one else believes it; and I do not know but you may have belonged to this class.

S. I read my Bible attentively, and became convinced that it taught the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind, and I delighted to converse on the subject—was ready at all times to prove the doctrine true by the Bible.

M. But there are the threatenings—what did you do with them?—could you reconcile them with the promises, and explain them so that they would harmonize with the doctrine of the final salvation of all men?

S. Yes—I explained them as the Universalists now do, and had no doubt of the correctness of those explanations.

M. Well, Sir, did you put the doctrine in practice, or did it lead you into all manner of sin and iniquity, as Br. Knapp represented it would do, in his discourse this evening.

S. No—that doctrine never led me to commit sin, but, on the contrary, I had a desire to do right; I felt that I loved God supremely, and my neighbor as myself—I endeavored to do unto others as I would that others should do to me—I was determined to show to the world that there could be a practical Universalist.

M. You must have been a happy man, truly, to have believed this glorious doctrine as firmly as you say you did, and at the same time living up to its requirements—you must have found it to be a heavenly doctrine to live by, to say the least.

S. To be sure I did—and I felt confident that it would give great consolation in the hour of death. I could look forward to that period with joy, fully believing that I could die triumphing in the faith.

M. Well, my dear Sir, as you once believed in "the restitution of all things, spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets, since the world began," and this doctrine, you say, you learned from the Bible, and always appealed to that volume for evidence to prove it true—and as you now believe that God will consign a certain portion of his intelligent creatures to an endless hell, there to be tossed by demons on the liquid waves of vindictive wrath, as long as God himself shall exist, will you be so good as to tell me what caused a change in your views? Will you bring forward the evidence, that if I am in an error, I may also be convinced?

S. I was taken sick, and my sickness continued six or seven months, and I lost all hopes of ever regaining my health. I became gloomy and melancholy—I thought that while I lived, I should only be a trouble to myself and friends, and, consequently, I had better be dead than alive. I therefore resolved to put an end to my existence. Accordingly I took my razor, and was about to draw the fatal stroke, when this passage occurred to my mind—"No murderer shall enter the kingdom of heaven"—which convinced me that the doctrine of endless misery was true, and if I murdered myself I was lost forever.

M. Is this the only passage that convinced you that the doctrine of Universalism was false, and that of endless sin and suffering true?

S. Yes, that alone convinced me—and I believe if I had committed suicide, as I intended, I must certainly have gone to an endless hell.

M. Unfortunately for you, my dear Sir, the passage which converted you from Universalism to Orthodoxy, was taken from the volume of imagination, and not from the volume of divine truth.

S. I believe there is a passage in the Bible which reads so, or very near it—is there not?

M. The scripture which you refer to, undoubtedly, may be found in the third chapter and fifteenth verse of the first epistle of John, which reads thus: "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer, and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him." As to the true meaning of this text, I suppose there will be no difference of opinion between us, for it is self-evident, that while there is hatred rankling in our breast, we can not enjoy the love of God. You will notice that it is spoken in the present tense: "No murderer hath eternal life." Therefore, if you have no stronger evidence than that drawn from imagination, to support the doctrine of endless misery, I must still believe that "the Lord will not cast off forever—though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies, for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men."

Hamilton, January, 1838. J. M.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

EVENING REFLECTIONS.

The glorious king of day has again finished his daily round, and hid himself behind the western hills. The eastern clouds are tipped with burnished gold, displaying a scene of beauty and loveliness, that the painter's skill would be exerted in vain to imitate.

All is still, and peaceful, and quiet. The mechanic has left his shop, and the merchant his counting-house; the birds of the air and beasts of the field, have retired to their places of rest; the helpless infant reposes in peaceful security upon the breast of its affectionate mother; while the the sons of labor and toil, seek refreshment and repose upon their beds.

These scenes are but every day occurrences, and we heed them not. Yet, to how many of our fellow-beings has the sun now set for the last time. Now, while so many are enjoying quiet and refreshing slumber upon their beds, how many are sleeping "the sleep of death," and resting in their low and narrow beds—"the house appointed for all the living." How many have this day spun out life's last slender thread; and who now know by experience what it is to die.

And this will soon be the lot of each of us—and may the recollection of this fact "so teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." H. L. H.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1838.

JOHN VIII: 12-29.

It is seldom that Jesus introduces any remark such as that which occurs in the 12th verse, without some appropriate occasion. This the attentive reader of the New Testament can not fail to remark for himself. The lessons which he attempted to impart in parables, are an instance of this. His address when children were presented to him, is another. From that circumstance, he takes occasion to recommend the simplicity, meekness and docility of childhood, as indispensable to the reception of his kingdom, or his predominating influence. From the strict regard paid by the Pharisees to frequent ablutions, our wise Instructor takes occasion to enforce a regard to the purity of the interior, from which, and not from any neglect of the exterior, all essential defilement proceeds. Many similar instances of the familiar and impressive manner which Jesus usually adopted, might be added: The memory of each reader will probably suggest one or two.—What the occasion was which introduced the lesson contained in the 12th verse, we are not told by the historian. Dr. A. Clarke thinks that allusion is here made to a custom which was observed on the 9th day, or day after the great day (chap. vii: 37,) of the festival of Tabernacles. This day was called the festival of joy for the law; and on it the Jews were accustomed to take all the sacred books out of the chest in which they were preserved, and to put a lighted candle in their place in allusion to Prov. vi: 23—"For the commandment is a lamp," etc; or to Psalm cxix: 115—"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path." Probably when this operation was going forward, Jesus took occasion to address the multitudes, who had assembled to witness it, upon the true light which they had been taught by their prophets to expect. (See Isaiah ix: 2; xlix: 6; lx: 1.)—One of our young friends supposes that Jesus came, on this morning, to the temple early, that he might have an opportunity of addressing the people from the various parts of the country before they departed on their journey homewards, and that he pointed to a bright morning sun, naturally an object of interest to those about to commence a journey. If such a custom as that mentioned by Dr. Clarke, were in existence at the time of our Saviour, we would incline to the former supposition; but the latter is also natural and ingenious, inasmuch as those about to take a journey would be anxiously regarding the signs of the sun.

It is obvious from the reply of the Pharisees, that they understood the proposition which Jesus had made, as equivalent to saying that he was the Messiah. All that is needed to understand the dialogue from the 13th to the 29th verse, is a knowledge of the prejudiced state of mind prevalent among the Pharisaic sect, chiefly in reference to the Messiah, and an acquaintance with the terrible calamities which, soon after the death of Jesus, befel the Jewish people and nation. As to the prejudices of the Jews, our young readers generally know that the prevailing opinion in reference to the Messiah "who was to come," was, that he was to be the King, Leader and Deliverer of the nation. They do not see any direct proofs of this state of opinion in this paragraph, but they will readily discover the sneer and scoff with which they treated Jesus as an impostor. This derisive spirit breaks out in verses 13, 19, and more particularly in verse 22.

The Pharisees, like all men under the influence of prejudice, do not wish to investigate—only to carp, cavil and misrepresent. No disposition is shown to listen or inquire, either into the meaning or the evidence of the statement which Jesus makes. No, they think they have caught him "tripping." He had previously said, that if he bore witness of himself, his witness was not true, (chap. v: 31,) and upon this hint they spake.—Observe how indignantly a character conscious of its own veracity and dignity, repels the base insinuations of malicious fault finders: Jesus, before vindicating the truth of his former statement, throws himself upon his consciousness of his honesty and high destiny. He says—I know that I possess an irreproachable character, and moreover, I possess a firm conviction of my divine commission—I know whence I am, and wherefore I came, and will ye, who must be conscious of your unwillingness to inquire into the truth, and of your deep malignity towards me, will ye presume to arraign me, to breathe against me a whisper of your unreasonable and malicious discontent? The false opinions ye have imbibed and to which you obstinately adhere, utterly prevent your being able to appreciate the veracity and dignity of my character, or to give a candid consideration to the evidences which I am daily exhibiting of my heaven-sealed commission. After this out-burst of honest indignation, Jesus shews them that his works and witness are really the testimony of two—of the Father who gave the power, and of himself who exercised it—and that their own law received such testimony. No commentator, that we know of, has taken the view given above of the first part of Jesus' reply, or of verses 14, 15 and part of 16. One of our young friends supplied the hint, and from this, and several like incidents, we are inclined to think, that parents and other instructors of youth may frequently derive from the judiciously-encouraged suggestions of their pupils, helps to a more thorough understanding of "the book of books."

Jesus, in verse 21, tells the Jews that he foresaw that they would obstinately persist in their present erroneous opinions—in their sins—regarding the Messiah, until they were overwhelmed in the "coming vengeance." Then, he tells them, they should vainly look for a Messiah, and to the only place where he might be found, their fondly cherished prejudices would forever prevent them coming. Upon this they break out into a silly scoffing jeer, which amounts to this,—"Aha, he is going to commit suicide we presume, and so go to the hades for suicides, where none of us will care to accompany him, truly. Now is he in the right."—The Jews, be it observed, had adopted the heathen notion of the separate existence of spirits, and thought that suicides had a worse lot in hades than others. Of suicides Josephus says, when dissuading his countrymen, hemmed in on all sides by the enemy, from self-destruction—"a darker hades receives the soul of such." To this scoff Jesus replies with a dignified seriousness, and tells them that by continuing in their prejudices they would bring destruction on themselves, and thus be their own destroyers. Their answer betrayed their secular, sensual way of thinking.

Their scoffing spirit breaks out again in verse 25, where we find the derisive question. And pray what important person do you give yourself out to be, that so great regard should be paid to you—that it should be so great a crime to neglect you? The answer of Jesus, which occupies the remainder of this week's paragraph, is sufficiently plain without comment. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LOVE AND FEAR.

In the present day and age of the world, much is said and written concerning the influence of love and fear. Inasmuch as it has become the theme of every tongue, it may not be improper, perhaps, to state (with as much brevity as possible) the experience of one in a responsible calling, who has practically weighed them in the balance, and thereby ascertained which of the twain preponderated. In the routine of my career, as a pedagogue, I have had frequent opportunities to test the two opposites above-mentioned. When I first assumed the office of a school teacher, I used to resort, as I had previously been taught, to the rod, on any and all occasions. This was my universal panacea for all acts of disobedience. This method, I perceived after some months experience, did not produce the desired effect—it did not effect that lasting, permanent amelioration in my pupils which I earnestly desired. From necessity, therefore, I was compelled to adopt some more effectual expedient. After much deliberation and anxiety, I resolved to abandon the use of the rod, or the fear induced by it, and try the potency of love and affection. I did so, and anon a reformation speedily ensued. Since then, I have pursued the practice of substituting in place of the club, the more potent talisman of love. I have followed the employment for years, and can safely aver that the above course has seldom or never failed. Sometimes, at the first commencement of a new school, the habits of my predecessors have been such, that a resort to corporeal punishment is indispensable; but after I have been with them a short time, I so entwine myself in the affections of my scholars, that I never have occasion to beat them. By judicious management, each one soon becomes sensible of the importance of his conduct, as a part of the whole, to his advancement and progress in knowledge. I am fully persuaded, that if children were brought up under the influence of this principle, there would be no necessity of inflicting corporeal punishment. But the modes of parental government are so diversified, that I can not say it is, as yet, an invariable rule. Still, I think it might be.

Reader, can you not recollect some of your youthful teachers? Some of them you love, revere, and honor—others you hate, despise, detest. Why is this? Is it not owing to their mode of government? I trust it is. The writer can look back upon his school-day hours, and recall to mind those who taught his "young idea how to shoot," with feelings of love and gratitude for a few—others he can revile, contemn, abuse—and all in consequence of habits and prepossessions then contracted by kind and affectionate intercourse.

From the foregoing we may draw the following premises:—

1. If in the sphere in which a teacher acts, he can better secure the good-will of his pupils through the influence of love than fear, may not the same influence be exerted upon all with whom it comes in contact?

2. If a kind, affectionate treatment will induce pupils to obedience, will not men in like manner be induced to obey their heavenly Father? for children are men in miniature.

3. Why, then, do men say Universalism has an immoral tendency, when its basis is LOVE—and this alone will purify the heart? please say.

A PEDAGOGUE.

South Venice, February, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DEDICATION AND CONFERENCE AT NORTH NORWICH.

The new Universalist meeting-house in this place, was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God on the 7th inst. The day was pleasant, the sleighing was good, and the house was so thronged at an early hour that many were unable to gain admittance. It was a season of joy to all true believers present. The singing and music were excellent, and the services were listened to with much apparent satisfaction and interest.

The following was the order of the services, singing omitted.—Reading Scriptures, by Br. T. J. Smith—introductory prayer, by Br. M. B. Smith—sermon, by Br. N. Doolittle, text, John iv: 23, 24—dedicatory prayer, by Br. E. M. Woolley—benediction by Br. N. Doolittle.

The object of the discourse was to show, 1. That man is universally a religious being. 2. that after the flood and the dispersion of mankind, all rational ideas of the one living and true God became obscured, and in process of time entirely lost, to all nations except the Hebrews, who made void the law of God by their traditions, and became corrupted by their intercourse with surrounding nations. 3. Christ come to restore the spiritual worship of Jehovah, by revealing his true character and the parental relation existing between him and his offspring. 4. The service which God requires of us is calculated to promote our happiness. 5. God is a spirit, pervading the vast temple of nature—hence, he can be worshipped acceptably by the true and spiritual worshipper, at all times and in all places. 6. Man is a social being. In all ages temples have been erected for the public and social worship of God. 7. The character and views of the true and spiritual worshipper were described. 8. It was shown that God would ultimately be known and worshipped by all intelligences—and here the speaker described the glory that would follow.

Each position was ably supported, and clearly proved—and we speak the sentiments of many in whose judgment we confide, when we say, that the discourse was admirably adapted to the occasion, and was delivered in the happiest style.

Sermons well calculated to improve the mind in the theoretical and experimental principles of Christianity, were delivered by Brs. M. B. Smith, E. M. Wolley and T. J. Smith—and Brs. Hayward, Delong, Williams and Sharpe, were present and took part in the services.

About two years since, those who now compose the society in this place, embraced the Gospel in its fulness. They have ever manifested their attachment to it by their good works, and in the mean time the cause has been decidedly onward. Though they have had to encounter strong opposition, yet they have been characterized by a zeal and perseverance which every friend of truth would do well to imitate. This society now embraces by far the largest portion of the talent, wealth and moral worth of the place. Their house is built of wood, 36 feet by 44, with a gallery on three sides. It is finished in good style—is furnished with a beautiful organ, and will comfortably seat 450 persons.

This society is now adopting measures to secure the stated ministration of the word. May the great Head of the Church bless them in the upbuilding of Zion, and may peace be within their walls, and prosperity within their palaces.

Oxford, February, 1838. J. T. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

GEO. COMBE, ESQ.

To the Rev. A. B. Grosh:

Dear Sir—A few months ago I wrote to you that one of the Regents of the University of Michigan, had written to the celebrated author of "The Constitution of Man," to inquire of him, if said Regent might be authorized to use Mr. Combe's name as a candidate for the chair of Mental and Moral Philosophy, in that University. Mr. Combe's reply has just been received, and by permission of the gentleman to whom it is addressed, I am now enabled to lay it before you. You will share with me, I presume, in regretting that the youth of our country are not likely ever to be benefited by his viva voce instructions; and rejoice with me in the hope that from his able pen, we may yet expect such productions as we can cordially recommend to our own children, and to all youth, as bosom-companions, as models of manly thought, and as rich fountains of instruction and delight.

Mr. Combe's letter is as follows:—

"Edinburgh, 13th October, 1837.

"——— ——— ———, Esq.:

"Dear Sir—On my return from a tour in Germany, which occupied four months, I have found your letter of the 12th of August, waiting for me. I beg to return you my best thanks for the offer which it contains, and entertain no doubt that the situation would realize all the advantages which you describe as belonging to it. I am aware, also, of the rapid advance of society in America, and if I had been five and twenty years of age, instead of approaching towards fifty, I could have hoped to see the fruits of my labors in that country. But situated as I am, it appears to me to be a duty to dedicate my remaining years of health and strength to fields already peopled, and as both Europe and the sea-board of your country afford ample scope for my exertions, I am induced to prefer them, even although clothed with no official authority, as the scenes of my instruction. I have much to do in Britain, and do not, therefore, yet turn my eyes to America, although I have many kind invitations.

In thus respectfully and gratefully declining the honor you offer to me, I return my best wishes for the success of the University, in which you take so praise-worthy an interest, and remain,

"Dear Sir,

"Faithfully your obliged servant,

"Geo. Combe."

To this fearless and profound investigator of the laws of God's universe, and of the constitution under which we have been placed for progress and for happiness—to this noble friend to man's best interests—to this friend of youth—we wish many years of health, strength, and sound mind. May his useful and disinterested labors fill his own bosom with overflowing peace and satisfaction, while upon every good, and honest, and truth-loving heart, all the world over, they pour a flood of light and consolation. We beg to assure him, that we scattered few in the remote West, who would have rejoiced at his presence amongst us, will be equally glad to hear from his pen, as the "peopled fields" of Europe, or our sea-board; and we hope that there are among us those who will so cultivate whatever good seed is thrown among us, as to cause "the wilderness to rejoice and blossom as the rose." For what you yourself, my dear friend, have done in recommending and disseminating the labors of Mr. Combe, the cause of truth, of virtue, and of philanthropy stands your debtor. Be not weary in well-doing, dear brother. Adieu. A. N. S. S.

P. S. In connexion with Geo. Combe, will you indulge me by inserting the following tribute to the cause he is advancing, and to the land of his nativity, by a neighboring Episcopalian clergyman, Geo. Washington Cole, of Tecumseh, Michigan?

"To our system of common schools, as the attendant luminary of religion, we are, in a great measure, indebted for our present well-being as a people, and for our elevated rank among nations. * * * * "Provided a people be intelligent, and virtuous, and enterprising, it matters not so much what are her climate, soil, and other external circumstances—their influence will be felt—it will tell upon human destiny. Why is it that Scotland, a little nook of the world, made up, in a great measure, of rugged mountains and deep glens, has not only elevated her own population, but has sent abroad a redeeming influence which is now pervading all civilized nations? It is her general education—embracing, of course, religious instruction—that has done this. From her seminaries of learning, has arisen a bright constellation of men, which has ascended high in the moral firmament, and whose brightness will continue to go forth into all the dark habitations of man, till one great flood of light shall cover the whole earth, from the rising of the sun even to the going down of the same." A. N. S. S.

SOCIETY AND CHURCH CONSTITUTIONS.

In reviewing matters previous to closing the last volume, I found that the following report had not yet appeared in our columns. I trust the importance of the subject will excuse the liberty I have taken of adding a few suggestions to the Report. And as many are opposed to the separation of the church from the society, I have taken the liberty to add a Constitution by which both may be combined under the same government and discipline.

It will be seen that the following models are intended to meet the legal requisitions of this State only—our friends in other States, can easily adapt them to their laws, by making a few alterations. A. B. G.

REPORT

Of the Committee on the formation of Societies and Churches.

At the New-York State Convention in 1836, Brs. T. J. Sawyer, P. Morse, and C. F. Le Fevre, were appointed "a committee to prepare a model or models, for society, or church and society constitutions; also, rules and regulations for the government of this Convention in its deliberations, and report the same at our next session."

At the next annual meeting of the same body in 1837, "The Committee to prepare a model or models for society, or church and society constitutions; also, rules and regulations for the government of this Convention in its deliberations," appointed last session, reported that they had made no progress, and requested further time, therefore

Resolved, That said Committee perform the first part of their duty as soon as practicable, and publish the result of their labors in our periodicals, and that they make a report on the second part of their duty to the next session of the Convention."

In compliance with the above instructions from the Convention, the Committee report the following as models for societies and churches:—

FOR A SOCIETY.

There being "an act to provide for the incorporation of religious societies" passed by the Legislature of the State of New-York, (and which has recently been published in the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, published at Utica, and likewise in the Universalist Union, published in the city of New-York,) the Committee think they can not better discharge their duty with respect to the formation of societies, than by following the instruction of the statute in such case provided.—They submit the following extracts as all that strikes them necessary for this purpose:

1. Fifteen days previous to forming a society, notice shall be given at the place where worship is wont to be held, of such intention. This notice to be given for two successive Sabbaths.

2. Two individuals from the society to be formed to "be nominated by a majority of the members present, shall preside at such election, receive the votes of the electors, and certify under their hands and seals the names of those elected as trustees." There shall not be less than three nor exceeding nine trustees.

3. By such act the trustees and their successors become a body corporate and may be so recorded by the county clerk, who is entitled for the recording of the certificate of incorporation, seventy-five cents, and no more.

4. The trustees shall have and use a common seal and take charge of all temporalities belonging to such society.

5. The trustees shall continue in office three years, but those first chosen shall be divided into three lots, numbered one, two and three, so that annually there shall be a third part of the whole number chosen. A months notice shall be given when a vacancy is to be filled, and the election shall take place at least six days before the vacancy occurs.

6. No person is eligible to the office of trustee who has not been a stated attendant on the worship of said society and contributed to its support, for one year previous to his election.

Suggestions.—Though the law of New-York requires no more than obedience to the foregoing, yet I would strongly advise putting the above provisions into the form of a Constitution, for signature by the members. In that case I would add something like the following for a Preamble.—Whereas the Christian religion is eminently adapted to man as a social being, and whereas the laws of this Commonwealth permit us to unite in social compact, therefore, we, the undersigned, agree to unite ourselves into an association for the support and enjoyment of public religious worship according to the dictates of our consciences.

ARTICLE I. The style and title of this Society shall be [here insert the title].

ART. II. Any person can become a member of this society who sustains a good moral character, is a believer in Christianity, attends on or supports its meetings, and signs this Constitution—and any person attending statedly on, and supporting its meetings for one year, may then have a vote in the election of its officers, at the annual meeting of the society.

ART. III. The officers of this society shall be [here insert the names and numbers of the offices and officers] each of whom shall be a member of this society.

[Then insert the duties of officers, their election, how to fill vacancies, the times of regular meetings, and such other legal provisions as are not yet incorporated above.]

ART. —. Any member can withdraw from this society, at any time, by giving notice thereof, in writing, to the Clerk or either of the trustees—and no member shall be excluded from the society without a fair trial, after being furnished with a copy of the charges and the name or names of his or her accusers, and by a vote of [two-thirds] of the members present at a meeting called for that purpose.

ART. —. No part of this Constitution shall be altered or repealed, except by a vote of [two-thirds] of the members present at a meeting called for that purpose, and after notice given of such alteration or repeal at the previous regular meeting of the society.

FOR A CHURCH.

Believing that church connexion is conformable with Scripture and sanctioned by general usage, we do agree to associate ourselves in that capacity for the purpose of promoting mutual knowledge, virtue and piety.

CONFESSION OF FAITH.

We believe in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, as containing a divine revelation, and as our guide in faith and practice.

Our faith in relation to the character of God, the mission of Christ, and the destiny of mankind, is clearly expressed in the following Scripture language:

1. We believe "there is one God, even the Father."

2. We believe "there is one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."

3. We believe that "Christ hath abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel."

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1. This Church shall be known by the name of ——

ART. 2. The officers of this Church shall consist of a Moderator, Clerk, and two or more Deacons, who shall be annually chosen on the —— day of ——, who shall perform all such duties as are connected with these respective offices.

ART. 3. No person shall be a member of the Church unless he acknowledges a belief in the Scriptures and sustains a good moral character.

ART. 4. The ordinances of the Gospel shall be duly administered in this Church at convenient seasons, but a participation in them shall not be considered necessary to constitute church membership.

ART. 5. This Church disclaims all right to deal with immoral members except by admonition and reproof, and in case of no reformation, by a withdrawal of fellowship

ART. 6. Any member shall have the privilege of withdrawing from the Church at his or her option, by giving notice to that effect, and shall be entitled to a certificate expressive of his or her moral character.

ART. 7. This Constitution may be altered or amended at any meeting called for that purpose, by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

In order to combine church and society into one, it is necessary to add to the foregoing suggestions, the following items, in the following order.

1st, A Preamble—2d, Article 1, giving the name of the Church and Society—3d, Art. 2, giving those not members, a right to vote in the election of Society officers only.

ART. III. The officers for the government of the temporalities of the society shall be [here insert the names, etc. of offices]—and the officers for the regulation of the spiritualities of the church shall be [here insert the names of offices, etc.]—each of which officers shall be a member of the society.

[Then insert the duties, etc. of officers, as before.]

ART. —. Any member walking contrary to the Gospel of our Saviour, shall be admonished as directed in Matt. xviii: 15–19 and corresponding passages—but when private admonitions fail to restore said member, and he or she is charged by public fame or a responsible accuser, with a violation of Gospel precepts, then shall the Clerk furnish said member with a copy of the charge or charges, and the name or names of his or her accusers, and ask him or her to name a day distant not more than six weeks, for the trial. If he or she refuses to fix such day, the officers of the church shall name one. At the appointed time the trial shall proceed, unless satisfactory reasons can be given for adjournment to some other day. After a fair trial, the vote of [two-thirds] of the members present, shall be necessary to convict of wrong. But no other sentence shall be passed than a withdrawal of fellowship from the offending member.

ART. —. Any member may remove or withdraw, at any time, from the society, by notifiing the Clerk of the same in writing, and shall be entitled to a letter of dismissal stating his or her standing in the same at the time of removal or withdrawal, signed by the Moderator and Clerk.

ART. —. [The alteration of the Constitution, the same as the last.]

The foregoing, altered, or modified, or with additions according to circumstances, it is believed will fully supply all the wants of our brethren who wish to unite in social compact. This they should do, wherever it is practicable. A. B. G.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, MARCH 9, 1838.

THE SPIRIT OF RELIGION.

We commend to the attentive perusal of our readers, Br. Sanderson's article in our last paper. We sincerely hope, that all means calculated to produce among us pure and vital religion, will be adopted and put in operation. We hope that a social, zealous and devout feeling, will be cultivated in all our churches and societies. As communities, we must cherish religion—we must have it among us in its spirituality—we must "worship in the beauty of holiness"—or the places of our Zion will be desolate and barren spots. Individually, we must be earnest and strive in the cause of our Master—we must war with our sins—struggle against temptation—seek all means of advancement in religious matters, and fan the fire of devotion within our hearts—or we shall be but cold, formal and indolent in the Christian course.

We are no advocates for religious excitement, under the idea usually attached to the phrase—but we are an advocate for religious excitement, in what we consider to be the proper sense of the term. We fear that people too often, mistake enthusiasm for fanaticism, and shrink from the spirited action of the one with the same alarm that they do from the wild commotion of the other. This is a great mistake. There is a vast difference between enthusiasm and fanaticism. Enthusiasm may break forth from a combination of high intellectual and moral endowments—fanaticism is often joined with ignorance degradation and vice. The enthusiast quaffs from fountains of truth and holiness—the fanatic but increases his fevered thirst as he drinks from streams of troubled water. The first looks abroad upon the great universe, and his heart kindles with love and adoration as he gazes—the last stands amid glooms and darkness with the torch of Até in his hand. The one would rebuild every downfallen temple, and light up every desolate altar—the other would sunder the holiest ties of nature, and scatters "fire-brands, arrows and death!"—To the enthusiast, belong the grand idea, the lofty conception, the glorious principle, the ardent hope, the virtuous purpose—how different from the strange fancies, the dark, vague theories, the wild teachings of the fanatic!

Why, Paul was an enthusiast, Saul, the Pharisee, or Paul the Christian. Verily believing that he should do many things contrary to the name of Jesus, exceedingly mad against the followers of the Nazarene, he persecuted them, "even unto strange cities." Converted to the truth, he resolved henceforth to know nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified, and how, like one in a race, he nerved every energy of his soul and pressed forward "to the mark for the prize of the high calling of God, in Christ Jesus!" Here was an enthusiast as all Christ's followers should be, yet what infidel, even, will call Paul a fanatic.

Enthusiasm is necessary to the progress and success of any cause. The best champions of liberty—the noblest advocates of philanthropy—the ablest votaries of literature and of science, will be enthusiasts. If, then, the patriot is ready to shed his blood for freedom—the philanthropist, to go through dungeons, and deserts, and perils, for the rights and the welfare of man—if the poet, and the philosopher, and the orator bend all their energies to their pursuits, if shall there be no enthusiasm, no zeal in the cause of religion? the highest, purest, holiest cause that can engage us? Shall we not pray, and toil and strive for the increase of spiritual life among us?

"An undevout astronomer is mad,"

Brethren, I would speak humbly, and my experience is limited, but I fear that we are too cold, too dull, too indolent. Efforts are making to advance the cause—complaints keep coming to our ears of a "decline." How are we to gain success in the one—how shall we remedy the other? Are our preachers to stand in the breach alone and do battle?—or shall we individually and unitedly join in the labor? And, brethren, there is something more to do, than merely to further the opinions and increase the numbers of a sect. We must labor for the increase of vital religion among us. This should be our prime object. Our cause can but increase, when truth is seen in our ranks, in all its glorious effects. Let each man be an earnest, zealous Christian, and we have at once among us the remedy, and the power, that shall prevent decline and roll on the chariot of the Gospel.

Brethren, let us not be too much afraid of enthusiasm—let us fear rather, a cold and fatal lethargy. Let us use the means of concerts of praise, Bible classes, conference meetings, and all other associations calculated to increase social, practical and spiritual religion—and let each one strive with himself, to cherish in his own heart the Gospel. And on the walls of Zion, and in every breach, and against every foe, "stand, therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness; and your feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace; above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God: praying always with all prayer and supplication in the spirit."

Thus armed, thus prepared, the followers of Christ will triumph over every foe. Peace will rest in the places of their altars—holiness will surround their temples—joy and gladness will dwell in their habitations.—"Salvation!" will be shouted over every billow and echo in every breeze—the waste places of the earth will rejoice in verdure—and over the dark and desolate lands, "the Sun of Righteousness will arise with healing in its wings"! E. H. C.

REV. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL.

Some time since, in noticing the complaints of this gentleman respecting the delays in the controversy now pending between him and Br. Skinner, I noticed several circumstances in every one of which Mr. Campbell or his deputies were alone to blame for all delays that had been caused, if any one was to blame. He has pounced upon my article in great wrath, and selected one item out of the many in which he asserts I was wrong—thus tacitly admitting that all the rest are correct. He threatens (awful! who could have believed Mr. Campbell to be so unutterably cruel?) to regard me as unworthy of his notice, if I do not publish his article, and apologise for my insolence! And he adds, with the usual manifestation of his self-esteem—"Before I could esteem such a person as good company in heaven, he will have to pass through a purgatory of many thousand years." Fret not your proud soul, Br. Campbell; a change much quicker than that you propose will be quite sufficient to enable you to endure my company in heaven. If God, and Jesus, and the glorified throng can endure such a sinner as your humble servant when raised holy and glorious in the resurrection, all that you will need to endure me, will be to be robbed of a little of your arrogance, vanity of scholarship, and pride—to see that God, alone, hath made you all that you will be—and with the whole world, to stop your boasting mouth, make you feel guilty before God, and to exclaim "God be merciful to me, a sinner!"

When you publish my article, and apologise for your insolence and arrogance, I will be ready to copy yours; and to set you an example which you much need, I here give your explanation, which I did not before know, or my assertion had not been made. Can you account for your numerous mistakes as honestly?

Mr. Campbell says that Mr. Skinner's letter for July was not copied from our paper of July 28th, containing the Rules of Discussion, etc., but from our proof-sheet of said letter, which did not contain said rules—and that therefore he did not see said rules. This correction is made, not out of fear of Mr. Campbell's withering contempt for us, but out of a love for justice and truth.

A. B. G.

N. B. Copies of the papers he has named as wanting, have been forwarded to him.

REV. MR. EDDY.

A few weeks ago, I addressed a note in our columns to this gentleman, declining the publication of his reply to Br. Eaton, because he had unjustly taxed us (as we supposed) with the postage thereon. A letter from Br. Eacker, of Sheridan, says that Mr. Eddy ordered the Postmaster there to charge the postage to his (Mr. E's) account, and that he accordingly charged Mr. Eddy, and marked the letter "Paid thirty-seven and ahalf"—consequently, that Mr. Eddy is free from all blame in the matter.

Unfortunately we have lost the envelope of the two sheets; and Mr. Dauby, our Postmaster, who might remember all the particulars, is from home. But these are the facts, so far as we are concerned. The letter weighed one ounce, and was legally charged, therefore, at seventy-five cents. There was no mark on it, that any of us saw, of payment of thirty-seven and a half cents, but simply a charge of that amount, to which our Postmaster added as much again, of course; and we paid it. The Postmaster at Sheridan should have been more careful, not only to mark the letter paid, but also to charge all the postage legally due on it. Three sheets can not, legally, be sent as a merely double letter; and when weighing one ounce, one sheet or twenty are alike to be charged with quadruple postage.

However, that was not Mr. Eddy's fault, and we freely, and with far more pleasure than we charged him with injustice, fully acquit him of all blame in the matter—presuming that he will admit that we were somewhat excusable in the charge we made, as appearances were strongly against him, especially when taken in connexion with the temper and spirit of his remarks on our paper and denomination in his letter to Mr. Eaton. That letter, since he is cleared from our charge, shall appear soon in compliance with not only his request, but also with that of several friends in that section.—Probably we can find room for it next week.

A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

My absence from home, and some other causes, have prevented a weekly attention to this department—though all the particulars have appeared, I believe, in our paper under another form. This article will bring the Record up to the present date.

CONFERENCES.—A Conference was held at Binghamton, on February 7th and 8th, and thirteen discourses were delivered by Brs. Goodrich, Bartholomew, Clark, Landers, Rounseville, S. Barnes, (each two,) and C. S. Brown, (one). They were very interesting, and listened to with great attention, by crowded congregations—so that a reasonable hope is entertained that a great good has been effected thereby in that beautiful and flourishing village. Br. C. S. Brown has engaged to labor there one-half the time during the ensuing year. Our friends even encourage the hope of soon being able to erect a temple, in which to worship the Saviour of all men. God grant it may be even so.

The Conference at Burlington Flats, was as well attended as the very cold weather and drifted roads allowed us to expect. It was held on February 21st and 22d. Sermons were delivered by Brs. Sharpe, T. J. Smith, A. Williams, D. Biddlecom, Whiston, and the writer. Brs. M. B. Smith and Hayward were also present. The latter is at present laboring with the society one-fourth part of the time. The meeting was an interesting one, at least to the writer.

NEW PREACHERS.—We have learned but lately, that a young brother, named Eddy, of Erieville, Madison county, has commenced preaching the doctrine of God's impartial grace, with much ability and to good acceptance. He is said to be an amiable young man, of much promise. I think I may promise the annunciation of another next week—will our readers keep their ears open to hear it? There are a number of others, suspected of intending to begin soon—if they do, we will hear and will certainly tell of it!

REMOVALS.—Br. J. A. Gurley, of Methuen, Mass., having left for Cincinnati, Ohio, to take charge of the Sentinel and Star in the West, Br. E. N. Harris, late pastor of the Baptist Society in Malden, has received and accepted an invitation to become their Pastor.

NEW SOCIETY.—A society was lately formed in Binghamton, (Chenango Point,) to be called "the first Universalist Society in Binghamton." It numbers about fifty members, one-third of whom are females.

A Universalist meeting-house is about to be erected in the South village of Hartford, Washington county. It is to be of brick, 34 by 46 feet, with a gallery at one end. It is to be completed by the first of October next.

One, also, in Albion, Me., it is intended will be completed by August next. "A beautiful site has been selected, a plan of the house agreed upon, and all the pews but two, sold already."

Our friends in Litchfield, Frankfort, etc., have raised sufficient funds, and commenced collecting materials, to erect a neat meetinghouse, near Norwich Corners, in the former town. The cause is prospering in that region under the efficient labors of Br. M'Adam, of this city.

The Universalist society in Bangor, Me., has hired the old Methodist meeting-house for one year, and is about engaging a preacher for one-half of the time.

UNIVERSALISM

IN CHAUTAUQUE COUNTY.—Br. Eaton writes us—"Our cause was never more prosperous in this county than at present, notwithstanding the deceitful and violent means resorted to with a view to retard its progress. A society was recently formed at Salem Cross Roads, in the town of Portland, embracing about thirty members. Our brethren here are able and willing to do all for the interest of the truth, its great importance demands. Active measures are taken to erect a Universalist meeting-house next Summer in Fredonia. Subscriptions are in circulation for that purpose. May Heaven prosper their truly laudable undertakings, and enable them to realize the fruition of their desires!"

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Br. Gardner is informed that we feel very reluctant to defile our columns with the unchristian, abusive letter of Rev. Newton G. Berryman, even although it is for the purpose of accompanying it with Br. G.'s well-written, well-directed rebuke of his illiberality and cowardice. And as we have plenty of much better, more profitable articles on hand, we decline publishing Mr. Berryman's production.

Several articles needing speedy attention, will receive it soon—a desire to finish the Voice to Young Ladies as soon as possible, will delay some a little longer than we could wish; but, on the whole, it is our best course. A. B. G.

Br. Bazin—Send Expositor to E. S. Lyman, Sherburne, Chenango county, and G. Gorton, East Avon, Livingston county, N. Y. Credit each $2. and charge G. and H.

Br. Price—Credit Elijah Butler, West Burlington, George Gorton, East Avon, and Clement Leach, Lima, each $2, and E. D. Wight, West Bloomfield, $1.50, and charge G. and H. Send back numbers to Mr. Leach, also, send Union to Isaac Earl, Van Buren, Onondaga county.

Br. Tompkins, credit E. H. Castle, Carbondale, Pa., Miss Catharine Allen, Honesdale, Pa. Mrs. Rice, Prompton, Pa., and Charles L. Tennant, Clarkstown, Pa., each $2, for current volume, and charge G. and H.—Also, transfer the name of Belinda Corbet, West Winfield, to Rome N. Y.

Br. Whittemore—Send Trumpet to James A. Hubbell, Prospect, Oneida county, N. Y.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. BROWN at Mexicoville, and at Union Square in the evening—Br. J. T. GOODRICH at Binghampton—Br. C. S. BROWN in Oxford—Br. BRITTON at Philadelphia, Jefferson county—Br. D. BIDDLECOM at Durhamville, and at Shaver's school-house (Rome) in the evening—Br. SIAS at Tug Hill and at West Road.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. BROWN at the Peat school-house in Palermo—Br. BRITTON in Black River village, (Lockport,) and at Carthage in the evening.

Br. GROSH will preach in Vienna, on the fourth Sunday inst., as Br. Harvey Freeman may appoint. A society will be formed on said day.

Br. BIDDLECOM will preach on the evening of the 17th inst., at the school-house, near Br. Foster's in Verona.

Br. GOODRICH will preach on the evenings of the 15th inst, at New-Ohio—16th, at the school-house near Br. Wheeler's, 17th and 18th, as Br. Bradford of Binghamton may appoint—19th, at Page Brook.

Br. SIAS will preach on the evenings of the 16th inst., at Rodman, 19th at Felt's Mills, 20th, at Great Bend, 21st, at Lockport, 22d, at Martin St., at Adams village.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

W J S, Watertown—P M, Ellsworth, (O) for A F, R F, W B, W and F, I S, and J S—Rev M L W, Bath, for self and R G—Rev G W M, Auburn, for J F, J W, H S, M B, C M, T J W, L S, S G, S G, and J S E—P M, Marengo, for H P—G C, Sugar Grove (Pa)—P M, Waddington, for J R, and E and H M—Rev T S B, Brooklyn, (Pa) for N W, W F, O S, F P, J B, C P, B C, F B, R R, E H P, A B, S S, and P T—P M, Moravia, for T C—P M, Dewittville for A C H—P M, Champion South Roads, for Mrs R—P M, Murray, for A W—Rev J P, Brownville—for self, J M, A H, H E, P M, T T, A S and O W—P M, Smyrna, for J S Jr—P M, Denmark, for R M and N F—I B, Carlton's Store, for I B, C L, J C, and G C—R F, Lyden, (Mass)—J W C, Corinth, for self, E B, and C B S—P M, Waterville, for S C—Rea A K, Stafford, for self, O W, E W, M L, H C, S W D, N D S, and H K—W P R, Factory Point, (Vt) for H H, E E, E J, and J W—P M, Lyme, (O) for P S and H B—F D, Sangamon, (Ills) for J B B, C P, J E, C B, R Q.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DEATH.

"For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead."

Were death eternal sleep,
Who would not dread to die?
Who would not start and weep
To see the tyrant nigh?

If death did but conduct
Its victims to the tomb,
Man would be all his life
Enwrapped in depths of gloom.

If death led him to wo—
To sighs, and groans, and tears—
His portion here below
Would still excite his fears.

He could but dread to live,
And more would dread to die—
Living or dying, filled with fears,
And groans, and misery.

If death were the release
From this dark world of wo,
To souls by sin oppressed,
Who would not love to go?

If death conducts above
To joys beyond the sky,
Oh! what a glorious boon
That all on earth may die! W.

Marcy, January, 1838.

KING DAVID.

Upon the bosom of his ivory lute
The cherubim and angels laid their breasts;
And when his consecrated fingers strook
The golden wires of his ravishing harp,
He gave alarum to the host of heaven,
That winged with lightning brake the clouds, and cast
Their crystal armor at his conquering feet.

GEORGE PEELE—1599.

THE MAN OF LEISURE AND THE PALE BOY.

"You'll please not to forget to ask the place for me, Sir," said a pale, blue eyed boy, as he brushed the coat of the man of leisure, at his lodgings.

"Certainly not," said Mr. Inklin, "I shall be going that way in a day or two."

"Did you ask for the place for me, yesterday," said the pale boy, on the following day, with a quivering lip, as he performed the same office.

"No," was the answer. "I was busy, but I will today.

"God help my poor mother," murmured the boy; and gazing listlessly on the cent Mr. Inklin laid in his hand.

The boy went home. He ran to the hungry children with a loaf of bread he had earned by brushing the gentlemen's coats at the hotel. They shouted with joy, and his mother held out her emaciated hand for a portion, while a sickly smile flitted across her face.

"Mother, dear," said the boy, "Mr. Inklin thinks he can get me the place, and I shall have three meals a day—only think, mother, three meals!—and it won't take three minutes to run home and share it with you."

The morning came, and the pale boy's voice trembled with eagerness, as he asked Mr. Inklin if he had applied for the place.

"Not yet," said the man of leisure, "but there is time enough."

The cent that morning was wet with tears. Another morning arrived.

"It is very thoughtless in the boy to be so late," said Mr. Inklin. "Not a soul here to brush my coat!"

The child came at length, his face swollen with weeping.

"I am sorry to disappoint you," said the man of leisure, but the place in Mr. C———'s store, was taken up yesterday."

The boy stopped brushing, and burst afresh into tears. "I don't care now," said he, sobbing, "we may as well starve. Mother is dead."

The man of leisure was shocked, and he gave the pale boy a dollar!—Southern Rose.

As I approve of youth, that has something of the old man in him, so I am no less pleased with an old man, that has something of the youth. He that follows this rule, may be old in body, but can never be so in mind. —Cicero.

AGENTS.

NEW-YORK.

Adams, Sampson Jaquith
Addison, I. W. Rowley
Alabama, Nelson Netheway
Albany, E. Murdock, Rev. S. R. Smith
Albion, R. Caswell
Ames, A. Mudge
Amsterdam, Rev. M. B. Newell
Antwerp, Rev. A. Wood, and A. Weeks
Appling, D. J. M. Howard, P. M.
Apulia, E. A. Mills
Attica, C. Lovelace
Auburn, Rev. G. W. Montgomery
Aurelius, S. Lombard Jr. P. M.
Avon, J. Raymond
Bainbridge, A. Stockwell
Barre Centre, B. Mattison P. M.
Bath, Rev. M. L. Wisner
Belfast, S. Wilson Jr.
Belville, I. Mendall
Bennington, A. Hayden
Berkshire, W. S. Smith
Black River, F. Butterfield
Boonville, S. Hathaway
Boston, Rev. J. Lewis
Brantingham, D. H. Higby P. M.
Bridgewater, Rev. T. J. Smith
Bristol, Rev. W. Queal and A. Hathaway
Brownville, Rev. J. Britton and A. Skinner
Buffalo, Moses Baker
Burlington, Capt. E. Pratt
Byron, J. Seaver
Cambria, D. Rogers
Camillus, Charles Land
Canadice, S. M. Frisbee
Canastota, T. Barlow Esq.
Canajoharie, Reuben Peak
Canton, L. Buck, Esq.
Cardiff, B. Tillotson
Carroll, Albert M. Thornton
Carthage, Rev. J. Britton A. Budd
Cato, A. F. Ferris P. M.
Cazenovia, S. B. Ward
Cedarville, Dr. B. Philleo, P. M.
Centre White Creek, S. Boothe
Centrefield, J. Lyon
Central Square, H. Fitch
Chapinville, Harris Andrews
Champion, T. A. Granger
Champion South Roads, C. J. Johnson P. M.
Champlain, John Fish
Chateaugay, J. Manning Esq.
Cheshire, I. D. Baily
Chestertown, J. H. Smith
Chittenango, A. S. Nichols
Churchville, O. Tuttle
Cicero, William White
Clay, Hiram McHuron
Clarendon, E. Farwell Jr P. M.
Clear Creek, M. Sheldon P. M.
Cleveland, S. H. Stevens P. M.
Clinton, Rev. M. B. Smith
Clintonville, I. T. Hyde
Clockville, S. Chapman, P. M.
Coblaskill, S. B. Wakeman
Colneton, D. Palmenter
Cold Brook, J. Trask Jr.
Colliersville, W. H. Coon
Collins, David Peet
Columbia, B. Budlong P. M.
Conewanga, S. Cowley
Constantia, Josiah Wright
Concord Centre, A. Ashman P. M.
Constableville, H. Johnson
Copenhagen, E. Moody
Clayton, J. Hunt
Cooperstown, S. Doubleday Jr.
Cortlandville, J. Badgley Esq.
Cortland Town, E. P. Agate P. M.
Coventryville, Dr. E. Cornell P. M.
Cowlesville, Rev. S. A. Skeele
Coxsackie, H. Gates
Darien Centre, Rev. J. S. Flagler
Danube, C. Kosbeth Esq.
Deansville, Daniel Grover
Depauville, S. Johnson P. M.
Delphi, S. Benedict
Denmark, Rev. J. French
De Ruyter, D. N. Barbour
Dewitville, A. C. Harger
Dunkirk, D. McDonald
Dundee, S. Sprink
Earlville, C. H. Stacy P. M.
East Bloomfield H. Munson P. M.
East Hamilton, W. H. Throop
East Pharsalia, G. W. Stockwell
East Pembroke, G. W. Wright
East Pike, S. McFarland
East Richfield, D. Brown, Nelson Coleman and Hon O. Beardsley
East Sheridan, O. Eldred P. M.
Eaton, J. McConnell Esq.
Eatonville, Rev. W. H. Waggoner
Eaton's Corners, R. Frisbee
Elba, Franklin Patterson
Elbridge, A. Clark
Ellicottville, L. Vinton
Ellisburg, D. Stearns
Erieville, B. Turner
Euclid, W. Warner
Evan's Mills, E. Hungerford
Fabius, C. P. Johnson
Fall Creek, E. Finney
Farmers, S. Squires
Farmingham, C Lee P. M.
Fairport, D. M. H. Graves and J. M. Brown
Fayetteville, Ambrose Clark
Fenner, D. Cook Jr. P. M.
Fort Covington, W. Randall
Fort Plain, Edward Lindsay
Fosterville, I. Foster P. M.
Fowler, Rev. O. Wilcox
Frankfort, J. B. Dygert Esq.
Franklinville, Otis W. Phillips
Fredonia, T. Gillis
Friendship, C. H. Davis
Fulton, Rev. A. Peck
Gaines, Rev. T. D. Cook
Gallupville, E. Emery
Garoga, S. R. Dudley
Geneseo, J. F. Wyman
Geneva, Rev. O. Ackley
Genoa, A. Avery
Gilbertsville, Norman Randall
Gilboa, W. Stevens
Glen's Falls, O. Hubbard
Goff's Mills, W. Goff P. M.
Governeur, Chester Betts
Great Bend, N. A. Carter
Green, J. S. Avery
Greenfield, S. Gregory
Greenwood, L. Davis P. M.
Hague, J. McClanathan
Hamilton, John Martin
Hannibalville, M. Pierce
Harford, Erving Tainton and Rev. W. Rounseville
Harpersville, D. Barnes
Hartsville, E. Raymond
Hartwick, J. S. Perkins and J. W. Brewer
Hastings, Rev. C. B. Brown
Henderson, D. Montague
Henrietta, Rev N. Brown
Herkimer, W. B. Holmes
Herman, B. Healy P. M.
Heuvelton, W. Thurstin P. M.
Hobart, N. Stevenson
Homer, M. Berry
Hoosick Falls, J. L. Wells
Hopkinton, E. Seely and Rev. J. Simons
Hornby, T. Hendricks
Hornelsville, Rev. A. Upson
Hunter, A. R. Benjamin
Hume, S. G. Mills
Hudson J. Richmond
Jacksonville, J. Cooper, P. M.
Jamestown, W. H. Tew
Johnson's Creek, F. Butterfield P. M.
Johnstown, G. Van Nostrand
Jordan, W. K. Knowlton
Kempville, J. D. Cooper
Kingsbury, G. T. Leggett P. M.
Kings Ferry, D. Adams P. M.
Kirkland, D. Pixley
Knowlsville, J. Aldrich P. M.
Lafargeville, A. Goodman
Lakeville, Rev. O. Roberts
Lancaster, E. M. Safford
Lawrenceville, J. F. Sanders
Lebanon, Rev. W. M. Delong
Leesville, S. Eldredge
Le Roy, S. W. Carpenter
Leyden, J. Rockwell P. M. and Rev J. A. Aspinwall
Lima, W. Smith
Little Falls, T. Cole 2d, and S. Petrie
Livonia, Robert Adams
Lockport, Rev. J. Potter
Logan, J. S. Smith P. M.
Louisville, J. Marsh Jr.
Lowville, S. Murray
Lyons, J. B. Pierce, W. Sisson
McLean, H. Boynton
Macedon Centre, J. M. Mott
Madison, C. T. Curtiss
Madrid Alfred Goss
Malone, S. Field
Manchester, A. F. Chamberlain
Manlius, A. Mills
Maunsville J. W. Persons
Marengo, M. W. Jenkins
Mariville, F. Austin P. M.
Massena, J. Polly 2d
Mayville, J. Pratt
Mead's Creek, Geo. Patchin
Medina, Roswell Star
Mendon, Squire Goff
Mexico, P. Thayer
Middlefield, W. Shipman
Middlefield Centre, Dr. A. Todd
Middleville, Ira Farmer
Milan, D. Badgley Jr.
Mohawk, P. H. Warrin
Moravia, Eleazer Woodward
Moriah, G. T. Barker
Moreland, L. Sanford
Morristown, Charles Carter
Mottville, Adam Thumb
Mount Hope, B. Dodge
Naples, B. K. Lyon P. M.
Nashville, A. Sprague
Nelson, J. Donaldson P. M.

To be continued.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, March 1st, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. HORACE PARKHURST to Miss NANCY D. HILL, both of Bridgewater.

In Elbridge, February 12th, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Mr. CHARLES H. SHEPARD, of Skaneateles, to Miss ALVIRA D. WATERS, of Elbridge,

In Auburn, February 22d, by the same, Mr. ELISHA W. GOOLD, of Aurelius, to Miss ANN ELIZA CARMAN, of Fleming.

At Edmeston, on the 22d inst., by Rev. M. B. Smith, Mr. RANSOM LINDS, to Miss ELIZA WILBER.

DEATHS.

At his residence, in Colesville, on the 3d inst., Capt. NATHANIEL BLAKESLEE, aged 69 years. He was a useful citizen, a worthy man, a practical Universalist. This sentiment cheered him in health, supported him in sickness, and comforted him in the hour of death. A discourse was delivered by the writer at his funeral, in the Methodist chapel, Coventry, to a large and attentive audience, from 1 Cor. xv: 53. May the Lord bless the truly afflicted widow of the deceased, and sanctify this dispensation of his Providence to the good of all that mourn. J. T. GOODRICH.

In Green Bay, W. T., January 31st, after an illness of six days, GROTIUS D. KNAPP, of the firm of O. P. and G. D. Knapp, in the 25th year of his age. Mr. Knapp was formerly of Westmoreland, Oneida county, N. Y. He was an industrious and enterprising mechanic. In his death society is bereaved of one of its brightest ornaments. A young man of intellectual and moral worth, he lived highly esteemed, and died regretted by all.

T. A. B.

On the 23d of January, in Murray, Orleans county, SARAH C., infant daughter of Luther and Electa Louisa Whitcomb, aged seven months. The funeral was attended on the 25th, and a discourse delivered by the writer. May God bless and comfort the mourners.

T. D. COOK.

On the 6th inst., in Barre, Orleans county, of consumption, Mrs ELIZA LEE, consort of Br. Charles Lee, in the 38th year of her age. In the death of this amiable woman, society has lost a worthy and exemplary member, three children have been deprived of a kind and doting mother, and a husband has been deprived of an affectionate companion. Supported by faith in the everlasting Gospel of peace—faith, which portrays to the mental vision the glories of that world, where "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest"—she met death with a smile and quietly fell asleep in the arms of Jesus. May that faith which she so highly adorned in life, and which cheered her in death, give peace to the minds of her bereaved companion and all the surviving relatives. May they find peace in believing, and joy in the blessed anticipation of meeting her in "the spirit-land," where partings are no more.

The funeral was attended on the 8th inst. The consolations of the Gospel of the grace of God, were tendered to a large circle of mourners, together with many sympathising neighbors, by T. D. Cook.

At Trenton, on the 21st inst., after a long and painful illness, which he bore with great fortitude and resignation, Mr. WILLIAM STEWART, formerly of this city, in the 47th year of his age.

To the relatives and numerous friends and acquaintances of the deceased, this will prove an afflicting dispensation of Divine Providence. The deceased was endeared to his friends for his many excellences of character—he was an honest man, unpretending in his manners, kind and affectionate in his disposition. His death will long be lamented by those who knew him, and his memory cherished for the many excellences of his head and heart—Utica Observer.

In Milford, Otsego county, February 23d, Captain JUDAH WATERS, aged 81 years, formerly of Worcester, Mass., but for thirty-five years a resident of the former place. He was a soldier of the Revolution, and participated in the battles of Bunker Hill and White Plains. He was an early member of the Universalist society in Oxford, Mass., and lived and died in that faith. His funeral was attended on the 25th—sermon by Br. O. Whiston.

In Auburn, January 27th, of old age, Mr. WINDSOR STONE, aged 85 years, formerly of Massachusetts. He was in the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill, and thus aided in gaining the independence of our country. Thus go our revolutionary sires, one by one, like stars fading away in the heavens. May the freedom of the Gospel remain with and bless their descendants. G. W. M.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH.

Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MARCH 16, 1838. NUMBER. 11

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 18.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

BETHANY, Va., February 8th, 1838.

MR. SKINNER:

Sir—This morning yours of the 27th ult. was received; and I am thankful for the promptness with which you have this time replied. I see that you are susceptible of conviction and correction on some points at least. There is also a small improvement in your style and temper; and I flatter myself that, as there is yet considerable room for amendment, you will continue to improve.

2. Like the house of Saul, your cause waxes weaker and weaker: for certainly this is the tamest epistle you have yet written. I might ask your greatest admirers what point you have even attempted to prove in the first 15 paragraphs.—You did not even lay my note on Matt. v: 22, before your readers, and show that you quoted it in its connexion. You assert, I grant, with great strength; but then we now understand your most violent assertions to occur either in the absence of the appearance of argument, or in the ratio of its weakness.

3. Your explanation of your former objections to antithesis, and your late acquiescence in the doctrine, is a proof of what may be achieved by taking a favorite sectarian text or two, and showing how the doctrine in question affects them. I was not disappointed in the means which I employed to constrain the concession.

4. But now that you admit my doctrine of antithesis, you attempt a new project. You seek to make the everlasting life to which the everlasting punishment is opposed in the antithesis, a temporal life. And thus you make the Saviour, in effect, say—"These shall go away into temporal life, and these shall go away into temporal punishment." This is too gross, I should think, for the major part of even your brother Universalists. I am willing, however, to let the public judge how much the truth has gained by my bringing you over to the doctrine of antithesis, through the bribe of your three Universalian texts, by which I commended it to your favorable regard. In due time these texts will be shown to have no friendly aspect to the doctrine you espouse. "To enter into life," and "to be cast into hell," in antithesis, you now, in substance, gloss as follows—"to enter into life" is to believe and be justified—"to be cast into hell" is to disbelieve and be condemned to the siege of Jerusalem!!

5. The word kolasis, punishment, you think precludes the idea of endless, because of a certain acceptation of it. This is about as sagacious as the allegation that the word liquid can not apply to fire, because it is sometimes applied to air and water!

6. The assumption that all punishments are for the reformation of the subjects of them, is unsupported and unsupportable. If they were so designed, certainly they have most generally failed; else the records of human kind in the Bible, and out of it, are not to be relied on. The sequel may show this.

7. Your 9th paragraph asserts a very great mistake. I have not said that oon is the only root of aioon. I have said that oon is the root of eternity. Read my letter X. and my last again. Nay, in my last I say aioon "in both its parts, aei and oon, always and being, signifies endless duration!" Why do you not fairly quote my words?

8. The conclusion of your 14th paragraph, after such a flourish in the beginning of it, is really amusing. You say I give no proof that aioonios means endless when applied to punishment. If I had, of course you would have abandoned Universalism! But it would be impossible to prove that to you; for although it sometimes signifies endless when applied to God, to heaven, to future bliss—it never can signify endless when applied to punishment, for, with you, all punishments end in reformation; and if they do not, they are unjust, cruel, useless, etc.—and therefore we have done with all such arguments, yourself being judge. In this remark you only corroborate the grand concession already made, and you need not now attempt to deny it or explain it away. Permit me, however, to parody your parody, and to show how much wind is in it.

9. You admit that hills are everlasting—that Israel's possession of Canaan was everlasting—that the covenant of circumcision was everlasting—that Aaron's priesthood was everlasting—that the land of Idumea was to lie waste to everlasting—that deeds of land are everlasting—and that heaven and happiness are to be everlasting; yet you maintain that the first six everlastings are limited, and the latter unlimited and endless, though all are expressed in Hebrew, Greek, and English in the same words! Why this inconsistency? Say, Mr. Skinner, why?

10. I find that my predictions are already beginning to be fulfilled. You are for again getting into the mountains of philology. But, Sir, since you have said that I could offer 59 to 1 in favor of my philology against yours, (for that is certainly your meaning,) you would hold on to your theory because of your ten weighty arguments drawn from your theology, I shall not labor this ground over and over again. Your philology on your third proposition must indeed be examined, and then I will proceed to your philosophy and theology, for I see these are strewed profusely through your letter before me, which is a singular compound of these heterogeneous substances. In the following strictures on your third proposition you will see how kindly I dispose of the chicanery of your 17th paragraph.

11. This new proposition is a logical rarity; for why in the name of reason, open a discussion of six or sixty words, that yourself affirms are never applied to punishment; and I affirm are never applied to happiness; and one of them excepted, the others never but by implication import duration. No Greek writers, sacred or profane, ever used any of these words (aeidios excepted) to denote duration, simple duration at all. But we shall allege a few facts concerning them.

12. Of these words akatalutos is first on the list. It is rendered in Greek Lexicons generally indissoluble, as it etymology imports. Wm. Tyndale translated it once endless, and was followed by other translators. It was never applied to God, heaven, hell—to happiness or misery—or to any state. It is found but once in the New Testament. It can only be literally applied to something compound, as life; but yet it is not found applied to the life of Christians on earth or heaven by any inspired writer. What a splendid display of critical ingenuity in producing this as a word which might have been used by the Holy Spirit, if he had intended to give us a definite and unpervertible view of future punishment—a word which in its literal import can not possibly apply to happiness or misery!!

13. Aptharsia stands second on the list of words which necessarily and immutably signifies endless or everlasting. This word is found once in Rom. ii: 7; four times in 1 Cor. xv: 42–54; once in Eph. vi: 24; and 2 Tim. i: 10, and ii: 7; in all eight times—never translated endless or everlasting by any writer sacred or profane. Incorruptibility is its proper meaning, whether in doctrine, sentiment, (Eph. vi: 24.) or in body.—It is never by any writer applied to God or angels, to happiness or misery, to reward or punishment, and is distinguished from eternal life by Paul Rom. ii: 7!!

14. Aphthartos stands next. It is found Rom. i: 23; 1 Cor. ix: 25; xv: 52; 1 Tim. i: 17; 1 Pet. i: 4, 23; iii: 4, rendered by the translators of the Bible once immortal, and six times incorruptible—never applied to a state, to happiness or misery. It is applied to God, but contradistinguished from eternal: "Now to the King eternal, immortal," aioonios, aphthartos.

15. Athanasia is the last of the first class of words that necessarily and immutably mean endless! It is found three times in the New Testament: 1 Cor. xv: 53, 54; 1 Timothy vi: 16, rendered immortality. This word is never applied, to God, angels, happiness, misery, heaven, or hell. It is never rendered endless, everlasting, etc.

16. To these you have added two other terms in your last letter—aperantos, which occurs once, 1 Tim. i: 4; literally unlimited, endless in space, not in time. It is never applied to God, angels, spirits, heaven, hell, happiness, misery, etc.

17. But to finish your rare collection of literary curiosities, you also introduce aeidios translated both eternal and everlasting, for it occurs but twice. I give you great credit for this last. You are right for once in saying that this word does signify absolutely eternal or endless duration. It is applied to God, Rom. i: 20, and certainly he is absolutely eternal, without beginning and without ending. It is also applied Jude, 6th verse, to the chains in which the fallen angels are held bound, and certainly these are absolutely endless; and therefore I return you my sincere thanks—first, for conceding that the punishment of fallen angels is absolutely endless; and as wicked men are to share with the devil and his angels in their future punishment, I can not but thank you a second time for giving up the whole controversy, and admitting that the punishment of wicked men is thus set forth by a word which absolutely and immutably signifies endless. But I must thank you still more emphatically a third time for a greater concession: for you have now settled the controversy and given up the whole matter of aioon, as denoting absolutely and immutably endless duration; for observe all the learned world, without a single exception, declare that whatever of duration is in the word aeidios, it derives it all from aei, always, from which all say it is formed. Mr. Skinner's root of aeioon, which heretofore in his hands signified only limited duration; with more intelligence, you now say, denotes perpetual endless duration. So endeth your proof of this third proposition.

18. This is really a greater triumph of the truth than I promised myself in this discussion. I have only one thing to hope, that you, Sir, will not appear to your readers to have fallen into a pit by accident; or to have in an oversight suffered the truth to gain a momentary triumph. Confirm, Sir, your candor now by holding up aeidios to be a word fairly and immutably expressive of duration without end: for it is applied to God and to the chains that confine the fallen angels under darkness to the judgment of the great day, which is called by Paul (Heb. vi;) "eternal judgment."

19. Having now, as I honestly and humbly conceive, fully and conclusively disposed of all your philology on the first, second, and third propositions, I can fearlessly leave them to the candid and impartial consideration of our readers, and will forthwith proceed to your philosophy. I have always been assured of the fact that your philosophy, or rather your a priori hypothesis on the nature and design of punishment, together with your conceptions of what is fitting and worthy of the character which you have adopted for the Supreme Being, and not philology, or the sayings of the Bible, are the real causes of your Universalism. Your critiques upon the words in dispute were got up rather for obviating the difficulties in the way of your theory, than for establishing it. Your cavils against the Mexicans arose from your passion for Texas: for had you not coveted the latter, you would never have thought of a quarel with the former—of course, then, I design a thorough exposition of your a priori theory of what ought to be done with the wicked.

20. I own that you have the popular side of the question. One can hardly contend for endless punishment, how devoted soever to the truth and will of God, without appearing malevolent: nor can one scarcely contend against it, without the appearance of superior benevolence. Of this I need not, however, inform you. The copious and frequent denunciations of "the horrid doctrine," "the soul-chilling, the diabolical doctrine of endless misery," etc., etc., which appear in your epistles, are indubitable evidence that you understand the multitude and the proper game to play in prepossessing it in your favor.

21. You delight in expatiating upon the benevolence, and mercy, and philanthropy of God, and in showing how irreconcileable with these conceptions of yours are the withering and cruel doctrines of interminable wo. But, Sir, I go for the truth first, and for the epithets of that truth afterwards. Experience and much reflection have taught me how often we are deceived in what is most expedient and fitting the divine character; and how dangerous it is to affix epithets to persons and things whose pretensions we ought to examine. I never could rationally hope to obtain from you a candid hearing after I saw you call my views "horrible" doctrines. This state of mind is wholly incompatible with the discovery of truth.—You resemble the Captain that first commanded Paul to be whipped and afterwards asked what he had done. You denounce the doctrine and then ask for its evidence. With such a preparation of heart it is impossible that you could discover the truth. I shall not imitate you, but calmly and dispassionately examine, one by one, your ten theological arguments. And let me assure you that I should greatly rejoice if you could persuade me to think with you on this matter; for really if I could regard the ultimate holiness and happiness of all mankind as a part of the divine scheme, and every way practicable and consonant with God's glory and the supreme bliss of the pure and virtuous portions of the universe, I would espouse it and promulge it with the fulness of joy to the utmost extent of my means.

22. You assert first that endless punishment would be useless. It can be of no supposable advantage to any being in the universe, etc. I have often said that one good philosophical argument is enough on any subject, for one good argument never can be overthrown. Now, Sir, if I thought you knew the whole universe, that you had travelled over infinite space, and lived through eternity, and knew what was good for every creature in every part of it, then indeed your assertion (for argument it is not) would be entitled to very grave consideration. But in the absence of this knowledge and experience, your dogma is of no more authority than that of the child who says burning mountains on earth, and volcanoes in the ocean, icy mountains in the polar regions, and burning deserts between the tropics, blazing stars in the heavens, meteoric stones above the clouds—lions, tigers, and hyenas among the beasts—hawks and vultures among the birds—serpents among reptiles—and vegetable and mineral poisons among plants and metals, are all useless things, and afford "neither honor, pleasure nor profit to God, angels, or men." There is as much modesty, as much good sense, logic, philosophy, and religion in Will Five-Year-Old's objection as in yours.—Every thing is useless to him that does not know the use of it: And seeing there is a multitude of things called evils against which we are fighting, the utility of which we know not, is it, I ask, either modest or veracious to say that future and eternal evils are useless, because we can not explain them? Again, our inability to see or point out the use of any thing, never can be alleged philosophically either against the thing itself or its utility: for the wisest man in the world would have to say that more than half of all the ten thousand physical evils in the universe are useless, because he can not point out the use of the smallest half of them.

23. But, Sir, I have one argument on this subject, and, if it be a good one, it is enough. We commonly say that all that can be known of the future is learned from the present and the past.—Hence a wise man said, "The past and the present for the future." Well now what deposeth past history of human and angelic existence, and what says the present? We must answer that the history of angels and men has been the history of sin and of punishment—not, indeed, that all intelligences have sinned; but some of all have sinned and been punished. Now this punishment is useful else folly is directly charged upon the moral Governor of the universe. Now as punishment has been, and still is useful, it is most philosophical to conclude that it may be always useful. For should a period arrive when punishment shall not be useful, that time will be contrary to all human history and human experience.

24. And let me add that the utility of punishment is not to be estimated by the reformation of the subject of it, for this but seldom happens.—The punishment of sinners is, according to the Holy Spirit, "set forth for an example," to secure others from rebellion or apostacy. And, herein, perhaps, its capital utility will be found to consist. At all events we have the data of God's past and present government in proof of the utility of punishment. And in the absence of Scripture testimony and universal experience—nay, contrary to both, to affirm that a period may arrive when punishment will be of no use to any being in the universe, to say the least, exhibits a degree of boldness and reckless daring more to be reprobated than approved, more to be eschewed than admired. But the utility of future and eternal punishment may perhaps still appear more clear as we proceed to examine the other nine assertions by which you have so gallantly repudiated all the the canons of criticism and the statutes of philology.

25. I had here just finished my letter, but my compositor informs me there is yet more room.—I will then confirm the joy you acknowledge you received from ascertaining that I am not a destructionist. I will give you one reason for this, and with me one good reason is enough: I opine that one good argument would sink a fleet of a hundred sail freighted with hypothesis. Well, now for this one argument: I only premise that spirits are immortal. Jesus is my authority. He says angels can not die; and angels are spirits.—If you ask me for the positive proof that angels can not die, I refer you to Luke xx: 36; "Neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels"—immortals. Now I am prepared to state my argument: The Supreme Judge will say to wicked men, "Depart, you cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." Now as wicked men are to be cast into the same fire with the devil and his angels, they are of course to partake of the same punishment; and as this everlasting fire can not annihilate or utterly destroy the devil and his angels, so neither can it destroy those who are doomed to share his punishment. They are equal unto angels; therefore, neither can they die any more.

26. Because I make no greater display, I would caution you not to presume that I have not many other arguments in waiting: but I do not think that the occasion calls for more than one. And has it not occurred to you that this is rather a four-sided argument, and that one of its sides looks very hard against your speculation. For if the devil and his angels were only doomed to the valley of Hinnom or the siege of Jerusalem, their everlasting fire is quenched, and they are all either dead or again walking up and down the earth. But I know the power of your crucible: it can impersonate (give me leave to invent for you a new word) the devil, convert him into a metaphor and his angels into shadows, and thus free yourself from any difficulties in the case.

27. But yet there is another side of my argument that you can not so easily dispose of. If this impersonal devil and his angels could have been annihilated, would it not, on the principle of your "ten weighty arguments," have been wiser for Omnipotence to have killed him at the beginning of the campaign, and not to have suffered him to trouble our world and fill it with sin and misery, and thus at the end of the drama, to put him to the pain of eternal annihilation?

28. I shall, all things concurring, fully canvass your "ten weighty arguments" philosophic in my next. Controversially yours,

A. CAMPBELL.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 19.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Richmond, Va., February 26, 1838.

MY DEAR SIR—I am happy to perceive by yours of the 8th inst., which has just arrived, (being, by the by, a long time in reaching here from its date,) that you are getting in much better humor. You seem, indeed, quite joyful and happy, and one would suppose every thing was going on entirely to your mind—indeed, it would be inferred from some parts of your letter, that you had not only proved both your propositions and disproved mine, but that I had fully conceded the fact, and gone over to your side of the issue. Well, any way to get good natured. I am content.

2. If you can see no point that I attempted to establish in the first fifteen paragraphs of my last letter, I am perfectly willing to leave the matter to the decision of our readers, requesting them to read again and see. If there was no point in them, it must have been for want of point in yours of which they were the refutation. You say I did not lay your note on Matt. v: 22, before our readers. Why should I? I had previously made a liberal extract from it, and, I contend, gave the gist of the whole. You say I did not, and that the whole would wear a very different aspect. Why, then, do you not lay it before our readers, instead of asking me again to occupy my portion of space with what you say is to benefit you? What a truly liberal policy!

3. You charge me with making the Saviour say, "These shall go away into temporal life, and these shall go away into temporal punishment," and then say this is too gross for even my brother Universalists! Did I, Sir, ever give the word temporal as either of the definitions of aionios? No, you knew I had not. Why then misrepresent me? Why not take at least one of the definitions I had given? This you were bound to do in representing my views. But this would not make me appear "gross" enough to answer your purpose. My views of the other antithetical text, must also undergo a similar distortion, in order to discredit them with your readers.

4. I contend that the definition I gave of kolasin, Matt. xxv: 46, instead of being merely "a certain acceptation" of casual occurrence, is its common acceptation, and your attempt to evade its force in this sense, is about as rational as it would be to deny that water is liquid, because it may sometimes be congealed by frost. I have never said that "all punishments are for the reformation of the subjects of them." So far from this being a fact, the apostle assures us, that earthly fathers sometimes correct or punish for their pleasure; but at the same time he assures us that God does it "for our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness." Because earthly fathers and human instruments sometimes fail in producing beneficial results, it does not follow that God will fail in producing these desired results. See Isa. xlii: 4; lvii: 16–18; Lam. iii: 31–33; Hos. v: 14, 15.

5. I certainly did not intend to misrepresent you in the 9th paragraph of my last. I really supposed you meant to maintain that oon was the principal or only root of aion, and that aei was only an adjunct. And I am willing the reader, after again looking at your 13th paragraph, should say whether your language did not warrant such a supposition.

6. Your 9th paragraph, or parody on my parody, is really a philological curiosity. You ask why I allow hills, possession, covenant, priesthood, desolation, and deeds, to be of limited duration, and maintain that heaven and happiness will be of endless duration, though the duration of all is expressed by the same word (everlasting) in Hebrew, Greek, and English? Answer—1. The duration of all is not expressed by the same word in either of those languages. I know of no text where aionios or everlasting is applied either to heaven or happiness. 2. If they were thus applied, it would not be the only or main reliance to prove the endless perpetuity of heaven and happiness. Other and less ambiguous terms are applied to, and all allow, while none dispute, the latter. 3. In this discussion you have attempted to prove endless punishment merely by the force of aionios, the very word in dispute, which you and all acknowledge is often used in a limited sense, as in the first six subjects of your parody; and you have no other or stronger term than this to apply, and can give no other reason under heaven in favor of endless misery! Why this inconsistency? say, Mr. Campbell, why?

7. Your next great effort is on the third proposition. And here I wish I could give you credit for as much candor and fairness as I can for ingenuity and evasive tact. You refer to all the passages in the New Testament where the six words I adduced in favor of the affirmative of this proposition, occur; but you quote none of them. You make several remarks relative to them, which I think directly calculated to mislead and deceive the reader. And it requires a great stretch of charity to believe you did not intend to mislead them. You say neither of these six words is ever used, (aidios excepted,) "to denote duration, simple duration at all." Well, whether used to express simple duration or not, you yourself acknowledge that five of them embrace the "idea of duration." You say, (letter 10, paragraph 18,) of the first four words, there is in all of them an idea of duration; and to apply them" [as epithets, I suppose you mean] "to duration, would be to define a thing by itself, as a rosy rose, a lily-looking lily." Now, whether these words are used to express simple duration, or duration in connexion with something else, it matters not. They are applicable to, or express duration—that is sufficient for my purpose. And you, Sir, have never attempted to prove, nor do I think you will, that the duration, of which these words express the idea, is ever a limited duration. Endless duration, then, is expressed by five of these words, yourself being judge.

8. You say of akatalutos, "William Tyndale translated it once endless, and was followed by other translators." Yes, and among others by my learned friend, Mr. Campbell, without a syllable of misgiving from his pen on the subject. But you say "it can only be literally applied to something compound." Do you mean to say that life is a compound? What are its component parts? Suppose, Sir, akatalutos had been applied to the misery of the wicked in the New Testament, would you not have argued from it in this discussion, that misery must be endless because it was akatalutos, with as little scruple as you have translated it endless in Heb. vii: 16? Does not the phrase zoe akatalutos imply nearly if not quite the same as the word athanasia?

9. You attempt a double game of evasion with aphtharsia and athanasia. You say neither of them is translated endless or everlasting. Wonderful indeed! why not? Because the former are substantives and the latter adjectives; but you dare not deny that the sense of the latter is included in the sense of the former. Again: you say neither of them is applied to God or angels, heaven or happiness. I am surprised at your recklessness. Had you forgotten, dear Sir, that the apostle has said of God, 1 Tim. vi: 16, "who only hath immortality," [i. e. original and underived,] athanasia? Thus it is applied to God, not indeed as an epithet or adjective, for the plain reason that it is a substantive, but as an attribute essentially and exclusively his own. And though these words, for the same reason, are not applied as epithets to heaven or happiness, yet the connexions in which they are found, clearly show that they embrace often, if not always, in themselves, the idea of happiness. The glory, honor, power, incorruption, immortality, imperishableness, indissolubility, indestructibility, etc., ascribed in the Scriptures to the subjects of the resurrection, certainly express in full, both endless perpetuity and perfection of happiness. At all events, I do not desire greater or more durable bliss.

10. Is not the inheritance, 1 Peter i: 4, a state of happiness? If so, why say aphthartos is not applied either to state or to happiness? How did you ascertain that aperantos, defined endless, infinite, boundless, has this meaning only in reference to space and not to time? The words by which lexicographers define it apply as well to one as the other. And I doubt not, had the sacred writers applied aperantos to punishment, you would have zealously argued its endless duration from the very appropriateness of the word used.

11. But of all the splendid triumphs you have gained since the commencement of this discussion, and all the fatal concessions I have made, none seems to have filled you with such perfect ecstacy, as that noticed in your 17th and 18th paragraphs, for which you so repeatedly and heartily thank me. Your joy seems so complete that I almost regret the necessity that compels me to break the spell with which you are bound, and show you the pit into which you have fallen through the very intoxication which your imaginary triumph produced. But what is the ground or occasion of your great triumph? Why, this, that I have introduced aidios (which you misspell, in order to make it appear to be derived from your favorite aei) as a word signifying absolutely endless. Here you agree with me, and say I am "right for once in saying that this word does signify absolutely eternal or endless duration." Very well; then our third proposition is settled. I have proved the affirmative, and you joyfully concede the fact, that there is at least one word besides your favorite aionios, in the Greek, that does absolutely signify endless, that this word is sufficient to certify us of the endless duration of God or any other subject to which it is applied.

12. This question being settled, there is no need of farther discussing the six words above, so far as the third proposition is concerned. I am as anxious as you are, that there may be no backing out from the ground whereon we now stand. I also hope you may not appear to your readers to have been taken by surprise. For I certainly made use of no bribery, as you profess to have done. I had no idea that however artful a lure I might hold out, you could be induced to concede the whole as you have done. But so it is; you have actually swallowed the naked hook.

13. But, alas for me! in establishing the third proposition, I have yielded up all that I had before contended for on the second, where I had hitherto so successfully maintained my ground, and have enabled you to establish your doctrine of endless punishment by this same aidios! Well, let us see then. In the first place, you make a small mistake in saying that aidios is by all the learned world allowed to be derived from aei. There are some respectable critics who suppose it to be derived from ades, (hades,) which is derived from a, negative, and idein, to see; and hence among other definitions they give hidden, invisible, unseen, unknown. So there is a disagreement as to the derivation of aidios. But we will not have a long controversy about the origin of the word: whatever its derivation may be, or whether it be radical, we both agree that its scriptural meaning is endless.

14. Well, does this word prove punishment to be endless, as you seem to think? No, for it is not applied to punishment at all. Nor is it applied even to the state of punishment. What then? Why, to the chains, only, with which the wicked messengers were bound under darkness unto (not after nor during) the judgment of the great day. Jude 6. What were these chains? I presume you do not consider them as chains of iron, nor literally as chains of any other material substance. What then? Is it not reasonable to conclude these chains were the purposes of God, which are changeless and endless, in which the wicked are firmly held, during his pleasure, in any condition that he chooses, until he sees fit to change their state and condition? Thus Paul speaks, Eph. iii: 10, 11, of God's having made known by the church his "manifold wisdom, according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus." Now, though his purpose was absolutely eternal and changeless, yet its manifestation took place only at a particular period. See 2 Tim. i: 9, 10. And thus, though the purpose of God was eternal or endless in which the wicked were securely held, they were not to be confined under darkness necessarily any longer than unto the judgment of the great day, whatever day that might be.

15. "Having now, as I honestly and humbly conceive, fully and conclusively disposed of all your philology on the first, second and third propositions, I can fearlessly leave them to the candid and impartial consideration of our readers," and proceed to consider what you have said in attempting to refute my arguments against endless punishment. You are mistaken in supposing that I first adopted my views from self-interest, prejudice, or prepossession, and then resolved to admit no evidence or argument that went against a favorite theory. I was brought up under the constant preaching of endless punishment. I never heard a sermon in opposition to it till I had nearly reached the age of manhood, and then but very seldom for many years. I, however, early resolved to "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good."

16. The Bible was my principal guide. After a thorough and careful investigation of its teachings, I became fully satisfied that it did not teach the doctrine of endless punishment, and on the other hand that it did clearly teach the final salvation of all mankind. On comparing these views with the voice of nature and reason, I was happily confirmed by finding a complete and perfect harmony between nature and revelation. And from that day to this, I have been compelled to regard endless misery as an odious and horrid doctrine—as a stigma on the Divine character, and useless and pernicious among men, though I highly respect and esteem many of its sincere believers and advocates.

17. You confess that "one can hardly contend for endless punishment without appearing malevolent; nor can one scarcely contend against it without the appearance of superior benevolence." True, Sir, very true, you never uttered a more obvious truth. And why is it so? Because God has enstamped his impress upon the soul, and imparted to the conscience and common sense of all men the impression that punishment, endless in duration, vindictive in character, and productive of no good to the sufferer, must be malignant. You assure me that you should greatly rejoice if I could persuade you to think with me on this subject. Yes, my dear Sir, I know you would.—And if you "could regard the ultimate holiness and happiness of all mankind as a part of the divine scheme, every way practicable and consonant with God's glory, etc., you would espouse and promulge it with the fulness of joy to the utmost extent of your means." This declaration is worthy of yourself and the philanthropy you claim. Give place, my dear Sir, to such impressions on your heart, and may God increase and strengthen them. For although I can not hope that my feeble talents are adequate to the task of convincing you, especially while we stand in the attitude of opponents, yet God is able to convince you, and I believe he will do it in his own good time. And hence my prayer for that event is offered up in unwavering faith.

18. In your 22, 23, and 24th paragraphs you attempt to refute my argument against endless punishment based on its uselessness. You think, to give force to this argument I must know the whole universe and live through eternity. Nay, that the argument against the existence of volcanoes, icy mountains, burning deserts, lions, tigers, hawks, serpents, vegetable and mineral poisons, etc., which you put into the mouth of Will Five-Year-Old, is just as weighty as my argument.—I think very differently. For all the evils mentioned by your favorite protege are of a limited and temporary character. Furthermore, we are able to conceive how good may result from those temporary evils—nay, we have often witnessed good resulting from many of them. So far as we do comprehend the object and design of these things, they are all seen to result in something good. If there be any whose object we do not fully understand, it is at least reasonable to suppose that it is in harmony with what we do understand, and therefore good on the whole. But why are these evils often seen to result in good? Answer, for the very reason that they are temporary and limited. But endless punishment is a final evil, a limitless, boundless evil, beyond which no good can result, for it will never end.

19. But again, you urge, we can only judge of the future by the past and present: and as the past and present exhibit sin and punishment, they will continue to exist hereafter and forever. If this argument be good, it will prove that, as man inherits a body of flesh and blood here, he will inherit one hereafter and forever. As he experiences natural birth, marries, procreates his species and dies in this world, so must he do the same in the next and forever. If the ceremonial law of Moses was ever of any use, it must continue in force to all eternity. If it is necessary for a father to chastise his son at all, it is necessary he should continue to do it as long as he lives.

20. But punishment is often "set forth for an example, to secure others from rebellion and apostacy." Yes, truly, such is often the case in this world; but, my dear Sir, if such examples should be necessary hereafter, or in other words, if the saints in glory can not be restrained from rebellion and apostacy without the spectacle of endless damnation before their eyes, it is certain they can not be very holy, nor much in love with God and heaven, nor very happy, unless they have the disposition of fiends. And I, for one, could never covet either their society or their condition.

21. I admit the force of your argument, paragraph 25, in favor of the immortality of human and angelic spirits. I am a firm believer in the immortality of man, not as original, but derived and dependent. (See 1 Tim. i: 16; John xiv: 19; Acts xvii: 28; 2 Cor. xiii: 4.) And with some of your writings which I have seen on the subject, I am well pleased. But you seem to have forgotten that the word angels does not necessarily designate either the nature or character, but frequently only the office of those beings to whom it is applied, and simply signifies messengers, being often applied to men in the flesh as well as to celestial spirits. Your lugging in Matt. xxv: 41, is therefore wholly useless to your cause, unless you can prove four things, 1. That the devil and his angels there mentioned are disembodied spirits; 2. that the fire is of endless duration; 3. that they are to remain and be endlessly tormented in it; and 4. that human spirits are to be tormented with them to all eternity. But neither of these being proved or proveable, your "four-sided argument" is seen to be a sword with four sides, but no edge—it looks four ways, but cuts neither.

22. You ascribe to my "crucible" some powers that it does not possess; nevertheless, I doubt your ability to break it. But you wish to know why it would not have been wiser in Omnipotence to have killed the devil in the beginning, and not suffered him to trouble our world, etc. I will answer by asking two other questions equally as wise. Why did not God create us all adults, without subjecting us to the weaknesses, wants and sufferings of infancy and childhood? Why did he not place us all in heaven and glory at once, without subjecting us to the imperfections and sufferings of mortal life at all? Now, Sir, I have the happiness to believe all these temporary evils will be overruled for final good; and that all that bears the name of evil, including the devil himself, whether personal or impersonal, shall at last be destroyed and succeeded by good—infinite and endless good far superior to what otherwise would be experienced by the human family.—See Heb. ii: 14, 15, 1 John iii: 8.

In my next, all things concurring, I shall proceed to the consideration of the fourth proposition.

Yours in all kindness, D. SKINNER.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1838.

LUKE X: 25–37.

According to the narrative in the immediately preceding context, the seventy disciples had just returned with a report of their successful operations, and our Lord was discoursing with them relative to the future progress of his cause. An assembly had collected around Jesus upon the occasion, and among them there were some whose object was to ensnare and betray the great Teacher into the hands and power of the rulers. From the frequent mention of such malicious attendants, we may infer that Jesus was seldom rid of such spies upon his conduct and language. With admirable and unequalled prudence, all these deep-laid plots to obtain an accusation against the Beloved of God, and the Hated of those who called themselves his peculiar, orthodox, and only people, were evaded and "brought to nought."

The person who proposed the entrapping query upon the present occasion, was a lawyer, that is, one who professed to teach and explain the law of Moses. Those engaged in this somewhat honorable and lucrative office, suspected Jesus of entertaining too little reverence for Moses, and still less for the "craft" in which they were employed, and thought it quite likely that he might be readily betrayed into some expressions which would amount to heresy, and thus subject him to the power and the punishment of the Sanhedrin, who held the power of enforcing a strict conformity to what they deemed orthodox Judaism. At first sight, the ensnaring question—"what shall I do to inherit eternal life?"—seems as if it proceeded from a sincere desire to know the great purpose of being. From whatever motive it was presented on the present occasion, let us ask ourselves not unfrequently, lest we insensibly go astray—What must we do to secure the SUMMUM BONUM, the chief good, the highest enjoyment of our nature?

From this Prophet "greater than Moses," the lawyer undoubtedly expected the prescription of other terms for eternal life, than those in the law; and, that thus he would turn against himself the odium of the populace, and the power of the hierarchy. But Jesus makes the teacher answer himself. Upon this one of our young friends in writing to his sister, says, that he has no doubt that we could frequently resolve to ourselves questions with which we go to those who, by their age or writings, we think better qualified to answer.—He says he has frequently sat down determined to find out himself what he, at first, felt disposed to ascertain by consulting a teacher, or his books. He adds that he thus generally arrived at what was to him, a more useful and impressive answer than that which teachers or books could have given him. He had also the pleasure—and pleasure it is—of eliciting his own knowledge. He thinks, and so do I, that it is more from indolence than from inability to think for ourselves, that we consult others. One great misfortune attendant upon this indolent course is, that we too often finish our inquiries by passively adopting the opinions of those whom we consult, instead of using them merely as steps to lead us to an opinion of our own. But this by the by.

The answer of Jesus, "do this and thou shalt live," shows that the Jews knew enough to lead them to happiness, if they practiced accordingly. One of our young friends here ventures to guess that had the inquirer been a Gentile, Jesus would, out of his own mouth too, have shewn that though without law he was a law unto himself;—that attentive investigation would have led even such a one to the road that leadeth unto life or enjoyment;—that

> "True happiness had no localities;
> No tones provincial; no peculiar garb.
> Where duty went, she went, with justice went
> And went with meekness, charity, and love.
> Where'er a tear was dried; a wounded heart
> Bound up; a brusied spirit with the dew
> Of sympathy anointed; or a pang
> Of honest suffering soothed; or injury
> Repeated oft, as oft by love forgiven;
> Where'er an evil passion was subdued,
> Or Virtue's feeble embers fanned; where'er
> A sin was heartily abjured, and left;
> Where'er a pious act was done, or breathed
> A pious prayer, or wished a pious wish—
> There was a high and holy place, a spot
> Of sacred light, a most religious fane,
> Where happiness, descending, sat and smiled."

We can never think of the summary of the will of God in the 27th verse of this chapter, and in numerous places beside, of the extent of love implied in the epithets, "with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thine understanding"—we can never think of this union of affectionate, sincere, vigorous, and rational reverence and love, without sincere and heart-felt sorrow at our short-comings. We would not, however, be discouraged, nor let the young Christian disciple, who feels like "compunctions visitings," sorrow as one who has no hope; let us redouble our diligence to maintain that portion of the love of God which we possess, in active influence and operation, and we may confidently rely upon the promise that "to him that hath shall be given, and he shall have more abundantly." The way to get more, is to allow what we have to reign, to rule, to predominate in our life and conversation.

The conscience of the lawyer seems to have been burdened with a sense of failure in the love of his neighbor. "And who is my neighbor" is the voice of conscious imperfection. The lawyer undoubtedly expected that Jesus, being a Jew, would sanction the proper and prevalent opinion that, to countrymen alone, was this debt of love to be paid. Here he paid an involuntary compliment to Jesus as a Teacher: He felt as if his conscience, more than suspicious that his love to his neighbor was too contracted, would feel more at ease if so excellent a moralist would only confirm his narrow views. But instead of obtaining an answer which should pacify his conscience and justify him to himself, the reply of Jesus, contained in the parable, leads him to condemn himself, by approving of conduct diametrically opposed to his own, and to that of all the Jews, for they hated all other nations, and with the Samaritans, especially, they would hold no intercourse.

We now come to the parable. "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho," etc.—This is better rendered by Wakefield and Campbell, "A man of Jerusalem on his way to Jericho," etc., which shows at first sight, that the individual was a Jew. The pith of the parable lies in knowing this, and the hatred and animosity which existed between the Jews and Samaritans. Did we understand any man, instead of a man of Jerusalem, or a Jew, we would miss much of the pointedness of the reply. The road chosen for the site or scene of the parable, was quite notorious for robberies and murders; and Jericho being the residence of about twelve thousand priests and Levites, they might naturally be here introduced as travellers on that road, without any reflection upon their office. Yet, no doubt these characters were introduced, because in virtue of their office they ought to have been peculiar examples of humanity, mercy, and obedience to the law. By reference to Deut. xxii: 1–4, Dr. Clarke says, it will be seen that their conduct was a flat breach of the law. From those from whom he might have expected help, this poor, wounded, disabled sufferer received none; from a Samaritan, from whom he could expect no succor, he received the most efficient kindness. He did all for him he could have wished done to himself in like circumstances.—We may remark, in passing, that wine and oil was a popular, and generally a most ready application to wounds in that age; and that the two denarii which are called "pence" in the common translation, would probably purchase as much or more than so many dollars among us. By translating the original, peace, a very erroneous impression is conveyed: Would it not have been better to have retained the original word untranslated, as, indeed, there was no equivalent word in our language?

Do we wish to "go and do likewise"—to imitate the neighborly kindness of the good Samaritan? Let no political, let no religious animosity hinder our seizing upon every occasion to do good unto all men as we have opportunity. If we truly know and love God, we will endeavor to imitate his impartiality, his showering down favors upon even the evil and the unthankful. If our love to our neighbor, that is, to every one to whom we have an opportunity of showing kindness, or doing good, is not powerful to overcome the barriers of sect, party, and even personal injury, we are not sons of the Highest; his love and his likeness are faint and feeble within us. With a little effort, however, it need not long be so. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SCRIPTURE PERVERTERS.

There is as much of lamentable truth, as of poetical wit, in the expression of the Scotch poet:—

"Ev'n ministers, they have been kenn'd,
In holy rapture,
A rousing whid, at times, to vend,
And nail 't wi' Scripture."

Dr. Franklin somewhere relates the case of a certain sprig of divinity, who often preached in his hearing at a certain place, and who was so intolerably sectarian that he could hardly endure him. One Sunday morning, however, he took for his text the words of St. James—"Pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world." Surely, thought the philosopher, we shall now have a liberal sermon. Judge of his mortification, when the minister very gravely proceeded to define pure and undefiled religion, not as James defined it, but with this construction—that visiting the fatherless and widow, signified visiting such of these as belonged to the church or parish, and keeping unspotted from the world was, becoming a member of said church! Franklin never heard him preach again; and he was right; there was nothing uncharitable in his keeping away from such a perverter of the sacred Word.

We have too many of this description among us at the present day; too many empty-headed declaimers, who only know that they belong to a certain sect, and that it is their duty to make all the proselytes to their faith, they can. As to the Scriptures, they have something instead of these, a Confession of Faith, a Discipline, or some other spiritual directory of human invention. Why? Plainly because others can wield the Scriptures to as good advantage as themselves, and so they must draw off their forces on other ground! So goes the Christian world in many instances. And this is one great reason why the word of God is so wretchedly perverted by many who pretend to be its expounders.

"From drugs intended to impart
Relief to sickness, care, or pain,
The chymist, with transmutive art,
Extracts a poison and a bane;
So does the bigot's art abuse
The sacred page of love and life,
And turn its sweet and hallowed use
To deadly bitterness and strife."

When those who keep such kind of teachers in countenance shall find out that their leaders cause them to err, and shall resolve to search, themselves, for the truth contained in God's holy Word, we shall begin to see more happy times in the Christian church. We pray for the arrival of such a day—we await its coming—and if our eyes do not behold it, we shall hope for its appearing to the next generation—and for this, shall rejoice—and let it come when it will, it must give joy to the lover of scriptural inquiry, and inspire him with love and praise to the Author of all truth.

J. G. A.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PARTIALIST MERRIMENT.

The following extract is taken from Dr. Dwight's introduction to his well known sermon on the duration of future punishment. It is offered at this time for the serious consideration of the pastors of the Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist churches in this city, and for the consideration of others, who laughed and enjoyed themselves so well at the wretched and disgusting anecdotes related by the notorious Knapp, a few evenings since, while discoursing on one of the most solemn and important subjects that can possibly engage the attention of human beings. It is to be hoped that they will not peruse it in vain, coming as it does from one of the most eminent divines of which the Orthodox can boast in modern times. DAVID.

Utica, March, 1838.

"Before I begin the investigation of this subject," says the Dr., "I shall make a few observations, for the purpose of removing, or, if that can not be done, of lessening, a prejudice (the strongest, perhaps, cherished by the human mind) against the doctrine in question. The subject is immeasurably awful, and beyond all others affecting. Few persons can behold it in near vision with a steady eye. The very preacher who teaches the doctrine to others, can not but know, unless certainly assured of his own salvation, (a case undoubtedly very rare,) that he may, at that very time, be alleging arguments, which are to affect himself, and to evince his own final destruction, as well as that of others. If his heart is not made of stone, he can not contemplate the subject, as it respects his fellow-men, without overwhelming amazement.

"At the same time, the subject is unquestionably perplexing, as well as distressing. There are, I know, persons, who speak concerning it with an air of cool self-complacency, as being in their view easy of investigation, and free from embarrassment. I am inclined, perhaps uncharitably, to give them little credit for candor, clearness of intellect, or soundness of character; and greatly doubt whether the doctrine has been investigated by them, either to such an extent, or with such a spirit, as might furnish them with just views of its nature. There are others, who discourse of it in the desk, in the phraseology, the style and the utterance, belonging to vehement eloquence; such as we often find attached to a strain of powerful invective, or vigorous controversy. Were such persons to remember, that they may, at this very time, be pronouncing the final doom of their own parents, brothers, sisters, wives, children, and even of themselves; I can not but believe, that their mode of address would be essentially changed; would lose all its violence and exaggeration; and would become deeply humble, solemn and affectionate.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

AGENTS FOR PERIODICALS.

BRS. GROSH AND HUTCHINSON—I wish to occupy a small space in the Magazine and Advocate, on a subject a little differing in tone from that to which it is generally devoted. The principal reason why I ask this indulgence, is, that it has a widely extended circulation.

A certain agent for different periodicals, made his appearance in this vicinity, nearly two years since, by the name of William Elder, who procured subscribers, and received pay in advance from different individuals, without ever forwarding, or causing to be forwarded, said journals. I here give a copy of one receipt:—

"Received, Elbridge, April 1st, 1836, of Mr. A. Clark, one dollar and fifty cents in full for one year's subscription to the Reprint of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, commencing at Part 1st, 1836, and ending at Part 13th. 1836, inclusive. For the proprietors, WILLIAM ELDER, Agent."

This said William Elder promised that said journal should be forthcoming in two weeks from the date of the above receipt. It has not yet been received. I have not since seen the gentleman, and know not whether he is dead or alive. He has been an agent for the proprietors of Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, New-York Mirror, and, as I have been informed, the Knickerbocker, and other journals published in New-York. The proprietors of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, have been written to on the subject, by another person in this vicinity, who has a receipt of the same import of the above, a few weeks after receiving it; but as no reply could be obtained, we think it best to publish said agent's conduct to the world, that others may be aware of his course. How many others he has obtained money from in the same way, I know not. As he has been (if he is not now) the agent for several proprietors of periodicals, journals, etc., he has probably had an opportunity of obtaining much in other places. A good plea for obtaining the cash in advance, was, that as the amount was $1,50, it would be difficult to send it by letter.

It is probable the proprietors of the above journals can, by this time, give some information concerning him, whether he is what he professed himself to be, or an impostor. If this said William Elder is an honest man, let him make it appear—his conduct needs an explanation. If he is an impostor, his impositions should be exposed. It is just, and right, and reasonable, and Scriptural, "that every transgression and disobedience should receive a just recompence of reward," and that "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished." The Magazine and Advocate is a great traveller, and will assuredly find him out. I hope he will be able to explain himself in such a manner as to give satisfaction to those who now think of him unfavorably.

Yours, with respect, ASHLEY CLARK.

Elbridge, January 3, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PRINCIPLES CARRIED OUT.

The following extract is from an article on the subject of temperance, published in the 49th No. of the "Auburn Banner," bearing the signature of Rev. Luther Lee. With the reasoning of Mr. L., I think, not only every Christian, but every friend to temperance will fully agree. But whether Mr. L., or any other advocate of unending sin and misery, will be willing to apply this method of reasoning to certain principles involved in their religious creed, may be disputed.

"It must be wrong to sell our grain, knowing it is to be made into intoxicating drinks to be sold to drunkards. To deny the conclusiveness of this reasoning, must be to suppose that it may be right for one man to furnish another with means which he knew he intends using to commit wrong, which will result in consequences so fatal as to destroy himself. When a series of actions are so connected that the last can not exist without the first, and every intermediate one, if the last be wrong the whole can be nothing less than one series of wrong actions from beginning to end."

If Mr. L., or any of his Limitarian friends, can reconcile the doctrine of endless sin and suffering with the infinite wisdom and benevolence of the Deity, and not contradict the conclusions drawn in the above extract, I shall be happy to see it done. According to Arminianism, God has given mankind an existence, and put into their hands an agency which he knew, before he called them into being, would result in rendering the existence of a part of them an infinite curse! If this is true, God has given existence to a part of his offspring and furnished them with means which he knew they would use to commit wrong, which would result in consequences so fatal as to render them eternally sinful and miserable! In this doctrine we see exhibited, "a series of actions so connected that the last [endless sin and misery] can not exist without the first and every intermediate one, [and] if the last be wrong, the whole can be nothing less than one series of wrong actions from beginning to end."

Should it be said that man is created a free agent, and can not, with propriety, censure his Creator for furnishing him with means which he knew would result in his endless ruin, he being free to make a good or bad use of them, I reply, the distiller is also a free agent, and those who furnish him with materials to make drunkards, are only imitating the character ascribed by Partialists to the supreme Being! How long will men continue to ascribe qualities to our heavenly Father, for which they would hold a human being in contempt!

Camillus, January, 1838.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, MARCH 16, 1838.

THE SPIRIT OF RELIGION—NO. 2.

Brethren, permit me to say a few words more upon the above subject.

We would say, that it is a great truth, that a society formed in opposition to a revival, or from a spirit of opposition at all, has not in it the elements of a long existence. During an excitement, and under the preaching of what to many may be a novel doctrine, there may be zeal and strength enough in the society to keep it in a flourishing condition, but when the excitement has gone, when the preaching has become a wonted thing, the society being founded on the principles of opposition and there being nothing to oppose, the strength becomes exhausted, the zeal subsides, and the action and life of the society settle down into a cold, sluggish calm. There must be something more vital than the spirit of opposition, there must be a nobler end in view than a mere momentary triumph. A society should be organized for the purpose of a spiritual conquest over error and sin. The banner we plant on our ramparts, should not be the banner of a sect, the banner of a party—but the banner of Christ, the banner of salvation!—and in our midst should be altars, and prayers, and strivings for spiritual strength, and the spirit of religion. Our societies should be builded upon "the chief Corner Stone," and our object in building it should be the object of our Master—the object for which he sent his apostles into the world!

Again, let no man call himself a Universalist, who is ignorant of the great principles of Universalism. We fear there are too many who call themselves Universalists, because their parents or some one of their family are of the denomination, or because they like the doctrine rather better than they do any other. Let the motive that made you a Universalist be principle. Study and know its great truths. You will feel then that you could go to the prisoner's cell and the martyr's stake, for the sake of your principles, and your walk will be erect, and your step firm, as though you grasped and carried palpable truth with you. You will not be a mere lingerer on the threshold, a curious and idle spectator from the crowd, but your heart will be warm in the cause, and your arms bared to the work. You will not need to shelter yourself behind the instructions and information of others, you will not have to resort to books and papers, but with truth in your own hands you can do battle, and the armor of your opponent will ring again beneath the weight and efficacy of your blows. The Bible is the great armory, and from the Bible you must draw your principles. But, you can derive great aid from other sources, from books expounding difficult passages, throwing light upon ancient manners, customs and doctrines, explaining the import and original meaning of words—and from the works of good and pious men who stand and have stood high as teachers in Israel. For this purpose, we would suggest the establishment of a well conducted library in places where there are a number of our friends, or where societies are formed. Let the works be standard works of all denominations—search in every place for the truth, and when obtained hold it fast. Let there be no bigotry among us, no blinding of the eyes to light. The question "what is truth?" is an important one to all. We are all interested in discovering its principles and in practicing according to its teachings. Let us, then, search and be wise. Let our motives flow from principle. Let us be active and zealous, and let our zeal be according to knowledge.

Once more, brethren, let us practice according to our principles. How many are there in our ranks, who are Universalists in name but not in practice? Our opponents, we grant, should look to our principles and not to our actions, to find objections to our doctrine. But we know that it has been too often the case, that doctrines have been stigmatized on account of the actions of their professors. The world takes the precept, "by their fruits ye shall know them," to mean, "ye shall know their doctrine"—instead of meaning, "ye shall know whether individuals practice according to the principles of the Gospel."—We must act accordingly. Many an opprobrious epithet have our principles received, through the mal-practices of professed Universalists. But were this not the case, the moral obligation rests on us in full force, to follow Christ. We want none, (I appeal to you brethren,) we want none in our ranks who profess Universalism, but are ignorant of its principles and the rules of its practice. Our creed is the Bible—let our practice correspond to that high standard, and see if men will say ought against us. If they do, will not their slander roll back upon their own heads?

Brethren, think of these things. Let our societies be builded upon the rock Christ Jesus, and the gates of hell can not prevail against them. Let us know and prove our principles, and in the invulnerable panoply of truth, we shall stand beneath our triumphant banners. Let us practice according to our creed, the Bible, and God will be with us. From the storm he will be a shelter, and from the heat a shade. When temptations and snares would decoy us from the path, he will be around us, in a column of cloud, and when we walk through the barren wilderness and the dark night, HE will move before us and guide us, in a pillar of fire. E. H. C.

BOOKS.

Br. BRITTON keeps an assortment of Universalist books, and some valuable works on Phrenology and Education, for sale at his residence in Carthage, Jefferson county, N. Y.

PRIZE TALES.

I am none of those who would "do evil that good may come"—hence, if I believed it sinning against religion or morals to encourage others to write, or to publish well written fictitious narratives, parables, fables, etc., no hope of some partial benefit flowing from them, would ever induce me to do it. But believing that fictitious narratives, published as fictions—known to be fictions—ably written, drawing their characters and events from real life, basing them in probability, and arranging them so as to illustrate and enforce lessons of Gospel doctrine and Christian virtue—believing such things to be not only allowable but commendable instruments for reaching the hearts and minds of thousands better than they could be reached by any other means, I have encouraged, and will encourage their production and publication to the world. I only regret I am not more able to do so—that, even, I am not able to produce them myself.

But there are some who object not so much to prize tales themselves, but because they think them useless. To such, the following, which we copy from the Gospel Banner, of Augusta, Me., will speak more powerfully than all our arguments. Let them read it.

Here is a tale, written for our paper, that has aided in producing an effect on the mind of a Methodist Editor and preacher, that all our reasonings against "revivals," urged for years, have failed to produce.—But our Methodist Br. is somewhat mistaken in the objects of the tale. Our pious and gentle sister intended to support Universalism, undoubtedly—viz. that principle of Faith, which, by teaching us God's universal goodness, leads us to love him, and to imitate him by overcoming evil with good. But she does not ridicule Methodism. She describes its natural and legitimate effects, as carried out in the plain preaching of its zealous advocates, truly, faithfully, so far as language can do it. Our Methodist Br. may rely upon it, the doctrine of endless misery, plainly preached and fully believed, must, inevitably, tend to produce an absorption of the whole mind to the saving of souls from it—i. e. to fanaticism—and when this work proves fruitless, to moping melancholy, raving insanity, and suicide. Let our Brother go on in his reformation—go on—and on—and ON—he will find the doctrine of endless wo the fountain from whence come all these bitter waters of death—God grant that he may then have courage to attack the cause as well as its effects! And our sister—let her write on, and adorn the Godlike and cheering faith she professes with many such a tribute as "GOOD FOR EVIL." This tale will be found in our last volume, No. 27, page 209.

A. B. G.

CANDID CONFESSION.

We thank the Editor of the Olive Branch, a Methodist paper in Boston, in behalf of the cause of humanity and religion, we thank him,—for the following frank and explicit admission of the evil consequences too often attendant upon those religious excitements commonly called revivals of religion. Will neighbor Cox of the Wesleyan Journal, speak the same words? They would be as true in his paper as they are in the Olive Branch? Or has he a dread of such truth?

" An article by Miss Sarah C. Edgarton, of Shirley, Mass., as a prize essay for the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, is extremely well written, and intended to support Universalism, and ridicule Methodism; it is in the form of a fascinating tale. It attacks the fanaticism and abuses of Methodists, as though they necessarily grew out of its doctrines. They are faults of the community, and not consequent on its religious belief; its doctrines we believe are entirely pure, and we think according to the New Testament, But reflecting Methodists, and many of our Orthodox Congregationalists and Baptists, are persuaded that we have pushed our extraordinary excitements too far; we ought to be, at least whilst our wives, sisters and daughters are going to the mad house with a religious enthusia, that tears them from the dear circle of home, and in some instances even causes suicide. We must speak out—there is a wrong somewhere; it is high time we look the thing in the face; for our loving Saviour's religion does not produce evil but good; our camp meetings and our protracted meetings certainly have unhinged some of the noblest minds, and disqualified not a few for every social duty, and cut them off from their friends and usefulness for life; besides cutting off a relish for the ordinary means of grace in others, who are only religious under these extraordinary excitements. For one, we are determined to investigate this subject, though we fear there are some, we dearly love, will dissent from us. More anon."

We have our fears that the Editor of the Olive Branch may have been led to the discovery of the error he promises to rebuke still more faithfully, by a case of mental alienation in his own family, produced by these excitements. We infer this from the fact, that in another article, speaking of the Insane Hospital in Charlestown, and of Dr. Bell, the Superintendant of it, he says: "we have ventured to trust our dearest friend to his care."—We pray him to open his mouth, and speak plainly and honestly of what he knows of the fanatical and bewildering tendencies of camp meetings and other means of promoting excitements.

GEO. COMBE, ESQ.

In our last, we gave a letter from this distinguished man, in which he declined being a candidate for the Professorship of Moral Philosophy in the University of Michigan; and intimated that he might make our seaboard a scene of his highly useful and pleasing labors. Since then, Dr. John McCall, President of the Oneida Phrenological Society of this city, has published in the Democrat, that, by information received through Mr. Combe's brother, of Albany, he learns that Mr. Combe has concluded to visit the United States next Summer. Probably no man will be more generally welcome to philanthropists and philosophers. Since the visit of the lamented Spurzheim, whose begun labor Mr. Combe will probably take in hand and carry on towards completion, nothing has promised more fairly to render the study of man in all his powers and relations, general among Americans; and to lead the way to the prevalence among us of a more correct as well as more practical and useful system of moral and mental philosophy, and its application to the every day business and duties of life. It appears, to my mind, that Phrenology is certainly destined to greater improvement—to general prevalence in belief and practice—and to effect a great revolution in the corrupt theology, and the awkward legislation, and in the plans for treating the insane and criminals, of the present day. The more man becomes known, the better will God's design in his creation appear, and the more will men be able to become co-workers with God, in the physical, social, intellectual and moral improvement of our race. God speed the work.

A. B. G.

CONVERTS FROM PARTIALISM.

We frequently hear of Universalists being converted to a belief in endless misery; but it is very seldom that names, dates, and places, are given in these accounts, and when given, it is more seldom still, that the convert ever did believe in Universalism. Now be it understood, we do not believe that "what is truth?" can be determined by the number of converts made to any system. By no means. But as our opposers seem to rely with so much confidence on the conversion of a Universalist, I purpose giving them a lesson in their own mode of argumentation—to show them that counting converts is a game at which two can play as well as one; and that Universalists can exhibit far more converts from Partialism, than Partialists can from Universalism. To name all the converts from Partialism now in our ranks in the United States, would require room for at least 50,000 names, and their places of residence; but I will give only a few, and those are, at this time, Universalist preachers in good standing; and were, at the time of their conversion, in good standing in the Partialist denominations to which they respectively belonged. The list is made out from memory alone, (for I had not time to hunt up the accounts in our periodicals,) and probably contains a few errors—but there are also from fifty to one hundred more names that should be added to it. I have given the Partialist preachers who have been converted to Universalist preachers, first, and then followed them with the names of Universalist preachers, who, probably, were only laymen in the Partialist ranks.

Baptists.—Clerical Converts.—Nehemiah Dodge, New-London, Conn.; Walter Balfour, Charlestown, Mass.; Seth Jones, Ellisburg, N. Y.; William Underwood, Litchfield, N. Y.; J. Babcock, Volney, N. Y.; S. Russell, Brighton, Me.; Edward N. Harris, Methuen, Mass.; S. Glover, Newton, Conn; J. McKelvey, Palmyra, Ohio; — Tillotson, Huron county, Ohio; — Gibson, Sangamon, Ill. The following were, probably, laymen: Hosea Ballou, Boston; Adin Ballou, Mendon; T. G. Farnsworth, Haverhill; all of Massachusetts—J. E. Palmer, Barre, Vt.; S. Miles, Steuben county, N. Y.; D. Pickering, Buffalo; Jacob Myers, Petersburg, Pa.; Wm. Frost, Hiram, Me.; A. Green, Virgil, N. Y.; S. A. Skeele, Freedom, N. Y.

Methodists.—Clerical Converts.—Thomas Jones, Gloucester, Mass.; Philo Brownson, ——, Geo.; T. J. Crowe, Galliopolis, Ohio; J. Kidwell, Philomath, Ind.; Geo. N. Cox, Elizabethtown, Va. The following probably laymen: T. F. King, Charleston, Mass.; B. Hickox, Austinburg, and Geo. Rogers, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Presbyterians and Congregationalists.—Clerical Converts.—S. Stetson, Brunswick, Maine; S. Brimblecom, Danvers New Mills, Mass.; Z. Thompson, Lowell, Mass.; —— Hall, A. M., ——, Me. The following, probably laymen: Hollis Sampson, St. Johnsbury, Vt.; J. Brooks, Bernardstown, Mass.; Asher Moore, Hartford, Conn.

Christians.—Clerical Converts.—D. Thayer, Florida, Mass.; J. French, Denmark, N. Y.; D. D. Smith, Portland Me.

Episcopalians.—Clerical Converts.—C. F. Lefevre, New-York city; Menzies Rayner, Troy; Dr. Timothy Clowes, Hempstead—all of New-York State.

Lutheran Clergymen.—J. K. Weiandt, Whitemarsh, Pa.; T. Schreiner, Feering, Ohio.

N. B. Will our Editors correct, add, and circulate the foregoing list, till we get it more perfect?

A. B. G.

UNIVERSALISM

In various places.—Br. N. Brown, who has travelled pretty extensively as an Agent for the Herald of Truth, writes us—"I have travelled over 1200 miles in about ten weeks—preached, on an average, three evenings in the week, and every Sabbath but one. In some parts of the country through which I travelled, I found the Gospel of God's impartial grace making rapid progress; in others, our friends seem to have hung their harps upon the willows, and gone to sleep "on Babel's banks." In Salina, Onondaga county, our friends are wide awake under the blessed labors of our excellent brother, S. Barnes. [More so, especially, since the Rev. Mr. Slocum has aided them by his seven lectures against them. See Br. Montgomery's letter in No. 8. A. B. G.] In Newark, Wayne county, our cause is prospering. Br. Townsend preaches here, and an elegant brick meeting-house is well under way, and will be completed next Summer. Another Universalist house, built of cobble stone, will soon be completed, we trust, in Cortlandville. Br. Bullard labors here, and the cause seems to be onward. Our friends in Libertyville, Tompkins county, have recently engaged the labors of our excellent Br. W. Rounseville for half the time. In Sheshequin, Pa., the cause of truth is prosperous. There is quite a community of Universalists here, all zealous and true. For nearly five miles in extent through this delightful valley, there is scarcely a dissenting voice—nearly all are believers in the Abrahamic faith. Br. G. S. Ames labors here to very good acceptance. In Bath, Kennedyville and Howard, Steuben county, N. Y., they have the preached word by our faithful Br. M. L. Wisner. The cause in this section seems to be gradually onward, yet a little more zeal would not be amiss. In Tyrone, Reading, Beaverdam, Millport, Havanna, Dix, Hornby, Eddytown, Dundee, and a few other towns in Steuben, Chemung, and Yates counties, they have the preached word by our faithful father in Israel, Stephen Miles. He has a circuit which embraces a wide extent of territory, and travels and preaches almost constantly. In most, if not in all places where he labors, the word is signally blessed. I should judge him to be one of the happiest men in the world." God grant that he may always be thus blessed in his labors, and that he may remain "one of the happiest men in the world," till his snow-sprinkled locks go down to the grave in peace and resignation!

We have more good news on hand—some of which will yet be given when room and leisure permit. May God continue to prosper Zion! A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

Up to Monday last, we anxiously expected the proceedings of the Conference at Pavilion, that we might give them in this paper. We hope to receive them in time for our next—our readers have a great interest in them, and feel it, and I anticipate very happy results from that Conference. Br. Sanderson was not able to be present, having been called to the dying bed and funeral of a beloved sister, in Boston.

New Preacher.—I promised, in our last, to announce another this week. Last Sunday Br. E. H. Chapin, our worthy associate, delivered his first sermon in Spencer's school-house, Litchfield, to the congregation to whom Br. McAdam statedly ministers. Those who heard it, speak of it as very creditable to him, both in manner and in matter—and when we say to our readers that he is as good in the former as in the latter, they will know what that encomium means. We anticipate a course of usefulness and honor for our friend, and pray that the divine blessing may ever rest on him and his labors.

Removals.—Br. J. Britton, Jr. has removed from Brownville to Carthage, Jefferson county, and wishes all letters, etc. addressed accordingly. Br. M. H. Smith from Haverhill to Salem, Mass.—Br. D. Ackley, from Walpole, N. H., to Clintonville, Clinton county, N. Y.

Installation.—Br. J. G. Adams was installed as pastor of the First Parish in Malden, Mass., on the 7th inst. Sermon by Br. S. Cobb, late pastor. Brs. H. Bacon, S. Streeter, T. F. King, H. Ballou, 2d, O. A. Skinner and T. Whittemore took parts in the services, which, the Trumpet says, were very interesting.

CROWDED OUT.

Mr. Eddy's Letter is postponed in order to make room for Messrs. Campbell's and Skinner's letters, which will not admit of delay. Mr. E. shall be heard next week.

Mr. Dudgeon, whose letters we published in our 8th No., is apprehensive that a remark of mine may make him appear hostile to Christianity to some of our readers. Such was not my intention, nor meaning—Mr. D. is a believer in Christianity—even in the popular form (called orthodox,) and I verily believe thinks he is doing what he can to advance it most rapidly. His remarks in explanation were unintentionally omitted this week—will be given in our next. A. B. G.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS.

This is No. 11.—in two weeks more the time for advance payments expire. Those who do not pay in that time, must not complain that we charge them fifty cents more for their delay; for what with the pressure, and our losses by depreciated paper, and our terms, we feel such charge to be due to ourselves.

 We have heavy payments to make soon. Will all who can, please pay immediately to us or our agents what is due—and will our agents please remit immediately, all they can collect? G. and H.

Dunlap's History of New-York.—Adapted to the use of schools or private families. Just received and for sale at this office.

Every child should be acquainted with the history of his own State, and from a hasty examination of this work and the recommendations in its favor we doubt not that it is a highly useful and interesting work.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. Brown at the Peat school-house in Palermo—Br. Britton in Black River village, (Lockport,) and at Carthage in the evening.

Br. Grosh will preach in Vienna, on the fourth Sunday inst., as Br. Harvey Freeman may appoint. A society will be formed on said day.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Dana, (Mass) for J C and C W M—P M, Howlett Hill, for E L—C S, Margaretta, (O) for self, J M S, S B, D R and H W F—S S, Cold Water, (Mich) for J W—R C, Navarrino—M W W, Palmyra, for S B, C T, B C, S D H and J S B—P M, West Niles, for D W and N H—P M, Chester, (Vt) for J W—H F, East Hamilton, for self, E T, B P, D D, E K H, H D, L W, A C, A S, and E D H—S S, Elba—P M, Louisville, for J H R—W S P, North Smithfield, (Pa) for self, E D L, and S P—P M, Cooperstown, for J W, Wid. C, Z G, S W, T P R and H F.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TO ELSIE.

The Springs of time pass one by one
And all their beauties die—
But there's a Spring of fadeless bloom,
Eternal in the sky.

The morning smile frowns dark at eve,
And night pursues the day—
But there's a morn whose glorious smile
Can never fade away.

Our friends to foes how oft they turn,
E'en in our warm embrace!—
But there's a clime, where love to change
Can never yield its place.

The calm of peace, malignant sins
Oft banish from the soul—
But there's an endless calm of peace,
Where sin has no control.

Here friends, like you and I, must part
And bathe regret in tears—
But all will meet to part no more
Through never ending years.

Lot springs and mornings whirl their rounds,
And all my friends grow cold—
Let peace be driven from my heart
And farewells oft be told—

Let sickness come, and racking pain
Disturb my every breath—
The tide of life congeal my heart,
And glaze my eyes in death—

'Tis nought to me; I have a peace
Which death can not destroy;
And with a ransom'd universe,
This peace I shall enjoy.

Then fare thee well, thou lov'd of God,
With him I leave thee, friend,
Until before his throne, our hearts
In mutual joys shall blend.

EXTRACT.

We all know how in the quietest life little circumstances almost daily occur which give a zest to being, interest to the social circle, and are a remembrance perhaps all the life long. In ruder ages a livelihood could not be gained, at least without frequent intermission, in the peaceful domestication of home, and the undisturbed employment of the shop or the field. The process of living was a game of chance, in which, food, raiment, shelter and security were stakes often to be won at the expense of exceeding exertion, and of which, after all, one or more might be lost. Of course, almost every man's life was a series of interesting though perhaps painful adventures. The tablet of memory was the only page of record—a texture of living nerves, intensely feeling the impressions of incident as they were stamped for subsequent perusal. A memorandum thus noted was not to be forgotten. The father or elder brother had nothing like modern reading or recital at the evening fireside, but he could detail the chapter of personal, recent, and doubly interesting experience.

Then there were the frequent periods of war, when instead of the chances of the hunt, and the slaying of the bear and the lion, life and home and country were in the venture, and armies and cities were the prize. The warrior's memory was a living and present history, ever afterwards offering whatever glowing page he should choose to review.

At length when letters were invented and writers arose, the impressions on the living scroll of experience were transferred to the mute records of literature, thence to be translated to life anew, and become the breathing thoughts and burning words of successive millions in the spreading world of readers.

Again, it was the same bodily constitution which, primarily at least, led man into the secrets of nature, and to commence the gathering of those materials which are now separated and set in order in many distinct departments under the name of science.

Now, the inquirer may study the objects and processes of material creation to please curiosity, and to fill the understanding with the riches of God's truth. But such a taste would not have been formed, earth's depths would not have been sounded, her minuteness pierced, heaven's heights would not have been reached, its magnitudes grasped, had not man at first been driven by necessity, or allured by a craving for the outward possessions of this sensual life.

Still further, the elements of fiction have been principally formed and augmented by the same process.—What are the facinating writings of Shakspeare and Scott but mostly the transcripts of the resemblances of objects and events thrown into observation by man's active propensities?

Genius may now think worlds into being, fairer than earth, outshining the sun, and outnumbering the stars, but the spirit must first move over the chaos of sense.—Had Milton been always blind, and his ear never heard, the earth, hell, heaven, all the crowded universe of his unrivalled imagination would never have been.

I have thus, much too briefly for the subject and too tediously perhaps for the reader, shown the important uses of man's sensual nature and its peculiar satisfactions. Bu let me not be misunderstood. Let me not be thought to attach much value to the lewer pleasures as such. I hold them to be comparatively of trifling worth. They are but as the instruments that open the mine, as the common earth which surrounds and mingles with the essential metal out of which riches and splendors are drawn.

The palace is none the less spacious and stately, its furniture and decorations none the less superb or minutely beautiful, and it is none the less a fit abode for the crowned majesty of empire, that all was wrought with lustreless tools from native wilds and subterranean darkness.—Cheering Views.

NATURE OF RELIGION.

Religion in a general sense, is founded on man's relation and accountableness to his Maker; and it consists in cherishing the sentiments and performing the duties which thence result, and which belong to the other relations to other beings which God has appointed him to sustain.

Concerning these relations, sentiments, and duties, we are instructed in the Scriptures, especially in the New Testament. Religion with us, is the Christian religion. It is founded in the teachings and examples of Jesus Christ. It consists in the worship, the sentiment, and the character, which he enjoined, and which he illustrated in his own person.

What you are to seek, therefore, is, under the guidance of Jesus Christ, to feel your relation to God, and to live under a sense of responsibility to him; to cultivate assiduously those sentiments and affections which spring out of this responsible and filial relation, as well as those which arise out of your connection with other men as his offspring; to perform all the duties to Him and them, which appertain to his character and relation; and to cherish that heaven-ward tendency of mind, which should spring from a consciousness of possessing an immortal nature. He who does all this is a religious man, or in other words, a Christian.

You desire to be a Christian. To this are requisite three things: belief in the truths which the Gospel reveals; possession of the state of mind which it enjoins; and performance of the duties which it requires; or, I may say, the subjection of the mind by faith, the subjection of the heart by love, the subjection of the will by obedience. This universal submission of yourself to God, is what you are to aim at. This is religion.—Ware.

Imposition of Hands.—A religious ceremony, by which a Bishop lays his hand or hands on the head of a person, in ordination, confirmation, or in uttering a blessing. Imposition of hands was a Jewish ceremony, introduced not by any divine authority, but by custom; it being the practice among those people, whenever they prayed to God for any person, to lay their hands on his head. Our Saviour observed the same custom, both when he conferred his blessing on children, and when he cured the sick; adding prayer to the ceremony.—The apostles likewise laid hands on those upon whom they bestowed the Holy Ghost. The Jewish priests observed the same custom when any one was received into their body. And the apostles themselves underwent the imposition of hands afresh when they entered upon any new undertaking. In the ancient church, imposition of hands was even practiced on persons when they married, which custom the Abyssinians still observe.—Blake's Juvenile Encyclopedia.

Real Religion.—A poor slave was once thus addressed by a lively gentleman, in a jocular way. "Well uncle, I hear you have become very religious lately, and I want to know what religion you are of." "Why massa," said he, my religion is to cease to do evil, and learn to do well. What religion are you of?" Could any one have returned a more appropriate answer?

To avoid censure, is much more difficult than to gain applause. The latter may be secured by one great, wise, or fortunate action; whereas to avoid censure, a man must pass his life without saying or doing one bad or foolish thing, or one good thing ill understood.

DIVINE REVELATION.

Doctrines of divine revelation plainly published, we are bound to receive with all readiness of mind, how much soever they may transcend our comprehension, as we can not reasonably doubt that God, who dictated them, is incapable of dictating falsehood. But is it not equally true that we ought to admit no doctrine as a doctrine of revelation, which is repugnant to reason, and which baffles all its attempts to understand it?—Universalist Magazine.

Impatience will never ease the mind, nor effect any good purpose.

When ill news comes to late to be serviceable to your neighbor, keep it to yourself.—Zimmerman.

RELIGIOUS INSENSIBILITY.

My remedy for religious insensibility, under the blessing of heaven—it might sound strangely in the ears of some—but I boldly say that my remedy is reason. It is thought; it is reflection; it is attention; it is the exercise of reason in every legitimate way. The true method, I say, is purely and strictly rational. And I say, moreover, that it is not that Christians have used their reason so much, but so little, that they have been so deficient in real feeling.—Dewey.

MARRIAGES.

In Burlington, Otsego county, February 14th, by William Park, Esq., Mr. Joseph P. Miner, to Miss Levena H. Johnson, all of that place.

In Carthage, January 28th, by Rev. J. Britton, Mr. Henry Rich, to Miss Alvira Gates, both of that place.

In New-Berlin, January 14th, by Rev. J. Hayward, Mr. Lewis Spurr, of Columbus, to Miss Polly Williams, of the former place.

In Edmeston, Otsego county, February 9th, by the same, Mr. Norman J. Bliss, of Hartwick, to Miss Mary E. Cole, of Palermo, Oswego county.

In Columbus, Feburary 20th, by the same, Mr. Samuel C. Baird, of New-Berlin, to Miss Cornelia Myers, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Hamilton, January 26th, Mrs. Lucy Swift, in the 41st year of her age. The misfortunes of a beloved and once respectable husband, led to his intemperance and abuse of her. Her mind, after much long suffering, sank under the cruel reverse, and she committed suicide by hanging. She was ever mild and amiable; seeking to conceal the faults of him she loved; uncomplaining in her griefs. As a mother, also, she was tender and faithful—as a member of society, virtuous and estimable. Who but must mourn her hapless lot, and believe, that as her sorrows are pitied of man, the Judge of all the earth will do right in also remembering that she was but dust? Her funeral was attended on the 28th—sermon by Br. A. Williams.

In Madison, January 20th, of dropsy, Sarah Augusta, daughter of John and Frances Summers, aged eight years. Sermon by Br. Boden.

In Columbus, February 21st, Mrs. Lydia Burnside, aged one hundred and one years! Her funeral was attended on the 22d, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to her surviving descendants, and a congregation of sympathising neighbors and friends, from Job xiv: 10, by J. Hayward.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months: $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH,

Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1838. NUMBER 12.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER IV.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

THE HABITS.

Habit exercises a most powerful sway over human actions. It is a chain that is insidiously winding itself around us, and binding us to virtue or vice—to principles that will lead to prosperity and peace, or to practices which will involve us in infamy and wretchedness. With our existence commence our habits; and in exact ratio with our bodies do they increase in strength and power. The character of the habits depends entirely upon circumstances, the kind of instruction to which we have been subjected, and the nature of the influences exercised over us. Habits formed in infancy and childhood, can easily be corrected and moulded into the desired channels; but those fixed upon us at maturity, it is extremely difficult and often impossible to eradicate, or even to modify to any great extent. Youth, therefore, when the judgment has become sufficiently developed to meditate seriously upon those subjects that pertain to our welfare, is a season peculiarly well fitted for the formation of those habits which we would have influence us through life. Let a proper foundation be laid in youth—let the habits both of body and of mind, be examined and corrected—let those that are deleterious be expunged, and those that are good be added—and the beneficial fruits of this labor, will be experienced through life.

Good habits should be esteemed as valuable friends. They will assist you in every good thought and deed; and they not only impart their own grateful fruits, but they possess the most valuable tendencies—purifying the mind and leading it gently in the paths of virtue and propriety. One good habit opens the door for the introduction of another—and as they increase in number, they all increase in power, in influence and durability. But you should always look upon bad habits as your enemies. They oppose your enjoyment and prosperity; and just so far as their influence extends, to the same degree will you be involved in wretchedness and ignominy. One bad habit will not remain satisfied in possession of your mind. Its deleterious influence will not only directly affect your enjoyments, but will be continually exerted to call in another evil habit, and another, until they become a multitude, gaining gradually an entire control over you. And remember, that as your bad habits increase in number, they also increase in strength and depravity, until they finally plunge their victim into the depths of wretchedness. You should, hence, be extremely cautious not to acquire even one habit that is of a demoralizing or injurious character; for you can resist the encroachments of one, with far greater success, than to delay until it is reinforced by a multitude. Strike down the first of these foes, however feeble it may appear, and then you may be able to resist the host in its rear; but admit a few of the vanguard, and they will exert themselves to bind your higher powers, and introduce all their evil companions.

Allow me to direct your attention to a few of the habits indispensably necessary to the prosperity of young ladies.

Industry.—The benefits of industry are manifold. You were made for industrious activity. This is evident from the construction of your bodies. For what purpose were joints, and sinews, and muscles, given to you, but for exercise? By a proper use of them, you will secure health and its enjoyments; but if you allow them to remain almost wholly inactive, the consequences will be painful diseases and early decay. Every thing in nature's works exhibits industry. The earth never wearies in its diurnal and annual revolutions; the rapid wind, the falling rain, the rushing rivulet, the billowy ocean, all exhibit ceaseless industry. And animals of every species, display an activity in accordance with their construction and wants. Even the vegetable kingdom is filled with industry—

> "See dying vegetables life sustain,
> See life dissolving, vegetate again;
> All forms that perish, other forms supply."

By what rule is the human race exempted from sharing in this universal industry? Those who look upon occupation and labor as evils, are evidently ignorant of their own construction and nature. A slight acquaintance with the principles of physiology, will instruct you, that without bodily exercise, you can not experience the high blessing of health. If you arrest the course of the pure gushing stream, and cause its waters to stagnate, how soon it becomes filmy and nauseous—a green slime gathers on its surface, and noxious insects breed in its bosom! And thus it is with the human body. Let it remain inactive and dormant—let its muscles and sinews be but seldom and slightly exercised—cramp and circumscribe its powers and energies, and debility and sickness ere long ensue. This is, evidently, the reason why so many people of wealth (especially females) are afflicted with lingering diseases. Looking upon industrious occupation as degrading and unnecessary, they indulge in slothful and misnamed ease; and when the bitter effect of their folly comes upon them—when the pampered body is filled with disease and pain, they perhaps murmur at the decrees of Providence. But the blame can not be attached to Providence. The Creator formed the human race with capabilities of great enjoyment; and if they fail properly to exercise these capacities, the deficiency in their pleasure will be of their own procuring. And it is in vain to resort to nostrums to build up an artificial health. Having been lost by luxury and slothfulness, health can not be regained but by temperance and an industrious employment.

It is peculiarly necessary that young women should have much exercise. It developes their frames, strengthens their constitutions, and gives the freshness of health to all their bodily organs, and the glow of beauty to their countenances. It is a lack of industrious occupation, that gives paleness to the features, and brings disease and early dissolution to the bodies of so many females. There is no trait in a young lady more useful and admirable, than industry. It is a high recommendation to the favor of those whose approbation is desirable. But how reprehensible, how repulsive and disgusting, is indolence in a young woman. She who loiters away her time over a novel, or in idle gossip, while, perhaps, her aged mother is overloaded with the affairs of the household, is marked by community. No one can respect or admire her. While she continues a slave to indolence, she is the most useless object on earth! Utterly incapable of usefulness, or of conferring any valuable benefit upon her fellow-beings, she is a burthen to herself and to those with whom she is connected.

If you would enjoy health and retain beauty—if you would secure esteem and affection—if you would be useful to yourself and the world—you must be industrious. Let your circumstances be what they may, industry is inseparably connected with your happiness. You should acquire the habit of being constantly employed in some useful manner, and should frequently engage in those occupations which call into exercise your bodily strength and activity. A female writer remarks: "While the most delicate effects of the needle, rank high among accomplishments, its necessary departments are not beneath the notice of the most refined young lady. To keep her own wardrobe perfectly in order, to pay just regard to economy and to the comfort of the poor, will induce her to obtain a knowledge of those inventions by which the various articles of apparel are repaired, modified, and renovated. True satisfaction and cheerfulness of spirits, are connected with these quiet and congenial pursuits. The generous pleasure of relieving a mother or a friend from the pressure of care, will sometimes induce young ladies to acquaint themselves with employments which enable them, when the more complex duties of life devolve on them, to enjoy and impart the delights of a well-ordered home."

> "It rains! What lady loves a rainy day?
> She loves a rainy day, who sweeps the hearth,
> And threads the busy needle, or applies
> The scissors to the torn or thread-bare sleeves,
> Who blesses God that she has friends and home;
> Who in the pelting of the storm will think
> Of some poor neighbor that she can befriend;
> Who trims the lamp at night, and reads aloud
> To a young brother, tales he loves to hear;
> Such are not sad even on a rainy day."

Economy is another habit that young ladies should cultivate. Although you may not realize the importance of this habit so sensibly in your present condition, yet ere long you may be in circumstances where it will be highly necessary. In the marriage state, the success and prosperity of the husband, depend, in no small degree, upon the economy of the wife. If she is prudent and economical—if she indulges in no unnecessary display and expense—their united efforts can hardly fail of acquiring a competency, if not a fortune. But if she is careless and indifferent—if she squanders in useless finery and costly array, the fruits of her husband's exertions—his efforts will be in vain—his energies will be paralyzed—and disappointment and poverty will almost certainly be the fruit of her foolish blindness. How many families have been reduced from affluence to the depths of poverty, entirely through lack of economy in the wife!

Economy, in a great degree, is a habit; and like other habits, it must be acquired. It is therefore necessary, highly so, that ladies should acquire this habit while young, if they would reap its benefits in after life. You should study economy in all your expenditures, however trifling, and in all your domestic affairs. You will thus readily acquire a habit which will recommend you to the prudent and worthy, and which can not fail of enhancing your future prosperity. But the female spendthrift is as odious as the male. She is acquiring habits which will cause the discreet to avoid any connection with her, and the fruits of which may be poverty, want, and distress.

It is hardly necessary to say, that habits of neatness are indispensable to the young lady. It is impossible to describe the disagreeable appearance of a slovenly woman! Even high virtues can not prevent that nauseating disgust, which a want of neatness invariably creates. Every young lady should cultivate a habit of neatness in her appearance. You can not be too particular in this respect. In every proper condition and occupation, you can present a neatness highly commendable and attractive. If you would not drive from your presence, with no strong desire to return, those whose esteem you desire to secure, avoid carefully all approach to slovenliness—it dims all other qualifications.

Gossiping is a habit to be avoided. This is said to be peculiarly a defect of females. I am not prepared to subscribe fully to this sentiment. While I have known many women who are not addicted to this practice, I have at the same time been acquainted with numbers of the other sex, to whom it might justly be charged. If women exhibit a disposition to converse upon trifling matters, and in disparagement of others, to a greater degree than men, it should be attributed rather to a volatile disposition and their peculiar condition in society, than to a defect in sense, or to a fault-finding disposition. This defect, however, it must be acknowledged, is often carried to extremes in females. There are those who seem especially to delight in conveying frivolous reports throughout the neighborhood, and in conversing with great earnestness in regard to them; and they are particularly cautious that the subjects of their communications shall not lack for embellishments, while in their hands. Such people are not generally notorious for exercising much care in selecting their topics, or in ascertaining the truth of the reports which are injurious to those to whom they relate. To talk, seems to be their great desire; and it matters little to them, what the subject is, so long as they find food for their volubility. Steele, the old English writer, remarks: "The truth is, the inquisitive [and the same may be said of gossipers] are the funnels of conversation; they do not take in any thing for their own use, but merely to pass it to another: they are the channels through which all the good and evil that is spoken in town, are conveyed."

This unfortunate practice of gossiping, is, to a great degree, a habit, and like other habits, is acquired; and when once it is fastened upon you, it will be difficult to divest yourself of its influence. Young ladies should endeavor to rise above this low and puerile practice, and should exert themselves to avoid it entirely. There are a few suggestions which, if properly adhered to, will have a tendency to preserve you from its degrading power. In the first place, be not too inquisitive in regard to the affairs of your neighbors, or those with whom you mingle. "Mind your own business," is a motto worthy of being engraved upon the door of every dwelling. Be attentive to your own affairs, and never allow idle curiosity to urge you to intermeddle with that in which you are not directly interested. The old maxim is eminently true—"Let every individual sweep before their own door, and there will be a clean street." In the next place, never attribute a wrong act to any individual, without the most ample proof that the implicated is guilty. Surmises are no proper foundation for evil reports against your neighbor; and you should never give publicity to rumors founded solely upon the "guess-work" of some evil-minded busy-body. When you are fully satisfied that your neighbor has been guilty of misconduct, consider, before you retail it to the world, whether any benefit can accrue in pursuing this course, either to yourself, to the community at large, or to the individual guilty. If good can not in this manner be made to flow to either party, then remain silent; for no principle would justify you, under these circumstances, in spreading the faults of your fellow-beings before a gainsaying world! And, lastly, when you do feel called upon to speak of their aberrations, be extremely cautious that you do not amplify and enlarge them. Speak the simple truth, and "nought extenuate, and nought set down in malice."

Guard against indulging in anger. A peevish disposition is exceedingly unpleasant in ladies. It is undoubtedly true, that some are constitutionally more irritable than others; yet the visible outbreakings of anger, depend much upon habit. If you allow every trifling circumstance that does not coincide with your wishes, to irritate you into ill temper, you will not only be irrascible for the moment, but in this manner a confirmed habit of peevishness will grow upon you, which you will find it difficult to control, even in circumstances where it would be extremely desirable to do so. I need only invite the young lady to contemplate her countenance in the mirror, when she is in anger, or indulges in sour, morose feelings, to satisfy her how much to her disadvantage are these emotions, in addition to the actual pain which they invariably bring upon her. To avoid a habit of petulence, you should school your feelings into self-control, and not allow small disappointments to destroy the equilibrium of your mind. Cultivate social, benevolent, and friendly feelings, and a forgiving spirit. While these emotions pervade and control the mind, peevishness, ill temper, and moroseness, with all their unhappy effects, will be entirely banished.

Finally, watch closely the habits that are settling upon you. Allow and cultivate none that will not have an influence to make you virtuous, amiable, respected, and useful to yourself and to your fellow-beings. Whatever exercises a contrary tendency, should be avoided as subversive of your character and happiness.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LETTER.

Mr. T. C. Eaton:

Sir, Yours of the 16th inst. came to hand several days ago, and was read with some degree of interest. Not that there is any thing very striking in the document itself, except its scurrility and bitterness. But this is pardonable, as it would not be fitted for the chaste columns of the "Gospel Advocate," if these precious properties were wanting. Some of the statements, however, contained in your communication, are so utterly false, and others are so deeply tinctured with exaggeration, that to permit them to go before the public uncontradicted, would be doing injustice to myself and to the cause of truth.

The rather ludicrous egotism of your exordium, admits of no reply, nor, indeed, does it call for any. The benevolence and integrity of your motives, none, I presume, of those who know you will call in question; and as to the "moral worth, Christian virtues, charity and kindness of that respectable body to which you have the honor to belong," and which you so eloquently panegyrize, they are indeed too obvious to be disputed. I succumb, Sir, to all your pretensions. What else can I do, when I have your naked word for all you have asserted? Proof of such a character is, of course, irrefragable; and I dare not impugn it.

You are ambitious of seeing your name in print. This is laudable in young men of brilliant parts, like you and I—for what a pity it would be, if those who are capable of enlightening and reforming the world, should hide their talents in a napkin! And what can be more charming, than the prospect of having our names handed down to unborn generations, in that palladium of honest fame, the "Gospel Advocate?" You are therefore at perfect liberty to publish your letter—and to serve as a foil, to set off the superior beauty of your production, this of mine in reply—although to say the truth, the honor of appearing before the public is one to which I never aspired. As it seems forced upon me, however, I suppose I must carry it with as good a grace as possible.

Before I reply, in detail, to the formidable charges you have brought against me, permit this prefatory remark. I apprehend that you and I do not mean the same thing, when we use the term Universalist. By a Universalist, you seem to mean one who is a member of some society bearing that name. On the other hand, I use the word, with greater latitude of meaning, to signify all who are avowed and notorious advocates of the doctrine. I half suspect, too, that you, Sir, are on some occasions in the habit of using the term in the same sense. You would not, perhaps, hesitate to acknowledge that your friend, John I. Eacker, Esq., is a Universalist, although, if I am correctly informed, he is not a member of any society. Thus you see that, to be consistent, you must own all as Universalists who claim to be such. It is observable that you do not say church, but society—and truly a Universalist church would be a strange thing under the sun!

I will now seriously attend to the charges which you have preferred against me, you say, as an honest man and a Christian.—I shall endeavor to address you with as much respect and kindness as though I really believed you to be all you described yourself to be.

Your first charge is as follows. "You stated in public while holding a protracted meeting in Carroll, that you called at the tavern in Sheridan, in August last, at the time the Universalist association met there to hold its annual session, and there you saw the leading Universalists, drinkin and carousing, and cursin, and swearing, and praising the preachers, and telling what d—d good preaching they had!!" This is your charge, verbatim et literatim et punctuatim, with the exception of the words drinking and cursing, which I have italicised to mark their orthography. That I said some thing while in Carroll, out of which all this has grown, I think is highly probable; but its vulgarity and profaneness show through what sort of hands it has passed, in travelling over to Sheridan. I regret that, having spoken extemporaneously at the time alluded to, I can not refer to my notes, to ascertain the precise language which I used. I distinctly recollect, however, that I was endeavoring to illustrate the practical tendency of Universalist preaching and sentiments. I did say that, on the day your meeting closed, I saw several notorious Universalists racing their horses, in the most disorderly manner past my house; and having occasion shortly after to go to the Post Office, I saw these same individuals in the bar-room, drinking what I supposed to be brandy, and enlivening their potations with the most unseemly, boisterous and profane conversation. This I saw; and, if I am not mistaken, others witnessed the same. You call on me to give the names of those leading Universalists who thus conducted. Whether I used the phrase leading Universalists, I do not now recollect; but, as it was not necessary to my purpose, it is my impression I did not. Be assured, Sir, that I shall take a long time to deliberate before I give you the names of those individuals. When I am convinced that your motives are as pure and charitable as you represent them to be, I may possibly comply with your request. You say you believe this statement to be false. I say that I know it to be true. Whether the public will attach more credit to your faith than to my CERTAIN KNOWLEDGE, remains to be seen.

What your Methodist brethren said concerning the meeting of your association, I know not; nor is it relevant to the matter before us. Are you not aware, Sir, that the tendency of your preaching and doctrines, is in the highest degree detrimental to public morals and private virtue?—When the apostles preached, it was not a strange thing to hear the most abandoned sinners cry out, "what must I do to be saved?" Has your preaching in Sheridan been attended with similar results? Point out to me the infidels you have converted—the drunkards and libertines, and blasphemers you have reformed. Or rather, point out to me persons of this description who are not AVOWED UNIVERSALISTS. Do not misapprehend me. That there are Universalists among us who are amiable, moral and public spirited men, I grant with pleasure—whether Universalism has made them such, might, perhaps, be questioned with some show of reason. But I drop the subject, and pass to your second charge.

"You stated in public and private, while in Carroll, that the Universalists were all infidels, disbelievers in divine revelation!!" I deny that I ever said so; and it remains with you to make your assertion good by unimpeachable evidence. I have said repeatedly, and I now say it again, that Universalism is less rational than Deism; and I think I have, at various times, demonstrated the truth of the affirmation by solid reasoning.—It seems that we are henceforth to look to Universalists, as the only legitimate defenders of Christianity, against the attacks of infidels. Be assured, Sir, that "Christendom" will duly appreciate your labors and those of your pious co-adjutors in this cause!

Your third charge is—"On your return from Carroll, wonderfully elated with the success of your meeting, you stated that about thirty Universalists were converted during the protracted meeting in Carroll"! I stated no such thing. I did say that several Universalists were hopefully converted during that meeting—and this was true. Whether these persons were members of your society, I know not—but I think they were not—as they were mostly young men who had not been given over to believe a lie; but that they were public advocates of Universalism, they themselves stated repeatedly during the meeting, as numbers can testify.

"And again you stated in your meeting on Sunday that the Universalists in C——, were alarmed at the great work of the Lord that was going on, and afraid that their whole number would be converted to a belief in endless misery (and consequently have the delightful anticipation of feasting on the pains, and groans, and tears of their fellow-beings thoughout the wasteless ages of eternity) therefore they sent off fifty miles after a Universalist clergyman to prevent them from becoming Christians." The profanity of this extract will be, without doubt, imputed to its real author. As to the fact you charge me with having stated, I have no wish to deny it. I was informed, by respectable citizens in Carroll, that your brethren did send a considerable distance after re-inforcements: whether they or you were in the right, I have not the means of ascertaining.

As to the challenge you understood I gave, I have the satisfaction of assuring you that your informant was mistaken. You know my views in reference to the utility of public debates, communicated to you in private some time since. I need only say, that my mind is the same now.

And now, Sir, I have gone through with your formidable catalogue of charges, in as fair and lucid a manner as I could. That what I have said will satisfy you I have little hopes; that it may be of some use to a certain class of readers, whose eyes it may meet, is my wish and prayer. Why you have selected me rather than the older and more talented brethren who were my co-adjutors in the meeting at Carroll, as the target at which to "shoot your arrows, even bitter words," is best known to yourself. I half suspect, however, that you promised yourself an easy victory from the weakness of your antagonist. Permit me to ask, if the eminent success of the meeting so often referred to in this correspondence, is not what has opened your eyes to my manifold sins, and made you so eloquent in reproving them? That meeting, Sir, struck the death blow of Universalism in Carroll; and it was a blow which has sounded through the county. You begin to tremble, it seems, for your beloved Dagon, which has thus fallen before the ark of Jehovah; and you would fain replace the fallen idol upon his throne. You have, for want of a nobler quarry, pounced upon some insulated expressions, which I dropped amidst the heat and impetuosity of extemporaneous speaking: and after ingeniously (I will not say designedly,) perverting and exaggerating their meaning, you hold them up as bug-bears with which to frighten the public. Alas! for a cause, the advocates of which are driven to such contemptible shifts to maintain their ground!

I may have seemed to you, in this communication, to trifle; but permit me to say before I close, that I view the subject which has called forth this letter to be one of deep and solemn moment. Should I say that I have written with reference to that day when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed, you would probably call it the rant of a morbid enthusiasm; but you and I will soon personally explore the secrets of that world concerning which there is now so much incertitude and debate. I fervently pray the infinite Father to enlighten our minds by his spirit—to preserve us from fatal errors—and lead us in the way everlasting—that when eternity, with its immutable realities, shall be revealed to our view, we may find nothing to appal or distress; but may enter into that "PRESENCE where there is fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore."

I am, Sir, with much respect, yours, etc.

ZECHARIAH EDDY.

Sheridan, November 20th, 1837.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SECRET PRAYER.

"Pray to thy Father in secret," said the Master of Christians to his disciples who were with him on the earth. Blessed requirement! It is the pleasure as well as privilege of the spirit to hold communion with its great Author, to taste his goodness, to realize his forgiveness, mercy and love, and thus gain spiritual strength and virtue, daily. Secret prayer! Why it is the Christian's light, his power, his fortress. In this he is "strong in the Lord and in the power of his might," and though hosts should encamp around him, he is not to be moved. Perseverance and faithfulness, his motto; salvation and victory, his reward.

Private prayer has been well compared to a golden key, unlocking the mysteries of the divine word. "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God." Daniel studied the Scriptures, and in answer to prayer, obtained a clearer knowledge of their contents. "While I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin, and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting the supplication before the Lord my God, for the holy mountain of my God; yea, while I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation; and he informed me, and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am come to show thee; for thou art greatly beloved; therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision." Dan. ix: 20-23.

Happy, thrice happy that soul who seeks communion with the source of all knowledge—who goes up to the fountain of truth to drink and live. How sweet shall be his meditations! How elevated his enjoyment! Not like that which the sensualist and mere worldling enjoy, which rises for a moment and then goes down to leave greater gloom behind—but that pure, free, steady light which burns on the altar of the devout heart, and sheds a hallowing radiance through all the soul—bidding moral darkness and doubt to remove, and holy confidence and love to come in and be welcome guests at the feast of divine knowledge, and rejoice in that grace which pardons sin, and makes man the recipient of immortality. Praise the Lord, ye who seek him in holy communion of the spirit, for on you will he shed the light of his salvation! J. G. A.

Malden, Mass.

LETTER FROM MR. DUDGEON.

The following is the letter referred to in the last number. I have taken the liberty to add a few remarks, at the close.

New-Hartford, February 27, 1838.

DEAR SIR—As nothing can be farther from my intention than to mislead the weakest of our friends with even the shadow of an idea hostile to Christianity; permit me to express some fear that a sentence in your remarks on my letters to Mr. Owen, which you obligingly published in the eighth number of your valuable Magazine, may have a tendency to induce some of your readers to misconstrue my meaning. You ask, "Is no religion better than skepticism and infidelity, that he hopes to succeed on the plan he now proposes?" Because I propose that the practice of Christian morals should be taught to all under twenty years of age, it does not follow, that one who avows himself, as I have done, to be a believer in our Divine Religion, could entertain a thought, for one moment, of excluding persons at that age from the study of the mysteries of the Gospel; far from it—on the contrary, it is hoped that moral practice will be the best possible preparation for entering on the study of that most important of all subjects. I hold it as an opinion not easily to be controverted, that "those who DO the will of God, shall know (when they shall arrive at maturity) whether the doctrines be of God or of men." Surely it is much easier for a child to learn and to practice truth, justice, and temperance, than to comprehend the mysteries of faith, sanctification, vicarious atonement, redemption, and grace. Hence it is not to be found in the Sacred writings that Christ and his Apostles did upon any one occasion address themselves to children on those subjects of our religion, that seem to require mature intellect for their reception. With great deference to modern professors, it appears to me, that they greatly err on this subject. Hence we see how lamentably deficient mankind in general are, in the performance of the most obvious moral duties.

I observe that, in common with many others, you entertain doubts on the practicability of the community system, as proposed by Mr. Owen. But you are aware that the Essenes amongst the Jews, the primitive Christians, and, in this country, the Shakers above all others, have acted most successfully on the principle of a community of stock, labour, and enjoyment of the produce.—These superstitious and ignorant creatures (I speak generally, for there are a few knowing men among the Shakers,) have held together for half a century, without any commotion or dissension amongst them; and at this moment, when all our other population are full of complaint, they are in a most prosperous condition. They are indeed children of this world, surpassed in its wisdom by none. Shall practical Christians, possessing the means of attaining all human knowledge, be less successful than these sordid worldlings?

I am very respectfully, yours,

THOMAS DUDGEON.

REMARKS.—I confined my question to the proposed school for illegitimates, under twenty years of age—and in view of the fact that Christianity is a social tie, without which no eminently social system can flourish. The Essenes and Shakers are proof of my views, that for a community system to succeed, a despotism must be established, under which the acquisitiveness, etc., of one shall govern all the rest. The primitive Christians entered into a community only to a limited extent, under peculiar circumstances, which acted on them with despotic power, and only in Jerusalem, or, at most, in the land of Judea. For in other countries, each Christian made weekly contributions from his individual stock.—1 Cor. xvi: 1-4. However, if friend Dudgeon can succeed, no one will rejoice in the good he does, more heartily than A. B. G.

Had Tully himself pronounced one of his orations with a blanket about his shoulders, more people would have laughed at his dress than have admired his eloquence. SPECTATOR.

Modesty is to merit as shades to figures in a picture; giving it strength and beauty.

BRUYERE.

There is no use of money equal to that of beneficence; here the enjoyment grows on reflection, and our money is most truly ours when it ceases to be in our possession. MACKENZIE.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1838.

LUKE XI: 1–13.

The very youngest reader of this chapter may readily observe the inaccuracy and inelegance of the form of expression in the first verse, as it is found in the common version. "As he was praying, when he had ceased," is the faulty mode of expression referred to: "After Jesus had been praying," is the much preferable rendering of Wakefield.

What was the "certain place" where Jesus had been praying? Without doubt in a house of prayer, or oratory, which the Jews built in secluded situations among the mountains and by the rivers' sides. In the sixth chapter, verse 12, of this Gospel, we read that Jesus on the night previous to the day on which he chose his twelve disciples, remained all night in an oratory or house of prayer to God, not in prayer to God as in the common version. This is the rendering of Wakefield and Campbell, which is sanctioned by Dr. Whitby and the most eminent biblical expositors, as Drusius, Prideaux, Hammond, Watts, etc. In Acts xvi: 13, it will be seen that the apostles having understood that there was a proseucha, or prayer-house out of the city of Philippi by a river's side, went out to it on the Sabbath, knowing that they would find some of their countrymen assembled there on that day.

Is it possible that the disciples, after being three years under the instruction of Jesus, should be altogether ignorant of the manner and matter of prayer? This is not deemed very likely; and accordingly it is generally thought that the request—"teach us to pray"—is for some form of prayer such as the Rabbis were wont to give to their followers, which custom it appears John Baptist also followed, although we have no record of his form. Of the form which Jesus gave in answer to this request, and which is essentially the same as that in the sixth chapter of Matthew, an eminent prelate of the Episcopal church says:—"This prayer stands unrivalled in every circumstance that constitutes the perfection of prayer, and the excellence of that species of composition. It is concise, it is perspicuous, it is solemn, it is comprehensive, it is adapted to all ranks, conditions, and classes of men; it fixes our thoughts on a few great important points, and impresses on our minds a deep sense of the goodness and the greatness of that almighty Being to whom it is addressed." (Lectures on the Gospel of St. Matthew, by the right Rev. B. Porteus, D. D. Lord Bishop of London.)

What is prayer? In the words of Montgomery,

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desire."

It is so. Upon what object then, are our desires fixed by this form of prayer given us by our Master and Teacher? After impressing upon our minds the paternal relation which the Supreme Being holds to us and to the rest of the human family, we are taught to desire that every thing by which the perfections and intentions, or will of the Deity are manifested, may be reverentially regarded and inquired into, so that we may let slip no opportunity of knowing him better, and of acquiring just and worthy notions of his character and government.

The next desire in this prayer, is, that the dominion of the Messiah may prevail, and especially in our own hearts. If it is influential upon our feelings and conduct, we will know it by its fruits, piety, uprightness, sobriety, self-government, and above all, charity. If we are sincere in this desire, we will strenuously oppose every thing which tends to destroy a holy feeling, a good mood, a sense of God in our souls. Particularly we will endeavor to have this heavenly mood revived every morning, and to maintain its sacred flame undimmed during the distractions of the day. Fellow-Christians, let us strive more after this.

Our next desire, according to this form of prayer, is, that we may conform ourselves to the will of God as strictly, as devotedly, as constantly as we naturally suppose the more perfect inhabitants of heaven to do. The best security for our acquiescing in and obeying the will of God, consists in a rational and correct understanding of his objects and plan of government. To know these we can apply our minds, and so prove the sincerity of our prayer. We know from Jesus and his apostles, that the greatest object in the divine administration of human affairs, is to save men from their sins, that is, to deliver them from their imperfections and tendencies of wrong-doing, to emancipate them from their native propensities and acquired habits of evil. Knowing this, explains much of his constitution of this world, and enables us, as it were, to become the co-adjutors of God. Further researches will conduce to the same ends. To this point, then, let the real disciple of Jesus direct his desires and efforts.

The next desire of the Christian supplicant, is, not for great things, for riches, for honors, for power, after which the world hunt so ardently, but simply for the supply of our essential wants. Alas! who, in this mammon-serving age, limits his desires, his plans, and his exertions to the supply of his necessary and daily returning wants! How remote are we from complete disciples!

Our next desire is for a sense, a realization of the Divine forbearance and compassion. The proof of our sincerity in this desire, is invested in the prayer itself. It consists in endeavoring to make those who have offended against us, sensible that we possess some portion of the divine clemency and compassion. Let us, then, strive to suppress our natural disposition to retaliation of injuries, and to exhibit more and more indulgence to infirmities. Thus will there grow up in our bosoms an increasing sense of the Divine goodnees; "an ingenuous love, which mourns that it has offended; an ingenuous aversion to sin, not because sin brings punishment, but because it separates the mind from the merciful Father."

The last petition in this excellent form of prayer, is, that we avoid placing ourselves within the power of temptation, knowing our liability to fall—that we court not a conflict with the evil principle, unnecessarily or in presumptuous confidence in our power of resistence. Our sincerity here will be exhibited in restraining our imaginations from revelling in unreal bliss, and in forcing ourselves to take a calm, dispassionate consideration of the consequences of our intended actions.

Our kind, compassionate Master seems to have thought that a feeling of despondency was likely to fill the hearts of his disciples, after he had placed before them such exalted and sublime acquisitions to be prayed for, and endeavored after.—It is ready to be the first feeling, indeed, when we compare our present weakness and imperfections with the amazing heights of virtue to which we are called, and which, my young brethren, we shall assuredly obtain. Yes, let us faint not, for we shall yet be conquerors, and more than conquerors. Our progress may seem slow, but if we relax not in the vigor of our prayers and exertions, we shall gain the seemingly inaccessible powers and excellences of the sons of God. To banish despondency, and produce a hopeful perseverance, Jesus spake a parable, or rather supposed a case illustrative of the efficacy of prayer—persevering prayer.

All the remark which seems necessary to understand this supposed case, is, that it was quite customary for those performing journies, in the sultry climate of Judea, to travel at night. This explains the seeming improbability of a traveller calling upon his friends at night.

Read, then, the story and say if it is not well adapted to effect the purpose for which we have supposed it to be introduced. A friend may shut up his bowels of compassion from your wants, but yet if your request is reasonable, a sense of shame at resisting it will at length induce him to bestir himself in your behalf. If so, then how much more encouragement have ye in making your requests unto God; for his abundant, overflowing bountifulness is never shut against you, his own dear offspring, and if your requests are agreeable to his will and intentions regarding you, you are much more certain of success than if you were applying to an earthly friend, and even there you might expect to succeed through persevering importunity. If we are conscious, therefore, that we desire only such things as he has "kept in store for us," and which he is more ready to give than we are to ask for in the right way, is it possible to resist the inference which Jesus has deduced from this illustration?—"Ask and it shall be given you, seek, and ye shall find, knock, and it shall be opened unto you."*

The other illustration introduced by our Saviour, in the paragraph we are now studying, is obviously intended to effect the same purpose as the preceding. It is, however, a case more exactly in point. By the former supposition, we are petitioners to a friend; in this case we are supposed to come as children to a father. If we find our earthly parents, who are by no means free from selfishness, yet sufficiently compassionate to our wants, and ready to supply them, how much more will we find our heavenly Father, who alone is good without limits, and who himself created these wants, and implanted these desires for more excellence—how much more will we find him ready to bestow every necessary good, all that we can reasonably desire, and even to give us of that holy spirit which will make us feel communion and conscious harmony with him, which spreads a glow of heaven over all our life and actions, and in the possession of which we have all things richly to enjoy. Let us, therefore, come boldly unto the throne of the heavenly grace.

P. P.

* The above view of the connection, and dependence of the illustration upon the preceding prayer, we do not find to have struck any of the commentators within our reach. As an encouragement to the young inquirers after sacred truth, we may inform them that it was suggested to us by one not much over twenty years of age. He must, however, have made some progress in the Christian life. P. P.

From the Universalist Union.

LETTER

To the Rev. Geo. W. Montgomery, Auburn, N. Y.

Dear Brother—Your letter addressed to me through the Magazine and Advocate of February 23d, is before me. Sincerely do I thank you for the information you give relative to my friend, the Rev. Mr. Slocum. It had been long that I knew not the field of his labors, nor the manner in which he was employing his talents. Indeed, since his return from Europe, whither he went on business, as I understood, connected with the notorious Maria Monk, whose guardian he imprudently became, I have heard very little of him. But I am not surprised that he is now opposing Universalism. I suspect the society he has, for a year or two past, been in, and the employments which have engaged his attention, have by no means tended to lessen in his mind, "the difficulties of Universalism." For my own part, Universalism never seems attended with so great difficulties, as when I have been witnessing some instances of uncommon depravity; and had I not more faith in that truth of inspiration, that "where sin abounded, grace did much more abound," than Mr. Slocum has, the history of Maria Monk and her spiritual guides would well nigh lead me to doubt Universalism myself.

The seven lectures which Mr. Slocum has lately delivered in Salina, seem to be the same that he preached three years ago in this city. Probably he substituted many new, or at least different, anecdotes in the place of those which he told here.—Some reference in this matter must be had, you know, to locality. The scenes must not be laid too near. Besides, Br. Price gave friend Slocum no little trouble about many of his stories here. You know his nature. He was ungenerous enough to ask of Mr. Slocum names, places and dates; and was absurd enough to insist that the stories should be true or he would not take them for proof. If you will look over the fourth volume of the Christian Messenger, you will see how Br. Price managed the affair, and the results to which he always came. I should hardly think Salina far enough from New-York to justify the expectation that Mr. Slocum would repeat that catalogue of exploded anecdotes. I presume, however, they are no more apocryphal than the majority of those which he did relate.

I believe Mr. Slocum did me no more than justice when he said I treated him like a gentleman in the discussion which he held in this city. But when he said that I honorably acknowledged to him that I could not set aside his arguments, he was just neither to me nor himself. He was not just to me, because I never made such an acknowledgment; and he was not just to himself, because if he made such a declaration, he can on his own confession be convicted of falsehood.

There was a report in circulation soon after our debate was closed, that Mr. Slocum had convinced me of my error and satisfied me of the truth of endless misery. One version of the story, which was traced directly to Mr. Slocum himself, presented the fact thus: That he had brought forward fourteen distinct and positive proofs of endless misery, and that I acknowledged them to him to be such. On this, Br. Price wrote Mr. Slocum a letter, published in the Christian Messenger, vol. iv. p. 205, stating this report, and alleging that if it was true, my friends and the public ought to be apprised of the fact, as in that case I was practicing the grossest hypocrisy, etc., and closed by inquiring whether he had ever made such a declaration. The following is Mr. Slocum's reply, published in the Christian Messenger, vol. iv, p. 214.

"Mr. P. Price:

Sir—You wish me to inform you whether I have recently asserted, that in the lectures at the Orchard-st. church I brought forward fourteen distinct and positive proofs of endless misery, and that Mr. Sawyer had acknowledged to me that they were such? I answer, no.

But this I said to a Universalist woman, who alleged from the overflowings of her ignorance on the subject, that I produced no Scripture in proof of my doctrine—that I brought forward in a single lecture, fourteen texts of Scripture which I considered as directly asserting the doctrine of eternal punishment. She then charged me with manifesting an unchristian spirit during the discussion; to which I replied that in that she was mistaken, for Mr. Sawyer himself after the discussion was closed, publicly thanked me for the kindness of my spirit.

If the story you speak of has not been manufactured out of the above, I am at a loss to conjecture whence it originated. Yours respectfully,

J. J. Slocum."

By a reference to Br. Price's letter, to which the above is a reply, it will be seen that Mr. Slocum here virtually denies my ever making to him any acknowledgment of the kind. The former did not confine his inquiries to the specific fact embraced in the report to which he referred. He wished to know whether I had made acknowledgments to Mr. Slocum, which would subject me to the charge of hypocrisy. To this inquiry Mr. Slocum returned an emphatically negative answer. If he did not, if he included in his reply only a denial of the special report of which he speaks in his letter, then he did not answer Br. Price's inquiries, and was guilty of equivocation. If he did, as every candid mind must believe, then is he guilty of downright falsehood, if he asserts or insinuates that I acknowledged to him that I could not set aside his arguments.

Sincerely do I hope that you have been misinformed in this matter, for I am unwilling to think Mr. Slocum so unprincipled as deliberately to affirm what he knows is utterly false.

It seems that Mr. Slocum, according to his own story, not only converted me, but came well nigh converting my whole congregation also. For he tells you that the Universalist society in New-York thought so much of him as to take up a collection for him, which he refused to take, and accordingly threw it back to them. The facts are these. When Mr. Slocum was going through his own course of lectures, we did, I acknowledge, think him an honest and candid man. We knew, or at least we heard, that being a missionary, his salary was small, and it was proposed that a collection should be taken up for him on the last evening of his lectures. No objection was made to this as I now remember, for we did not wish any man to preach to us such an abominable doctrine as that of endless misery, for nothing. This you know is the general feeling and practice. If you wish to be well paid for preaching, damn your whole congregation, "with here and there" an exception. It is an infallible method. Well, just as the collection was to be taken up, Mr. Slocum stated to the congregation that he should apply the money which they should give, to the education of young men to preach the same doctrine that he had been preaching! It was enough. The boxes went round, and returned with a beggarly account of but fifteen or twenty dollars!—and this must have been the donation principally of his Limitarian friends. Numerous bank bills already in the fingers of Universalists, slipped quietly back into their pockets again, and the boxes passed on unencumbered. The truth is, the collection was proposed merely as a piece of charity and as an expression of good feeling toward Mr. Slocum personally, without the slightest reference to his opinions. When he chose to make it subserve the purposes of Presbyterianism, he betrayed his ignorance of the views and feelings of the congregation. The result showed how much he had miscalculated. He did not refuse the collection any farther than to avow his intention of giving it to the Presbyterian Education Society. He did not throw it back, for he received it, such as it was. Whether he ever gave it to that Society I can not say.

What Mr. Slocum says of his discussion in New-York being attended by a signal blessing is, I am happy to acknowledge, literally true. The audiences which listened to it throughout, were large and very attentive, and the results altogether such as you and I could wish. My society, without the loss of a single member, received large accessions at the time, and its prosperity has been continued to the present moment. Very many on that occasion heard for the first time in their lives, the word of truth, the Gospel of their salvation. It excited much inquiry, and of great numbers it might be said as it was of the Bereans of old, they searched the Scriptures daily, to see whether these thing were so. I have never heard, and have no reason to believe that a single individual was added to any Limitarian congregation in New-York or elsewhere, as the fruits of Mr. Slocum's labors in that discussion. What confirms me in this opinion is the fact that the Limitarian clergy and their people in this city, are strongly opposed to public discussions on this subject. They think them unprofitable! Discussion always has and probably always will be unprofitable to a bad cause. Truth has nothing to fear, but much to hope, while error has nothing to hope, but every thing to fear from open and free discussion.

There are two or three facts on this subject which I must be permitted to mention. Mr. Slocum himself became satisfied that his labors were not very successful. We had, in the course of the debate, often spoken of the divine benevolence in connexion with endless misery—he affirming, and I denying their co-existence. On the last evening he alluded to the subject again, for it is one, you know, not easily disposed of by a believer in endless misery, and informed the congregation that he had preached, or was about to preach, two or three lectures on it before his own society. I publicly invited him to repeat them in the Orchard-street church, stating at the same time, that it was a most important point in the subject of debate. But he peremptorily declined, alleging that he had already neglected too long, some of his parochial duties, to carry on this discussion! Had he been encouraged by "a signal blessing," I presume his very small congregation, could have dispensed with his labors for two or three evenings more!

There was another circumstance indicative of Mr. Slocum's extraordinary care for his flock.—He feared that they might be led into temptation, and seemed filled with a most romantic courage in choosing to go alone in the camp of the aliens! Whether he thought himself better armed, or more mighty in war than others, I know not, but one thing is certain, that few if any of his own congregation attended the discussion. I had heard that he desired them to stay at home, and on the last evening, I publicly asked him if the report was true. He replied, that as they had heard his lectures in their own church, it was not necessary for them to hear them again, and he did desire the Christians in his congregation to stay at home and pray for him!!

I have now, I believe, spoken of the several subjects in your letter which seem to require a notice from me, and I may well leave them for you and your friends at Salina to draw the inferences. Accept the expression of my high respect and esteem, and believe me truly, Yours in the Gospel.

Thomas J. Sawyer.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1836.

FRIENDLY LETTER.

To Rev. Messrs. Fowler and Savage, Pastors of the First and Second Presbyterian churches, and Rev. Mr. Eldridge, Pastor of the Broad-street Baptist church, all of Utica.

Reverend Sirs—With a pained heart, but I trust in a Christian spirit, I address you on the subject of your protracted meeting, held for many weeks past, in this city. I address you, brethren, in preference to addressing the person who generally officiates therein; because I can not conscientiously acknowledge him as worthy of notice, aside from the importance your support gives him in public estimation. His conduct debars me from believing him to be a gentleman and a Christian. Excuse this plainness of speech. I mean not to condemn you, but to explain why I address you. Though I regard him as utterly unworthy of the honorable position in which you have placed him; respect and charity for you, induce me to believe, that you have reasons, which justify you to your own consciences, for making him your organ. But your doing so, leaves me at liberty to consider you responsible for what he does under your countenance, aid and support. Therefore I address you.

I ask you, brethren, and I appeal, for an answer, to your understandings and consciences as Christians—as men—as fellow-sinners before God, the Judge of all the earth—do you approve of the introduction of anecdotes affecting private character, into the public services of the sanctuary? Even if they were true, is it right—is it proper—is it according to the Gospel of our common Master? And when a few individuals have thus been dragged into a sermon, and held up to public odium, is it just and reasonable to declare it as a conclusion legitimately deduced therefrom, that nearly the whole denomination with which they are classed, are precisely similar in character? Pause, brethren, I conjure you to pause, and consider well before you answer in the affirmative!

But are the anecdotes thus related by your organ, true? "Doth our Law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth?" was the just question of even the time-serving Nicodemus, under the Mosaic dispensation. The "common law" recognizes the same principle, by considering every man to be innocent until he is proved guilty. And is the Gospel of Jesus less equitable—less just—less candid? You will not pretend that it is! Where, I ask, then—where are the proofs that the individuals held up to public odium in your meeting, are guilty of the charges alleged against them? The relator of the anecdotes has not only not produced them, but he has refused, in some cases, to furnish a clue by which their truth or falsehood might be determined; and in other cases, when assured of their falsity, he has not only refused to retract his charges, but (in one case in particular) he has re-iterated them with aggravating language and manner. We have much reason, therefore, to believe that some can not be proved true—others we are prepared to show are false, whenever you desire the testimony—and others, still, were proved false, publicly, years ago. To instance a few cases of each—the story of the Universalist breaking his neck by a fall from a tree, in Denmark, was disproved in the Magazine and Advocate, vol. 3, p. 301—and the case of Br. Reese, of Buffalo, was disproved by the certificate of Rev. Mr. Tucker, of the Baptist church, same paper, vol. 7, p. 99. The only Universalist preachers ever living in Leyden, are known always to have been moral, temperate men, whose characters would not suffer by comparison even with your own. The story of Mr. Skinner's finding such a worthless congregation in Leyden, and his rough, profane refusal to preach to them, is known to be false by Mr. Skinner's own declaration, as well as its utter variance with his character and disposition. How Mr. Skinner's declaration was obtained, you will learn hereafter. The story of his preaching the funeral sermon of Varndell, the murderer and suicide, is known to be false by the fact that no funeral sermon was delivered for him—his body was given to the physicians on the spot, for dissection. The story that a member of the Universalist church in this city lay drunk for several days after communing with it, is known to be false by the absence of his name from our Church and Society constitutions; and the man himself declares, that he never belonged to, or communed with any denomination whatever—a declaration, with a defence of his character, which he wished to make in your meeting, but was basely denied the privilege!—right, I might say!

I promised to inform you how Mr. Skinner's denial of one of these tales was obtained—he being, at present, in Virginia. A copy of the very sermon against Universalism, delivered by your organ, in the second church, on the evening of March 7th, was sent us about two years ago, for publication in this paper—at which time Br. Skinner was present, and made the denial aforesaid. Excuse me, brethren, I would not impugn your taste for preaching, but Br. Skinner and myself, both, did refuse to publish that sermon, believing that it would disgrace the columns of any religious paper; and, believe me, brethren, I was grieved for your sakes, to hear that you appeared to relish and be delighted with such a wretched compound of slanderous falsehood and low slang, and that you promoted the narrator to the pulpit of the first Presbyterian church! But excuse this digression.

I have thus shown you why we believe and know that these anecdotes are false. Permit me now to ask, (in view of the principle that the Mosaic and "the common law," much more the Gospel of Jesus, condemn no one till they have heard him, or know what he doeth,) what evidence have you that our denomination is principally composed of immoral men and women? Have you any evidence? Do look around you, brethren—compare the characters of our members with yours—of our preachers with yours—and see if so great a moral difference exists, as your organ represents! Do not take those who merely profess a belief in universal salvation, unless you will also receive as yours, the depraved and mighty mass who, though not members of your churches, are nevertheless believers in endless misery. Let the measure wherewith ye mete, be applied equally to both sides, and you soon will perceive that the aspersions cast on Universalists by your agent and his satellites, are false, and cruel as false. But even if his anecdotes were true, are such exhibitions of depravity proper for the pulpit?—are they fit subjects for your smiles?—are they proofs of a Christian spirit and a love for souls?—and is their relator worthy of your encouragement and aid? You certainly would not admit it, if similar means were employed against yourselves. Suppose, for instance, I was to narrate to my congregation, the numerous cases of wickedness committed in your respective churches in this city, within the last seven years—such as murder, bigamy, adultery, fornication, forgery, fraud, theft, drunkenness, etc.—and particularize the details, and names of the actors—and name the preachers of your several churches who have committed like deeds of darkness, (including, even, if report speaks true, your agent in this meeting)—and after relating all these facts, (for they are undeniable facts,) suppose I declare that nearly all of your several denominations are such characters;—and, on the other hand, suppose I showed by good testimony (as can be done) that though our State prisons have been examined, each of them several times, yet not one Universalist was ever found there, while believers in, and even preachers of, endless wo were numerous—suppose I should state all these facts, and then assert that they proved your denominations immoral, and your doctrines false, would you admit the fairness of my reasoning, the propriety of my conduct, or that I manifested a Christian spirit of good-will and benevolence towards my erring brethren? You certainly would not—you should not. And permit me to say, further, that the Universalist congregation of this city would not permit me to repeat such an outrage on the decencies of social life, the proprieties of public worship, and the principles of justice and Christian charity. Yes, frequently as your agent and his followers have denied to us the Christian name, and even now, indignant as the congregation feels at the cruel and malignant slanders heaped upon us, they would not copy the example you have given them, in retaliation. May I not, then, presume to ask you—have you, in the matters here reviewed, done unto us, as you would be done by?—Have you acted up to your Christian profession—to the dignity of your sacred office—and according to the principles of fervent love to God and your fellow-men, in upholding and aiding your agent in the matters complained of? Surely you will not say that you dare not publicly manifest disapproval of his evil, lest his influence for good may be affected! You are Protestants, brethren, and not Jesuits—you do not advocate that "the end justifies the means"—that we may either do, or connive at evil, that good may come of it—and surely you can not fear, that truth may be injured by reproving or retracting falsehoods. May we not expect, then, that you will cause your agent fully to retract what is false, and apologise for what is wrong in his conduct—or do it yourselves—as publicly as the error was committed? I hope you will; for though I believe you have sinned in this matter, yet I hope it was done unthinkingly, and that you will yet retrace your steps. I have waited for weeks, in hope that you would see your error yourselves; and write at this late day, only in the hope of enabling you to see the pernicious effects flowing to the church and community, from your wrong examples.

A few more words, and I have done. I presume not to advise you in regard to conducting your meeting—you must judge for yourselves, whether such excitements do not lessen the Christian's relish for the ordinary means of grace—whether the preaching of a man of the mental and moral character of the one you have employed, and the matter and manner of his discourses, are calculated to reform those he abuses, to purify the hearts of those who hear his anecdotes and slanders, and fill them with love to God and man—whether indifferentists, scoffers and skeptics are not furnished with weapons to undermine the faith of many, and to ward off from their own hearts, many good feelings and serious impressions—and whether the rational man, possessing a merely traditional faith in Christianity, may not become disgusted with every thing bearing the name or semblance of religion. These things are for you to judge; and I do verily believe, that if you will candidly examine the matter, you will judge rightly, and aid in removing the "strange fire" from God's holy altar, as well as the false priest by whose hands, you, brethren, have placed it there!

Brethren, do you not really believe that Universalism is a false and dangerous doctrine? Do you not believe that you can refute it by the testimony of revelation and reason? If it is an error, you undoubtedly can. And if you can, Universalists are ready to hear you do it.—Error can benefit no one. Truth is the greatest good God has given to man. I therefore, earnestly, solemnly and respectfully offer you the use of our house and pulpit, whenever you feel inclined to occupy it in a candid, Christian spirit, for this purpose. Only give us a week's notice, and invite your congregations to attend to hear for themselves when the rejoinder may be made, and I pledge the respectful attention of our congregation. If you convince us we are wrong, you shall have our hearty renunciation of the error; if you do not convince us, we will frankly and affectionately give you and your people our reasons why. We press on you the acceptance of this invitation—or to extend to us a similar one, which we will readily accept at an early day. What say you, brethren?

Some of you are great advocates for a free discussion of temporal slavery—here is the question of an endless bondage in sin and infinite wo, to discuss—will you not enlighten us on the subject? We can not see how temporal slavery is sin, and yet the endless slavery of God's own offspring, be righteousness. We ask for light—have you got it? and will you not give us some? All of you will readily preach upon baptism, whether it shall be by immersion or not, or upon similar subjects—is the destiny of man of less importance? Surely, brethren, you will not say so! We ask not a debate, but a temperate discussion, by alternate sermons, and both sides to be heard by the same congregation, and at different times of the day, if you prefer it. And we extend this invitation to any preacher in whose talents, Christian charity and moral character you have full confidence.—But, brethren, we can not allow any other character to be our teacher in holy things. I again repeat, that this is not intended to censure you for employing your present organ to act as your representative in your own desks; but to state explicitly, that we could not, conscientiously, allow such a man to insult and abuse us in our own house, and to profane our pulpit.

I am, dear brethren, very respectfully and fraternally, your fellow servant and laborer in the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. A. B. Grosh.

Utica, March 17, 1838.

P. S.—If you would prefer addressing us in print, the columns of this paper are always open to brief, well written communications in favor of the doctrine of endless misery, or in refutation of Universalism. I invite you therefore, to bring forth your "strong reasons" in this manner, when you have leisure and we can find room for them—for the present discussion between Messrs. Campbell and Skinner, will not allow us to devote much room besides, to the subject. We have upwards of 8000 subscribers, and each copy of the paper is, on an average, read by four or five persons, thus giving your articles a circulation among from 30,000 to 40,000 readers. But, remember, brethren, you must attack Universalism as believed by Universalists—not a shadow, or a carricature of your own making—and we demand Christian courtesy and equality in treatment in our columns. These you will grant, if you really desire our welfare. And one of these invitations you will accept, if you really believe you can refute Universalism, and establish the doctrine of endless misery. Humanity, alone, not to say religion, requires it at your hands.

Affectionately yours, A. B. G.

THE SPIRIT OF RELIGION.....NO. III.

I have concluded to write two more articles under this title, and will endeavor at this time, to state what I deem some of the causes, as far as relates to individuals, of the want of spirituality and religious zeal which exists among us. And I trust that in doing this, I shall be thought neither uncharitable, censorious, nor arrogant. My object, brethren, is for good. With that idea I will go forward, and if there be any truths in these articles, any thing worthy of consideration, I hope that they will receive attention, and be acted upon—if they are of no importance, let them pass by, unheeded.

I would remark, in the first place, that I think it may be true, that many comply merely with the formalities of public worship as a thing of course, and pay no other attention to religion than this weekly observance—that they go to meeting, and let the words of the services drop upon listless ears and unmoved hearts. Now, I would ask, is religion merely a thing of form and ceremony, to be put on for one day out of seven, and neglected the other six? No! Religion should be our daily companion and counsellor. It should be the moving spring of every action, the grand impulse of our lives. We should keep it as a pure stream flowing by our dwellings, gladdening the eye, rejoicing the heart, making green the places of our abode, and brightening the foundations of our altars. We are to carry the religious principle along with us, in all the circumstances and occupations of life. No formal acts, no external ceremonials, will answer instead of purity of heart, and of the spirit of religion. We must have the spirit of our Master, or we are none of his. It is a goodly thing to come together in the great congregation. The sight of kindred worshippers, is a blessed one, and we should feel that it is not merely a ceremony which we are going through, when we assemble for the worship of our heavenly Father, and for our edification in religious things. We may come to the place of worship time after time—we may sit under the preaching of a brother possessing the eloquence of a Massillon, or the zeal and energy of a Whitfield—the prayer may ascend like a winged holiness to heaven—the music may pour out its loftiest, sweetest, and most solemn strains—and yet what good do we find there, if we feel not one spiritual throb, not one glow of the fervor of true devotion? What good do we find if the words of the service fall upon listless ears, and our hearts are like the cold marble amid it all? Brethren, the spirit of religion does not consist in merely attending public worship from Sabbath to Sabbath—in paying for the support of the Gospel—in taking sides in religion, merely from a sectarian feeling. At the springs of motive, in the deep places of the soul, we must cherish a spiritual fountain, which shall purify all our actions, and make clean and holy our hearts and our lives.

Again, it may be, that some are not individually active enough in promoting the best interests of religion. Are not many too prone to excuse themselves from the Conference meeting, the Bible class, and even from the stated worship of the Sabbath? Is not business made a plea for absence?—or, do we not think ourselves too old or too young?—or have we not some pride about the matter, which prevents us from attending upon these things? Now, if this be the case, here, at once, is a cause for lack of zeal and spirituality. If this brother uses one of these excuses, that brother may use another, and that brother another, and so on, until no Conference or Concert of praise, no Bible class, can be held, for want of numbers, and even the congregations of the Sabbath are scanty and dull. Let each individual act in the manner he deems most conducive to the best interests of religion, even if he makes a little sacrifice, and perhaps that will not be so much as he thinks it will—let him act for religion, I say, and we shall see things in a more flourishing condition around us. As to these excuses, let us test their validity by our consciences, and abide by the decision which they give. Let each one exert himself, not only to support and carry on the means for improvement in religious things already in use—but let him be active and zealous in devising and setting in operation new schemes for spiritual progress. If he strive to nourish the feeling spoken of above, he will do this—he will put his shoulder to the work, and it will not be a slight obstacle which will prevent him from attending upon, and acting in all meetings and associations, of the nature of which we have spoken. He is but one, it is true, but so is his neighboring brother—so is each of his brethren; but a society is made up of individuals—each composes a part of the machinery—all the parts, an efficient whole. Let each in his station, then, do his part, and the grand machine will work on, glorious in its operations, inexpressible in its effects!

We will conclude this part of our subject in our article next week. E. H. C.

DUELLING.

The recent murderous duel at Washington, has aroused feelings of public indignation and abhorrence throughout the length and breadth of our land, which have probably never been so fully and frankly expressed on any former similar occasion. This is as it should be. For every American citizen is interested in the temper, character and conduct of the national representatives. And in the utterance of disapprobation and loathing of those personal acts, which sink the legislator to the level of a barbarian—which degrade the dignified body of which he is an unworthy member—which outrage the better feelings of humanity, defy the principles of social order, and trample upon the laws of God, there is found one, at least, of the redeeming powers, that can deter the blood-thirsty from the repetition of this crime.

It is therefore a subject of congratulation and national pride, that the late tragical encounter has not been permitted to pass off as a matter of course, and the public sympathies to evaporate in regret that Cilley has fallen. The levity which has sometimes marked the notices of similar transactions and enormities, has given place to sober and manly deprecation. And the public mind is directed in the current of its awakened feelings, in a manner to make the duellist feel and shrink under its determinations.

Similar impressions and resolutions stirred the North, when Hamilton fell. But they never threw a ray of moral light upon the dwellings of those, educated to prize and practice legalized murder. The champion of honor—the duellist's honor—smiled with contempt upon the strong remonstrances of those who were shocked at this summary and vindictive method of adjusting even trifling disagreements between man and man.

A different state of things— a different tone of feeling, has at length grown out of our habits and institutions. In the progress of American Society, many things once thought proper or necessary, have not merely become obsolete, but would not be tolerated.—The natural assimilation of mind with mind, wrought by the influence of the same mild and humanizing system of government—aided and strengthened by the ever-growing power of religion, has sickened many hearts at the pretensions, the spirit, and the very name of the duellist. And there is reason to believe, that a few more acts of atrocious and vindictive barbarism in high places, like that which has lately stained the national character—will suffice to convince all but the insane, that life and honor are far too precious to be suspended upon a petty insult, or a madman's revenge.

S. R. S.

The above from Br. S. R. Smith, with the promise of more on the subject, is called for in this paper, as a condemnation of a highly irreligious, yet too common practice. I see that in Pennsylvania they are circulating petitions to Congress to pass a law, to render any man incapable of holding any office of honor, trust or profit under the General Government, who shall have been in any wise engaged in a duel. Let such petitions be got up every where, and such a law be passed, without the hope of pardon, and the work will be done:—Party jealousy will be enlisted to preserve the national honor and the public morals. And now is the time to do it.

Pennsylvania, in her reformed constitution, has a clause rendering all engaged in a duel, ineligible to office—a provision which I wish was in every State constitution in the Union. I am persuaded it is the only measure that will stop this murderous barbarism.—The crowded state of our columns, and the promise of Br. Smith, prevents me from saying more.

A. B. G.

REV. MR. EDDY'S LETTER.

Its unchristian spirit should not prevent any one from giving due weight to those portions wherein he notices the charges made against him by Br. Eaton. We reluctantly (for Mr. Eddy's character as well as Br. Eaton's feelings) complied with its writer's special request to omit no part of it, and therefore have printed the pitiful ridicule on Br. Eaton's unthinking omission of the g in two words—I say unthinking, for even Mr. Eddy's malice, which appears not to be very nice about its food, could find no more to sneer at in the scholarship of Br. Eaton's letter. Had Mr. Eddy's letter been printed as he put the capital letters and punctuation, a printer, at least, would have been able to detect as numerous errors in it, and as pitiful and mean a malice in us. But enough—the public will do justice to all such expedients, and to his sneers at us and ours; for the rest, Mr. Eaton is able to attend to him. A. B. G.

The Proceedings of the Conference at Pavilion have just come to hand, and will appear in our next.

Br. Bazin, transfer Rev. J. Britton's Expositor from Brownville, to Carthage, Jefferson county, and credit him $2. Credit Rev. O. Wilcox, Fowler, St. Lawrence county, $2, and send him No. 1.

Send to Rev. A. Kelsey, Pavilion, Genesee county, and credit him $2, also, credit David Owens, Utica, $2, and send Rev. D. Skinner's Expositor to Richmond, Va.

Br. Price, credit Dr. A. Spencer, Depauville, Jefferson county, vol. 3, $2 and charge G. and H. Credit R. Wooden, Chili, $2, and charge G. and H. Also, send Union to Nathaniel Flower, Athens, Pa.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. C. B. Brown at the Peat school-house in Palermo—Br. Britton in Black River village (Lockport), and in Carthage in the evening—Br. C. S. Brown in Macdonough.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in April, by Br. C. S. Brown in Upper Lisle—Br. Sias at Perch River and at Pamelia Four Corners in the evening.

Br. Sias on the evenings of March 29th, at Blanchard's Corners—30th, at Anthony's—31st, at the school-house, near Woodruff's—April 9th, at Parishville—10th, at Salina—from 11th, to 16th, as Brs. B. F. Sias and A. Clark, Elbridge, may appoint—17th, at Hannibalville—18th, at Fulton—19th, at Jenning's Corners.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

S M, Lowville, for self, W B, J B, J M and R D M—J H, Liberty, (Ills) for I N, A H D B, J H K, J W, S P, J H, E H, C D, W L and E E—S N, Buffalo—S A B, Carthage, for self, R B and A C—P M, Truxton, for A P and L B—P M, Farmingham, for J H, M P T—C C P, E S, A H S and A H—E P Jr. Chardon, (O) for H B, L G and T F—P M, South Corinth, for E B—J C B, Lasscelle, (Mich) for self, and J D—J P, Prattsburg, for self, I S and W F J C R, Richville, for J S L and G C E—P M, Lyons, for L M—Rev C S B, Pharsalia, for self, J J, M T, J H, L B G, J G, E L, T McF, I W, G B, C B, R D, J B, V W, T W C, J R, and H C—P M, Navarino, for H H and S H—P M, Otego, for W T—Rev J M A, Danvers, (Mass) for J T Jr—P M, Griswold's Mills, for D B—J H S, Chestertown, for J R, F and S and J—P M, Cedarville—E A Laurens Hill, (Ga)—T S, Medina, (O) for self, L G, H B, N W B and I B—A W, Antwerp, for S C, W McA, J L W, H F, C H, H H B B and M T—H E, Leeds—D B Jr, Milan, for L R—P M, Ames, for A I A—P M, Hitchcocksville, (Ct)—L R H, Smithport, (Pa) for A S A, C M, D B, B C, W S, F W and N B—M B, Bufalo, for I Q M, A P, and F W A.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SORROW.

ADDRESSED TO S. C. E.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

"Not so, oh time, I would be wise
In even sorrow's lore;
'Twill teach my spirit still to rise
On freer wings above the skies,
Where clouds can never soar." S. C. E.

Oh seek not sorrow's wisdom, 'tis a dark and fearful lore,
And sadly must the spirit quail ere the task be half conned o'er;
For wild and madd'ning are the spells on that dread page revealed,
And doubly blest are those to whom its mysteries are sealed!

'Tis ominous, thou gifted one, to wish to tempt that tide,
Where on the hurricane's fierce bend, the grief-tossed spirits ride;
Where wave to swelling wave succeeds, and black-winged tempests surge
The soul to blank despair's dead sea, or madness' boiling surge.

I know there are afflictions like the soft spring-morning showers,
That drench in tears the opening buds of May's sweet blooming flowers,
Yet add new beauty to the leaf—fresh vigor to the stem—
And teach the lily to outvie the monarch's proudest gem.

But there are blighting sorrows, too—dark ordeals of wo—
That canker all the spirit-chords, and chill the heart's warm glow;
That all life's pleasured pearls corrode, as the worm upon the leaf
Displaces the rich violet bloom with the sallow tinge of grief.

God speed thee, sunny sister, but tread softly on thy way,
And to escape from mis'ry's track, to thy kind Father pray;
Ask for the fresh green pastures, where the murm'ring waters roll,
And dovelike peace her banquet spreads to cheer the pilgrim soul.

And as along th' ambrosial bowers joy breathes his hallowed notes,
Till wreathing o'er the spirit-shrine love's grateful incense floats;
Thy soul shall bless th' inspiring strain, more than the sad, wild moan
Flung from the crush'd heart's quivering strings, when all hope's [illegible]

REASON.

I am told that I must deny reason? I ask, must I deny it, when it teaches me that there is a God? If so, the very foundation of religion is destroyed, and I am abandoned to utter unbelief. Again, must I deny reason when it forbids the literal interpretation of the text, which commands us to hate father, and mother, and our own lives? If so, I must rupture the most sacred ties of domestic life, and must add to social vices the crime of self-murder. Surely reason, in its teachings on these great subjects, is not to be denied, but revered and obeyed; and if revered here, where ought it to be contemned and renounced?

I am told, that we have a better guide than reason, even God's word, and that this is to be followed and the other denied. But I ask, how do I know that Christianity is God's word? Are not the evidences of this religion submitted to reason? and if this faculty be unworthy of trust, is not revelation necessarily involved in the same condemnation? The truth is, and it ought not to be disguised, that our ultimate reliance is and must be on our own reason. Faith in this power lies at the foundation of all other faith. No trust can be placed in God, if we discredit the faculty by which God is discerned.—I have another objection to the doctrine, that we must deny reason in order to follow revelation. Reason is the very faculty to which revelation is addressed, and by which alone it can be explained.—Without it we should be incapable of divine teaching, just as without the eye we should lose the happiest influences of the sun; and they who would discourage the use of reason, that we may better receive revelation, are much like those, who should bind up or pluck out the eye, that we might enjoy to the full the splendor of day.

Perhaps I shall be pointed to the many and gross errors into which reason has fallen on almost every subject, and shall be told that here are motives for distrusting and denying it. I reply, first, by asking how we detect these errors. By what power do we learn that reason so often misguides us? Is it not by reason itself? and shall we renounce it on account of its capacity of rectifying its own wrong judgments? Consider next, that on no subject has reason gone more astray, than in the interpretation of the Scriptures; so that if it is to be denied on account of its errors, we must especially debar it from the study of revelation; in other words, we must shut the word of God in despair, a consequence, which, to a Protestant, is a sufficient refutation of the doctrine from which it flows.—Channing.

AGENTS.

NEW-YORK.

Newark, D. Kenyan
New-Berlin, T. Howard
New-Berlin Centre, M. L. Wood P. M.
Newburg, J. W. Waterfield
New-Haven, T. Gridley, Esq.
New-Lisbon, E. Lull
Newville, Dr. A. Snyder
Newport, B. S. Keeler
New-York, P. Price
Nichols, G. W. Saxton
Nicholville, W. Spencer
Norfolk, T. Kingsbury, Jr.
North Adams, E. F. Sweet P M
North Boston, Perez Cobb
North Clarence, O. Mansfield P M
North Easton, L. Chapin P M
North Granville, S. Bateman
North Lansing, Dr. D. Johnson
North Norwich, Ezra Gorton
North Penfield, F Robb
Norway, N. Fosdick, Esq.
Norwich, A. Chandler Esq.
Oakland, D. Edgerly
Ogdensburg, Luke Baldwin
Olean, Dr. E. Finn
Onondaga, S. G. Anable
Onterio, J. D. Connis
Oppenheim, D. H. Phipps Jr.
Oran, C. Bartholomew
Oregon, L. Bump P M
Oswego, O. W. Ranney
Otsdawa, W. K. Cook
Otto, S. St. John P M
Oxford, H. Balcom, D. Brown, Rev. J. T. Goodrich
Paines Hollow, T. A. Paine
Palmyra, S. Birdsall
Pamelia 4 Corners, S. Cole,
Panama, Rev L. Paine
Parishville, A. Perkins P M, E. Leonard
Parma, P. Kane, Esq.
Pavilion, J. Sprague, Jr.
Paynesville, William Dodge
Penfield, D. Fosgate Esq.
Perrinton, A. Goodell P M
Perry, Rev T. P. Abell
Perryville, A. Britt
Persia, Elias Hall
Pharsalia, Rev I. B. Sharp
Philadelphia, J. H. Weeks
Pike, A. Adams
Pine Ridge, J. Newton
Pittsford, E. Beers and J. S. Birdsall
Plato, Rev P. P. Fowler
Plattsburg, P. Marshall
Poolville, Rev A. Williams
Portageville, E. D. Moses, P M
Portland, E. Harris
Potsdam, J. Parkhurst, Rev J. Wallace
Pratt's Hollow, J. F. Chamberlain
Preble, A. Crofoot
Preston, S Wait, P M
Prattsburg J. Potter
Poughkeepsie, W. H. Slater
Queensbury, S. Jenkins
Redfield, S. Drake P M
Red Creek, E. Underhill
Richmondville, J. Westover
Rochester, G. H. Roberts
Rockdale, W. Lord
Royalton Centre, Rev C. Hammond
Royalton, Rev L. Knapp
Rome, S. B. Stevens
Rossie, L. Race
Rush, L. Treadwell
Sacketts Harbor, Z. Allen P M
Salisbury, A. S. Gage
Salisbury Centre, O. Ives
Salina, J. J. Rice and Rev S. Barnes
Sandy Hill, J. Lamson
Sandy Creek, Joseph Barker
Schenectada, Rev T J. Whitcomb, E. B. Vedder
Scipio, Jesse Babcock
Scipio Centre, Rev H. Boughton
Scoby Creek, S. Daggett Esq.
Sherburne, N. Starr
Siloam, D. Dickie P. M.
Smithborough, S. Saxton
Smithville, L. M. Winslow
Smithville Flats, Eli Tarble
Smyrna, Russell Case
Sociality, E. Dutton P M
Sodus Point, W. Wickham P M
Somerville, A. Thompson
South Bainbridge, E. P. Church
South Cameron, A. Frisbe
South Chili, W. Pixley P M
South Le Roy, E. Olmstead
Southport, W. Cook
South Wales, W. C. Russell
Southville, A. Thompson
Spafford, T. B. Anderson P M
Springfield, O. N. Shipman
Springville, M. Strope
Springwater, D. Goff
Stafford, Rev. A. Kelsey
Stockbridge, A. Pratt
Stockton, Reuben Monger
Stockholm, Benjamin Holmes
Stokes, I Nisbet
Summerhill, John Saxton
Sullivan, E. Swift
Syracuse, W R. Finch
Taberg, B. Hyde P M
Theresa, G. W. Cornwall
Three Mile Bay, J. Cool
Throopsville, I S. Ashley
Tully, H Chapin
Turin, H. Ragan
Town Line, Ira Johnson
Troy, Rev L. C. Browne
Union Square, Hon. A. Skinner
Union Town, A. W. Gerret P M
Upper Lisle, Rev. C. S. Brown
Van Buren, Rev. S. Goff
Venice, J. Morgan
Victor, A. Berry
Victory, Chancy Dowd
Vernon, George Allen
Virgil, W. Lincoln
Waddington, P. T. Ingram
Walton, Rev E. E. Guild
Warsaw, J Holley, and Rev W. E Manley
Waterloo, Jason Keyes
Watertown, Rev P. Morse
Waterville, D. Bangs
Wethersfield, D. B. Green
Wethersfield Springs, J. Chandler
West Almond, Ira Baker
West Bloomfield, Dr. E. D. Wight P M
West Chazy, S. A. Goodrich
West Constable, S. Felton
Westfield A. L. Wells
West Harpersfield, J. Bristol
Westmoreland, L. Clark
West Troy, J. D Stanburgh
Williamstown, J. Potts P M
Wilna, Rev J H. Whelpley
Winfield, B. Carver P M.
Wolcott, J Landin
Worcester, S. S. Burnside P M
Wyoming, A. Paddock
Yatesville, S. Cory
York J Russ
Yorkshire, F. Kellogg.

OHIO.

Akron, Dr. E. Crosby
Ashtabula, W. Woodbury
Athens, E. C. Crippen
Bazetta, L. B. Weeks
Bennington, S. Hubbell
Boardman, A. Baldwin
Brecksville, O. Eaton
Carlisle, Rev D. Tenny
Chardon, E Paine Jr, P M, or W. Beaton
Cincinnati, E. Singer
Cleveland, W. White
Coberly, J Coberly P M
Concord, Zenas Wilson P M
Coply Centre, Josiah Arnold
Coshocton, A. McGowan
Cuyahoga Falls, B. Russel
Eden, Trumbull county, Wm. Packard P M
Eldredge, J. Wheeler
Ellsworth, L. W. Leffingwell P M
Franklin Square, C. F. Best P M
Fredricktown, W. M. Allen
Frostville, E. C. Frost P M
Fairfield, Isaac Strohm
Fowler, L. A. Viet
Ganges, J. N. Ayres, P M
Gnadenkutten, P. Vinton
Gustavus, Philo Gates
Hebron, D. Sharer
Huntington, Isaac Sage, P M
Huron, Charles Standart
Johnsonville J. L. Hosford
Johnstown, L. H. Duke, P M
Kelloggville, B. Abbott Esq.
Le Roy, B. D. Austin, P M
Lexington, S. Watson, P M
Lyme, Pelatiah Strong
McConnelsville, James L. Gage
McIntosh, A. Craig
Madison, C. Burr P M, or M Talcott
Margaretta, Calvin Smith
Martinsburg, E Farnham
Martin's Mills, J. Martin, P M
Martinsville, John E. Dalton P M
Massillon, Amasea Baily
Medina, Thomas Squier

To be continued.

Death is not sufficient to deter men who make it their glory to despise it; but if every one who fought a duel were to stand in the pillory, it would quickly lessen the number of these imaginary men of honor, and put an end to so absurd a practice.—Addison.

The Greeks paint their dead; and as they generally carry the corpse to interment uncovered, I have frequently seen them, says a modern traveller, looking much more rosy than they ever did in life.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, on the 11th inst., Mr. HENRY BRAYTON, of Litchfield, to Miss LORANA COOLIDGE, of Frankfort.

In Royalton, March 4th, by Sherman McLean, Esq., MARTIN RIDDER, to Miss MARIA NILES, both of Middleport.

In Ellington, December 3d, 1837, by Rev. J. Todd, Mr. THOMAS G. BALEY, of Maysville, to Mrs. S. WATKINS, of the former place.

In the same place, by the same, January 8th, Mr. T. P. PAULDING, of Tyrone, to Miss EMILY M. CHANDLER.

In Richland, February 7th, by Rev. Mr. Chapin, Mr. ASHBEL WHEELER, Jr., of Sandy Creek, to Miss LYDIA ANN GOFF, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Sylvan, Washtenaw county, Mich., February 8th, AARON GAGE, late of Benton, Yates county, N. Y., aged 67 years. He died as he had lived, in the full experience of that blessed faith which beholds a lapsed world reconciled to God by the mediation of Jesus Christ, the Lord of all. His funeral was attended by Br. N. Stacy, text 2 Cor. v: 1. REUBEN GAGE.

In Macdonough, January 28th, of inflammation of the brain, Mrs. HANNAH B. HARRINGTON. Sermon by Br. S. C. Brown, text, Heb. ii: 14, 15.

At the residence of his brother, David M. Moore, in Schenectada, Dr. ELISHA MOORE, of Oswego, aged 35 years. The sudden and unexpected decease of this amiable gentleman has disappointed the earthly hopes of his relatives and friends; but we trust they will submit to the will of Him who is too wise to err, and too good to cause grief except for the greater good of the sufferers. We commend the fond mother, and the affectionate brothers, (one of whom is the Rev. John Moore, of Lebanon, N. H.,) to the consolations of that Gospel which assures us that "death shall be swallowed up in victory, and tears be wiped off all faces." T. J. W.

 Union and Trumpet please copy.

In Madison, Geauga county, Ohio, November 23d, 1837, Miss LUCY CORDELIA CADY, in the 28th year of her age. This amiable and excellent young woman died of a chronic affection of the liver, which she endured with a meek and quiet spirit, and departed triumphing in the faith of God's universal grace. But two days previous to her death she requested the writer to preach her funeral discourse, and selected the text and hymns for the service. Circumstances not in my control prevented my attendance, and Rev. Mr. Lyman (Presbyterian) officiated—narrated the circumstances of her sickness and death, and preached from the text selected by her, remarking that it might be preached from again by me. Such liberal, gentlemanly and Christian conduct is worthy of imitation! B. HICKOX.

Austinburg, Ashtabula county, O.

[N. B. The great length of the above notice, has compelled me to abbreviate it, and omit the accompanying verses. A. B. G.]

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH,

Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1838. NUMBER 13.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER V.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

DOMESTIC DUTIES.

Home is woman's proper sphere and empire. It is the scene for the display of her excellences and her worthiness. Does woman desire to be useful?—where can she be more useful than at home? Would she be respected?—how more so, than in faithfully discharging her domestic duties? Would she display her accomplishments, and substantiate her claims upon the confidence and affection of man?—in what sphere can she more perfectly reveal her valuable characteristics, than at home? Would she be happy?—where can she seek the pure happiness of the heart, if it is not to be found at home? Home is the fountain of woman's enjoyments, and the common centre around which should cluster her sweetest hopes and anticipations! There she can shine and excel—there she can instruct and purify those who are within the sphere of her influence. When woman neglects home, under the promptings of ambition, to mingle, and shine, and excel, in other scenes and in other pursuits, she launches her frail bark upon a tempestuous ocean, where the dangers of shipwreck and ruin are scattered around on every hand.

Home being the natural and proper field of woman's duties, how important, how necessary, that she should become acquainted, to a good degree, with the character and demands of these duties. Under the sanctions of the marriage covenant, home is the scene over which most of the young ladies whom I address, will ere long be called to preside. This change in your circumstances, you have undoubtedly anticipated. But have you reflected deeply and seriously upon its nature?—have you meditated upon the varied responsibilities which will rest upon you, in directing the internal interests of the family circle? It is to be feared, that too many expecting soon to become wives, are sadly deficient in a knowledge of those home duties, upon a faithful discharge of which depend, in so great a degree, the enjoyments of the domestic fireside. They can twang a guitar, drum upon the piano, and glide with gracefulness through the mazes of the giddy waltz—but of what avail are these accomplishments, in discharging those important trusts which devolve upon the mistress of the household, the wife and the mother!

"There are in the United States, one hundred thousand young ladies, as Sir Ralph Abercrombie said of those of Scotland, 'the prettiest lassies in a' the world,' who neither know how to toil nor spin, who are yet clothed like the lilies of the valley—who thrum the piano, and a few of the more dainty, the harp—who walk, as the Bible says, softly, lest brisker movements might snap tapes drawn to their utmost tension—who have read romances, and some of them seen the interior of theatres—who have been admired at the examination of their high schools—who have wrought algebraic solutions on the black-board—who have shown themselves no mean proficients in the casuistry of Paley—who are, in short, the very roses of the garden, the attar of life—who yet, horresco referens, can never expect to be married; or, if married, can not expect to live without—shall I speak, or forbear?—putting their own lily hands to domestic drudgery! We go into the interior villages of our recent wooden country. The fair one sits down to clink the wires of the piano. We see the fingers displayed on the keys, which, we are sure, never prepared a dinner, or made a garment for their robustious brothers.....We need not enter in person. Imagination sees the fair, erect on her music stool, laced, and pinioned, and bishop-sleeved, and deformed with hair torn from other's scalps, and reduced to a questionable class of entomology, secundo more, dinging, as Sawney would say, at the wires, as though she could, in some way, hammer out of them music, amusement, and a husband. Look at her taper and cream-colored fingers. Is she a utilitarian? Ask the fair one, when she has beaten all the music out of the keys, 'Pretty fair one, canst talk to thy old and sick father, so as to beguile him out of the headache and rheumatism? Canst write a good and straight-forward letter of business? Thou wast a chemist, I remember, at the examination—canst compound, prepare, and afterwards boil or bake a good pudding? Canst make one of the hundred subordinate ornaments of thy fair person? In short, tell us thy use in existence, except to be contemplated as a pretty picture.' And how long will any one be amused with the view of a picture, after having surveyed it a dozen times, unless it have a mind, a heart, and we may emphatically add, the perennial value of utility?.....I have no conception of a beautiful woman, or a fine man, in whose eye, in whose port, in whose whole expression, this sentiment does not stand embodied—'I am called by my Creator to duties. I have employment on earth. My sterner but more enduring pleasures, are in discharging my duties.' Compare the sedate expression of this sentiment in the countenance of man or woman, when it is known to stand as the index of character, and the fact, with the meretricious gaudiness of a simple, good-for-nothing belle, who disdains usefulness and employment—whose empire is a ball-room, and whose subjects, dandies as silly and as useless as herself. Who of the two, has most attractions for a man of sense?.....Parents of thought, and virtue, and example, are called upon to look to this evil. Instead of training your sons to waste their time, as idle young gentlemen at large—instead of inculcating on your daughters, that the incessant tinkling of a harpsichord, or a scornful and lady-like toss of the head, or dexterity in waltzing, are the chief requisites to make their way in life; if you can find no better employment for the one, teach him the use of the grubbing-hoe, and learn the other to make up garments for your servants."*

This language is deserving of great weight. The enjoyment and prosperity of woman, and those connected with her, depend much more upon her skill in domestic affairs, than many young ladies seem to imagine. And young men of sense and discretion, view this qualification as by no means a trifling one. They will take measures to ascertain the amount of domestic knowledge possessed by ladies, before they choose them for wives. They will not select "a painted butterfly, fit only for the sunny days of prosperity," but fading into ill-tempered termagants when adversities come, unfit for any of the useful duties of life. But more wisely, they will choose her who will become a help-mate indeed—one who can smile in adversity as well as in prosperity—one who can co-operate in retaining what is already possessed, or if misfortune overtake, who can assist in regaining what has been lost. The young man who possesses the characteristics that are calculated to make the woman of his choice happy through life, so far from being captivated, is disgusted by those ladies who are

> "Bred only and completed to the taste
> Of fretful appetence—to sing—to dance—
> To dress, and to troll the tongue, and roll the eye—
> Yet empty of all good wherein consists > Woman's domestic honor and chief grace."

It requires but a slight glance into the affairs of community, to discover instances where the ignorance of the wife in domestic duties, has been one fruitful cause of involving the husband in bankruptcy. "A gay young person of nineteen, who had married a respectable tradesman, soon after she left a boarding-school, had a young friend in similar circumstances, who was lamenting their mutual ignorance, and expressing her fears that they should be unable, little as they knew of domestic management, to acquit themselves well in their new situations. 'Dear me,' was the reply, 'I do not trouble my head about that; the maids will do these things.' It is almost superfluous to record the sequel. Her husband was a bankrupt in two years! So well had the maids managed for her!" How many cases of this description are constantly occurring!

Young ladies can not expect to be placed in any circumstances in this republic, which will justify them in remaining in ignorance of domestic duties. Suppose you are wealthy, and are confident you will continue so in the marriage state, still it is very important that you should be well skilled in domestic affairs. Without this knowledge, how entirely incompetent are you to preside over the affairs of a household. The impositions, inconveniences, and vexations, under which you would labor, on account of your ignorance, can easily be conceived. I do not pretend that every wife should herself engage in all the household transactions; although industrious exercise in domestic occupations, can not fail to benefit the health. The amount and character of her labors, should be in accordance with her condition and tastes. But I insist that every wife, however affluent her circumstances, should be well versed in domestic duties—should know how they ought to be discharged! In every household there must be some head, to direct its expences and superintend the whole economy of its domestic transactions. If the wife is capable of this station, and if she is sufficiently interested in the affairs of her husband, to be zealous in the discharge of its duties, every thing will be conducted in a proper manner. She will see that there is no extravagance, no unnecessary waste, and that every thing is done in the proper time and manner. And her reward for this devotion to the interests of her family, will be, not only a saving in a pecuniary point of view, but a comfort, a satisfaction, an enjoyment, that can not be obtained in any other manner. But if the mistress of the household is ignorant of domestic affairs, or indifferent in regard to the manner in which they are discharged by others, she must trust all to domestics, who have no interest at stake. And when domestics perceive that the mistress is ignorant or regardless of the internal interests of the family, and that they are left to their own management, they are exceedingly liable to relapse into wasteful and indolent habits, and order, economy, neatness, and comfort, will flee the devoted dwelling, to make room for confusion, prodigality, sloth, bankruptcy, and wretchedness.

These remarks have been made upon the supposition that you will be surrounded by the advantages of a fortune. But are you quite sure that you will marry wealthy? Or, if so, are you fully assured that you will continue in affluent circumstances through life? The former may be considered doubtful, and the latter is doubly uncertain. How many who have entered the marriage state with fair prospects of continued wealth and prosperity, have, in a few years, and even in a few months, been reduced to poverty and want! Were this to be your fate—and it is quite probable it will be experienced by some who peruse these lines—how much your misfortune would be increased by an ignorance of domestic duties. The comfort of your husband and family depending, in a great degree, upon your domestic exertions, and yet you entirely incapable of performing even the most common and necessary operations! The husband would soon learn with sorrow, that although in affluence you might have been an agreeable companion, yet in adversity, when it became necessary for you to discharge the real duties of a wife and mother, you are most wretchedly deficient and useless.

*Western Monthly Review.

It can not be necessary to urge this subject to a greater extent. Every young lady possessing a moity of discernment, must perceive the propriety of qualifying herself to discharge, faithfully and efficiently, all the duties that will hereafter devolve upon her. Domestic economy is as strictly a branch of female education, as any other study, and the best method of acquiring knowledge upon this subject, is by actual experience! You may become familiar with the theory of housewifery, but without practice, it will be of little avail. "When you actually put your hand to the work, you will begin to learn; but unless you put your hand to it frequently, and learn to think it no dishonor to engage in any thing appertaining to the economy of a family, you can never expect to become an accomplished housekeeper."

Parents should be peculiarly attentive to this subject. The mother very much mistakes the interest of her daughters—yea, she sins against that interest, and violates the maternal obligations—in allowing them to remain in ignorance of domestic duties. She should see that they are well skilled and perfected in these matters—for until they are so, they are unprepared for the matrimonial state. She should cause her daughters to become acquainted with the kitchen and its affairs. The kitchen can be made as respectable as the parlor, and much more useful. The hum of domestic industry, is a music as proper to be made by young ladies, as that from the piano—and it is far more valuable and healthful. I can not conceive why it is not as proper, as respectable, as genteel, for the daughter to engage habitually and industriously in the domestic affairs of the household, as for the son to enter the mechanic's shop, or tend behind the counter, or engage in the study of law, medicine, or divinity. Each are but preparing themselves for the discharge of those duties which, in after life, will devolve upon them. And the parents who neglect to qualify their daughters for those affairs in which they must hereafter engage or superintend, are as deficient in duty as those who fail to give their sons useful occupations.

Let it, then, be your aim, young ladies, to become proficient and expert, by practice, in all the domestic duties of a household. You will thus profitably employ your minds, minister to the health of your bodies, and become competent of making yourselves useful, as well as agreeable, to those with whom you may hereafter be connected.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. II.

BY REV. G. MONTGOMERY.

"Those shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal." Matt. xxv: 46.

Although it can be, and is frequently shown from the thread of the Saviour's discourse, that this passage has no reference to the horrors of perpetual woe, yet there are certain other considerations, which possess great power in demonstrating that its application is strictly confined to human instead of heavenly life.

1. We derive presumptive evidence, that the word everlasting in this instance is limited in signification, from the fact, that it is, in connexion with other strong terms, applied to a subject which we are certified will end—that subject is, the kingdom and reign of Christ. In Isa. ix: 7, it is said; "of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth even forever;" (eis ton aiona). Daniel says; "his dominion is an everlasting dominion (exousia aionios), which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." vii: 14. Peter speaks of "the everlasting kingdom (ton aionion basileian) of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." 2 Epis. i: 11. And yet, this government without end, this everlasting dominion and kingdom, are to cease in the fulness of time. Hence Paul said; "then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power." 1. Cor. xv; 24. Now, if these strong expressions are thus used with limited signification, in application to a subject which we know must cease when God shall become all in all, is there any impropriety in limiting the word everlasting when applied to punishment, and in supposing that said punishment will have an end?

2. But even supposing that the primitive meaning of the word everlasting (aionios), is unlimited duration, it does not hence follow that such is its meaning in Matt. xxv: 46. It is admitted that the word is frequently used for limited time. "Everlasting covenant," Gen. xvii: 7—"everlasting hills," Gen. xlix: 26—"everlasting priesthood," Ex. xl: 15—"everlasting statute," Lev. xvi: 34—and "everlasting reproach," Jer. xxiii: 40; are all instances of such limited time, because all these things did, and in the case of hills, must cease. Now, this being the fact, why may we not believe that the phrase everlasting punishment is also limited? If the word is limited in one instance, it may also be in this. That it is thus limited, is evident from the nature of punishment. In the government of God, punishment is so fixed as to ultimately produce reformation. Hence Matt. iii: 2, denominates Christ a "refiner's fire." The fire of the refiner destroys no true metal—its office is simply to separate the gold or silver from the dross mixed with it. Human beings are the gold; sin and error are the dross; truth is the crucible; the individual who is alloyed with sin and error will be tried in this crucible; and the result will be as follows, "if any man's works shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire." 1 Cor. iii: 15. Now if this is to be the result of chastisement or punishment, it cannot be endless, no matter with what adjectives it may be connected; for correction cannot result in good, and at the same time be endless in duration.

3. Another powerful consideration in favor of limiting the word everlasting in this instance, is derived from the original word kolasin rendered punishment—kolasin aionion; everlasting punishment. One prominent meaning of kolasis is, to prune. Donnegan and Grove, in their Lexicons, so define it. We all understand what pruning is; it is to make the subject pruned more fruitful; to lop off excrescences; to take away what seems to prevent an abundance of fruit. The object of sending the sinful Jews into chastisement, punishment or moral pruning, was to separate from them the sins and errors which prevented their bringing forth the fruit of righteousness. This pruning will be effectual. "For I would not brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened unto Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.—For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all." Rom. xi: 25, 26, 32.

4. Those Jews who obeyed and received the Messiah, entered into "eternal life." This life is described by our Saviour—"this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." John xvii: 3. They were rewarded by receiving the truth, which gave them joy in the pathways of human life. On the contrary, those who rejected the Messiah, went into "everlasting punishment," called everlasting because of its long duration, the Jews having now endured it nearly eighteen centuries. We now discover the difference between these two classes—one class went onward towards another world in joy, and the blessings springing from the Gospel; the other marched forward in all the gloom and distress attendant upon their wickedness—the joy of the one was the reward of its obedience, which led it to anticipate the period when immortality should be put on; the distress of the other was the punishment of its crimes, intended to reform and fit it for holiness. And the time will come, when both classes will become one class, and receive the gift of endless joy—a gift, because finite actions cannot result in infinite joy or infinite woe. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast." Eph. ii: 8, 9. Then will all tears be wiped away, all sin will be finished, all error will be destroyed and death will be swallowed up in victory. "And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all." 1 Cor. xv: 28.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

GENESIS III: 15.

BY REV. DAVID VAN ALSTINE.

"Understandest thou what thou readest?"—PHILIP.

This question was asked, relative to the reading of the Scriptures, eighteen hundred years ago. And may not the same question be asked, with as much propriety, now? When we hear a man read the Scriptures, and hear him interpret the same in such a way that if the people were to follow his interpretations, in faith and practice, they would be confirmed in ignorance and error, might we not reasonably and rationally conclude he did not understand what he read? Would not this conclusion be a charitable one? Might we not say he needed "some man to guide him?"

All denominations of Christians read and expound the Scriptures. And all profess to have faith according to their own expositions. This is right. And modern Christians as well as ancient, can more easily discover a very small sliver in their neighbor's eye, than they can a beam or a whole tree, in their own! But, in the language of the Apostle I would say, "My brethren, these things ought not so to be." Let us therefore practice this precept—"Examine yourselves; prove your own selves, whether ye be in the faith"—that is, the faith of the Gospel—faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, as being the way, the light, and the truth. To put this precept into practice, let us read Gen. iii: 15. What saith it? "How readest thou?"—"And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel." Very well.

Now brother, how understandest thou? Dost thou understand it to say "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head?" Probably you do. For almost every body from time immemorial has so understood it. But are you right? Does the antiquity of the sentiment make it true? If not, then let us examine the text quoted above, and endeavor, if possible, to understand it. "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel." Now, what is it that is to bruise the serpent's head? Is it the seed of the woman? Does the text, or any part of it, read like this—The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head? If not; why is it so understood? In short—how can a text, so plain and so simple, be misunderstood? Instead of the text saying, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head," does it not positively declare that this work of destruction shall be done by that enmity which God put between the woman and the serpent? Read the text again, "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it (that is, this enmity) shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." Others have given it as their opinion that God declared, in this text, that "The seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head." And I now give it as my opinion, that he unequivocally declared that the serpent's head should be bruised by that enmity which he declared he would put between the seed of the serpent, and the seed of the woman.

And now, brethren, if I am wrong—if I do not understand what I read, will some one of you "guide me"? And in your endeavor to correct my views of the subject, please to inform me when, where, or how, the old serpent which is called the devil, had, or is to have so much power over the seed of the woman, (meaning Christ,) as to "bruise his heel."

By the phrase meaning Christ, I do not wish to be understood to say that the text under consideration, in any way speaks of Christ. For I do not believe it does. But the people do, when they quote for Scripture, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head."

Now, if there are any who do not clearly see through this subject, or this course of reasoning, by their request, I will endeavor to "guide" them. But as short articles are first read, if not best understood, I shall say no more on the subject at present.

My object in these remarks is, not to court controversy; but it is to know, and to have known, the truth.

Campbell, January, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

AN EXTRACT.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

There is nothing more true, than that prejudice blinds the eye, warps the judgment and bows down the spirit which God intended should be free, to a loathsome and degrading bondage.—Who can see man—talented, gifted man—pursuing a path in which error has strown her thorns—opening not his eyes for fear some less rugged and thorny way should present itself, and a thousand irresistible attractions draw him thitherward—remaining deaf to the music that would call him to the bowers of ease, and soothe his perturbed mind into tranquillity—who that has seen all this, but feels, that prejudice has a might—a power to fetter the soul?

God made us to be free. He has not said to the immortal mind—"Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." He has given it a yearning after knowledge—to know more of itself, and of Him who has written freedom on the soul of every man. Neither prejudice, nor bigotry should be allowed to crush so noble a desire—to bring the mind into their dark, abject bondage—for in its writhings it inflicts a torture upon the whole man. It does not tamely submit to the chain of its oppression—it will struggle until destroyed—and then, darkness is about the footsteps of the creature—then man feels that his light, his life, his peace is gone! Oh! I would not that prejudice should exist in my mind, to embitter my earthly existence. I would be free—free as the wild winds—free as the untamed child of nature in the depths of his own dark forest. I would be more free. I would possess freedom of mind—a soul untrammelled by ignorance or prejudice. I would walk abroad, and in nature's open volume learn of Him who is my Maker and my God! I would go on from truth to truth—from one degree of perfection in knowledge to another—until my last sands are run, and my days on earth are ended! Father, preserve thine erring child free—free from the blighting influence of prejudice! Give him INTELLECTUAL FREEDOM!

——"Give me light! that I may know the truth."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, APRIL 1, 1838.

LUKE XII: 22-34.

In perusing the Scriptural memoirs of the life, sayings, and doings of Jesus, how frequently are we reminded of his unceasing endeavors, happy facility, and excellent judgment in turning every possible occasion to some good purpose of "doctrine, reproof, correction, or instruction in righteousness"! All who desire, all who profess to be the disciples and imitators of this heavenly Guide, will readily perceive and acknowledge that they should be like him in this respect.

One, from among the crowd which usually surrounded Jesus, requested that he would interpose, with his authority as a just man and as the future judge and king of Israel, to settle a difference between his brother and himself about the equitable division of some property left by their father.—This was the occasion seized by Jesus, to disabuse the multitude of their opinions of his temporal kingship and authority, and, especially, of their cherished delusions in reference to wealth. With the first intention, he insinuated the spiritual nature of his kingdom in the question he put to the petitioner, "Who set me over you as a judge, or a divider?" As the dispute among the brothers arose, notoriously enough, perhaps, from excessive greediness on the part of one or both, Jesus does not let slip the occasion of showing the unreasonableness and futility of this covetous disposition.

Observe how our divine Teacher strikes at the very root of the evil which he would exterminate. Covetousness, or as the original word, pleonechia, may be literally rendered, the desire of possessing more, aye more, arises, manifestly, from the idea that the possessions coveted after, will be a source of happiness. This, according to the testimony of Jesus, is a mistake. He affirms that a man's happiness, and enjoyment, (in Hebrew phraseology, his life,) do not consist scarcely at all, compared with other sources, in the possession, yea the most abundant possession of the treasures of this world. Therefore, he cautions the assembled multitude against this fallacy, with some earnestness: "See to it," he says, "and guard yourselves against this unreasonable desire of more, and always more of this world's goods." (See a translation of, and a short sermon on this verse, in the 34th number of last vol. of Magazine and Advocate.) The testimony of those who have been the most successful in their exertions to get riches' and all that riches can purchase, is, generally, conformable to that of Jesus.

One of the richest men in this country, has been known to say that he was, perhaps, the most miserable man in America; for his cares and troubles in the preservation and management of his wealth, precluded all ease, tranquillity, or enjoyment. He might have been answered as was the Merchant of Venice,

> "You have too much respect upon the world;
> They lose it, that do buy it with much care."

Separate the pleasures of obtaining wealth, which, like those arising from exertion and progress in any other pursuit, are considerable, and how much enjoyment can really be derived from riches in possession? Do we not know of enjoyments, with which all those procured by means of wealth, are not worthy to be compared? If we do not, we know very little of true happiness at all; if we do, are these higher, better enjoyments, pursued with more eagerness than those of wealth? or do we servilely copy the fashion of the world?

The parable and the discourse which follow, are merely enforcements and expositions of this sentiment. In these, the following points seem worthy of some attention.

1. Observe in what consists the culpability of the rich man in the parable, and for what he was, in reality, blamed. Not for injustice, not for oppressing the poor, not for deceit in his dealings, nor for being > "The laughing-stock of devils and of men,

> The miser, who with dust inanimate
> Held wedded intercourse:—Bending o'er his heaps,
> And holding strange communion with his gold."

No; he is represented as gathering his abundance from the fertility of his lands, and as hoping to derive from the good things thus supplied, all his comfort and happiness. In viewing the abundance of his crops, he thought he had ample provision made for all his wants, and, when able to eat, drink, and regale himself, he concerned himself about no other enjoyments. This was his error; for this narrow, and unreasonable, and undignified view of man's nature and felicity, he was to blame. For this he is called "Thou thoughtless man." It will effect little good to study the case of the rich man, or to see his folly and thoughtlessness, unless we make application of the matter to ourselves—unless we take warning by his beacon-light, and steer away from the rock upon which he made shipwreck of his welfare.

2. Observe who are regarded in the same light as this thoughtless man, by our divine, unerring Teacher. All are equally thoughtless, equally unbenefited by God's noblest gift of reason, who confine their aims and their labors to providing for themselves what are commonly called the good things of this life, and neglect the pursuit of that which yields higher, purer, more serene, more satisfying, more godlike enjoyment. We refer to Matt. vi: 33, and to the 31st verse of the present chapter, for a summary indication of the true riches. We know not a more appropriate address to all who participate in the narrow views of the rich man before us, than the following—"Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, neither let the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord who exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith the Lord." (Jer. ix: 23, 24.) From this will spring love to God, from this, again, will spring love to man, and this will shew itself in efforts to improve ourselves, in kindness, gentleness, compassion, and in endeavors to promote the best interests of the human family.

3. Was it ever known, that any man ever neglected providing for all his necessary (not artificial or suppositious) wants, in consequence of true devotion, or the most strict obedience to the dictates of justice and benevolence? Or was it ever known that a sense of God's constant presence, that prayer, that kindness and doing to others as we would be done by, did ever produce any other effect than sweetening our daily tasks and toils—than rendering all our employments more engaging—than bestowing a serenity, dignity, and satisfaction altogether unknown before? Was it ever known that genuine communion with Heaven, unfitted any man for the duties or the trials of earth?—or that a victory over the selfishness or the Christ-condemned customs of the world, did ever otherwise than render the victor a more useful member of society, and bring to his own bosom an increase of strength for future conflicts? Then away with the senseless objection, that constant, every-day devotion, must be left for priests and hermits!—Away, for ever away with the feeling that religion is well enough for Sundays, but that business and toil must absorb every thought during the week.—This objection, this feeling, can have force only with those who never tried to maintain a sense of God's presence, and a corresponding good or holy mood throughout the business of the day—with those who never knew the noble and supporting consciousness of duty performed—with those who never knew the sweetness of little kindnesses where nothing is expected in return. We beseech such to make one sincere, one well-sustained effort after "the reign of God and his righteousness;" their business will be prospered, not neglected; and no evil shall ever come nigh their dwelling. God is their shepherd and they shall never be in want. Brethren, try it. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

UNIVERSALISM IN OHIO.

BY REV. GEORGE MESSINGER.

It is the design of the writer in this account of his tour in Ohio, to narrate such things as he deems interesting to the Universalist public—believing as he does, that a detailed description of log houses, log causeways, new, rough and muddy roads, streams without bridges, dense forests and extensive prairies, or even of beautiful villages, flourishing cities, a fertile country, good roads and public improvements, would not be particularly interesting. But the reader may be assured that all these things abound in this thriving State, which is fast rising in importance, and vieing with the most aspiring of her sister States.

Centreville.—This is a flourishing village, in the township of Madison, Geauga county, where our friends own one third of a union church. Here I preached three discourses, October 1st, to a full congregation. This is one of the places where Br. Ammi Bond labored very successfully for about two years, and here Br. B. Hickox, late of St. Lawrence county, New-York, labors a quarter part of the time. There are many excellent and active friends in this region. A quarterly Conference was held in this place, October 21st and 22d, which I attended, and had the pleasure of meeting Brs. Hickox and Beals, whom for the first time I heard preach. The congregation on the last day, was very large, and we had truly a joyful and refreshing season.

Braceville.—This is a pleasant and flourishing township, in Trumbull county, where there is a goodly number of respectable Universalists, but no organized society. Here reside about one hundred who are united to my family by the ties of consanguinity, and who are diverse in their religious sentiments—some being Presbyterians, some Baptists, some Methodists, some Universalists, some Campbellites, and some not belonging to any denomination. My mother-in-law has a brother residing here, who is a Universalist, and whom she had not seen for about 27 years; and whose name is Nathaniel Lane. He invited me to preach a lecture to the relatives on the occasion, and solicited them all to attend. Application was made for the Presbyterian meeting-house, but it was refused—although our uncle and his sons had paid considerable toward it. The house is new, and was built last Summer. Many of the Presbyterians themselves, disapproved of locking the house against us, the act being so manifestly unjust and illiberal. We assembled in a large school-house, where I preached a discourse from Psalms cxxxiii: 1—"How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." At the close of the meeting, it was evident that the spirit of the text had been imbibed by all; if sociability, cordial salutation and joyful countenances are proof of it. By refusing the meeting-house to us, Presbyterianism has unquestionably received a wound which it will take long to heal. We pray that God may bless its friends with better principles and more charity.

Bazetta, Trumbull county. This is a flourishing township, where I became acquainted with a number of excellent friends, and where I preached five discourses to goodly congregations.

Warren, County seat of Trumbull county.—A large town, beautifully situated. I preached one discourse in the court-house to a large congregation. I was very politely treated, but did not become acquainted with any Universalist living there. All the men with whom I conversed on religious subjects, were skeptical—rejecting the idea of a future state of existence, the inspiration of the Scriptures, and consequently the divinity of the Saviour's mission. One man rejected the idea of a Supreme Being, and contended that all things came by chance. He was the only atheist with whom I ever conversed, knowing him to be such, and he truly seemed to me a prodigy. Is it possible, thought I, that this earth, with all its appendages, together with the whole universe, came into existence by mere chance, without any Creator? Impossible!—for this would be immensely a greater miracle, than any in which Christians believe.

Shalersville, Portage county. In this beautiful township, I preached two discourses to a congregation consisting mostly of Campbellites. Esq. Doolittle, (the father of Br. N. Doolittle) who is a member of that denomination, invited me to preach to them. During the intermission, some of them asked Esq. D. of what denomination the preacher was? He answered "a Gospel preacher." This not being satisfactory, they inquired again. He did not give them a direct answer, but requested them to judge impartially, and without prejudice, or respect to name or sect, of the preaching, and if it were reasonable and scriptural, to receive it; but if not, to reject it.

Some of them, by other means, found out that I was a Universalist, and were so prejudiced against the name, that they would not attend the meeting in the afternoon. Esq. Burrows, an aged, worthy man, who had for many years been a Universalist, before he joined the Campbellites, and who still believed and advocated the doctrine, said to me most feelingly, in reference to his prejudiced brethren, "prejudice is poor bread for Christians to live upon," and, said he, "I think they ought not to complain any more about the prejudice and illiberality of other denominations, for they have now done the very thing they have so frequently condemned in others." I am satisfied by what I have learned since I have been in this State, that many who belong to the Campbellites, and believe in the final holiness and happiness of all, begin to feel that they do not enjoy true Christian liberty, and grow uneasy under restraint, for they are required to keep that sentiment in the dark; and I am also convinced, that the denomination is fast becoming as illiberal as other Limitarian sects.

Hudson, Portage county, is a very flourishing and beautiful town, and is the seat of the "Western Reserve College," which is managed by the Presbyterians, and is a strong hold of that denomination. Here I preached one discourse in the evening, in the Methodist chapel, to about 100.—There are some faithful friends in this place, who are willing to "labor and suffer reproach," for trusting "in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men." Two years ago I preached here, and was the first of our denomination who ever did. But since then a number of our preachers have delivered lectures here—yet our doctrine makes no visible advances. Still the seed sown may be in good ground, and may ultimately produce an abundant crop.

Middlebury and Akron, Portage county. A large, flourishing and highly respectable society is organized, which extends to these two villages, which are two miles apart. This society is doing more for the promotion of our cause, than any other one I have visited in this State.—Br. F. Loring, late of New-Hampshire, preaches here every Sunday to good acceptance. Yea, I rejoice to say in truth, he is very successful and highly esteemed. An elegant stone meeting-house is being built at Akron, by Dr. Crosby, a wealthy citizen, at a cost of about $5.000, for the Universalists—and when it shall have been completed, the seats are to be sold to those who shall feel disposed to buy. It is not intended to have either pews or slips in the house; but settees are to be in their stead.—Br. Loring the fore part of this Winter, was engaged in a controversy with Mr. Baldwin, the Presbyterian minister of Middlebury. Mr. B. commenced by preaching a sermon against Universalism, which Br. L. and his society heard. At the close of it, Br. L. arose and invited Mr. B. and his congregation to attend and hear him reply to it—to which Mr. B. and his friends consented. And thus they alternately attended each other's meetings, for a number of times in succession. Such commendable liberality we seldom see manifested by the Presbyterians.

Brimfield, Portage county. Here is a very excellent society of Universalists, who are building a meeting-house. Here Br. J. Whitney preaches half of the time, very acceptably. I preached here in the evening, to a very crowded congregation. Such liberal and warm-hearted friends are seldom found—their kindness is remembered with much gratitude. I here saw for the first time, Br. E. Hoag, who is successfully preaching the Gospel in various parts of Portage county. He has preached but little more than a year. There is good reason to believe that he is a valuable acquisition to our cause.

Ravenna, is the seat of justice for Portage county. Here Br. Hoag and his family reside, and here he preaches one-quarter of the time.—Skepticism prevails to a considerable extent; yet there is a goodly number of sincere believers in Universalism. I delivered one discourse in the evening to a full congregation, in this flourishing and pleasant village, and was very kindly entertained.

Wadsworth, Medina county, is a very good township. Here I delivered two discourses on two different evenings, to good congregations.—The friends here are liberal, highly influential and respectable. They expressed an anxiety to obtain regular preaching for one quarter of the time or more. They are both able and willing to give ample support to a preacher. Their generosity and liberality to me, is gratefully remembered.

Westfield, Medina county, is ten miles West of Wadsworth, and similar to it. The friends here are warm hearted, much engaged, do honor to our cause, are building a meeting-house with the Baptists, and support preaching half of the time. Br. Hull, a young preacher, labors with them.—I did not see him, but was informed that he is a young man of promising talents. Here a Presbyterian preacher by the name of Boutell, arose at the close of my discourse, and made some remarks in commendation of it, and also some which I thought were intended to militate against what I had advanced. I replied to him, and a controversy continued between us for about half an hour. I am free to acknowledge that he manifested the Christian spirit, and that his deportment was gentlemanly. Which gained the ascendancy, it becomes not me to decide.

Jackson, Wayne county, is a fine little village, situated on the turnpike between Cleveland and Columbus. Here I found a small number of most excellent and intelligent friends, for whose attention, kindness and liberality, I feel very grateful. They are willing to support preaching one-quarter of the time, and were about making arrangements for that purpose when I was there. I delivered three discourses to very full congregations. My visit to this delightful village, I shall ever consider as one of the sunny spots in my life.

Massillon, Stark county, is on the canal, and is a place of considerable commercial importance. Here are extensive manufacturing establishments, and although it is new, yet it is a large, wealthy and very flourishing place, and in a few years will probably be a city of considerable magnitude.—Here is a most excellent place to build up a good society. It is evident, that if they could obtain a preacher of their choice, the Universalists would soon build a good meeting-house, and have a large congregation. I delivered four discourses, and many hearers listened with undivided attention to the preached word. Br. T. F. King spent two Sabbaths in this place, in the fore part of September last. I was informed that his congregations were very large, and his preaching highly acceptable to the people.

Tiffin, Seneca county, is a county seat, and a very pleasant and fast growing place, although quite new. Enterprise, industry and speculation, are all perseveringly pursued. I preached four discourses in the court house, to very large and increasing congregations. Here are some friends who are much engaged, and for whose kindness and munificence I entertain the most grateful feelings. Here is a most excellent location for a preacher of our order. There is not yet any organized society in this place.

Scipio, Seneca county, is nine miles East of Tiffin, where there is a good society organized, and where I spent one Sabbath most pleasantly. Our friends here are warm-hearted, much engaged and do honor to the good cause they have espoused. The congregation was full, attentive and very respectable in appearance. Our brethren gave good evidence that they did not lack in generosity.

Orwell, Ashtabula county. Here I found Br. Barnabas Bates, an old acquaintance, whom I had known in Milford, Otsego county, N. Y.—Our meeting was joyful. His wife was reduced very low with disease, and will probably never recover. By her particular request, I delivered a discourse at the house of Br. Bates. O what joy filled the heart of this good woman, when contemplating upon her heavenly home! It was evident that the Gospel had implanted heaven in her heart, for its bliss was depicted in her countenance.

Middlebury, Knox county, is the place where Br. Truman Strong resides—who is one of our preachers! He is one of the few that retained his integrity and adherence to our cause, when a number of the preachers of our order, a few years since, apostatized and went over to the Campbellites. His persevering and well directed labor is benefitting our cause and building it up. With him and his family, I enjoyed a very interesting and pleasant interview. I preached two discourses in his neighborhood, to full congregations.—There are many Universalists in this region.

Frederick, Knox county. In this place the Universalists are building a good meeting-house, of wood. To the society, which is numerous, I delivered one discourse. I heard Br. Strong deliver two good discourses while he was with me.

There are many other places where I have preached since I have been in this State, an account of, which would be so very similar to what has already been given, that it would appear like repetition, and would not probably be interesting. I will, therefore, only mention the names of places, and some few particulars respecting them.—Lexington, Richland county. Here is a Universalist society and meeting-house. Loudonsville, same county. A few friends. Peru, Huron county. Here there is an excellent society. The Universalist ladies here have a very flourishing sewing society. Milford, Union county. Here is a society and Union house. Sullivan, Medina county. Melmore, Seneca county. Marion, county seat of Marion county. Big Island, Marion county. Lake, Wayne county. Centreburg, Knox county. Newton Falls, Trumbull county—etc. In all these places there are Universalists. I am satisfied that there is not a township in Ohio, where Universalists can not be found. I think our cause in this State, is about the same as it was in the State of New-York 15 years ago, and that but few years will roll around, before we shall have many preachers, societies and meeting-houses here, as well as there.

Springfield, Clark county, Ohio, February 13, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CONFERENCE AT PAVILION.

A general Conference of Universalists in Western New-York, was held on the 26th, and 27th of February, 1838, at Pavilion, Genesee county—Br. J. CHASE was chosen Moderator, and T. D. COOK, Clerk.

After some deliberation on the best means of advancing the cause of our Master in this quarter of his vineyard, the Council proceeded to adopt the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That we approve of the Profession of faith, Covenant and Constitution of the church in Utica, and recommend them to the favorable notice of the Universalist public.

2. Whereas the situation of our denomination seems to require a more perfect organization than now exists among us; Therefore, Resolved, That we will recommend to all our brethren and sisters, every where, to form themselves into religious associations; and farther, Resolved, That we will, so far as our influence extends, endeavor to convince others of the utility and propriety of such organization, in public and in private, and assist in the duties of such organization.

3. Resolved, That we will, as often as practicable, meet with our brethren and sisters, in domestic association, for the purpose of ascertaining what are their views and feelings on the great subject of religion, and particularly on the subject of church organization.

4. Resolved, That we will visit the different portions of our Master's heritage, and endeavor to institute, in such places, religious meetings, for the mutual improvement, and permanent increase and advancement of our Master's cause.

5. Resolved, That we will immediately enter upon the duties specified in the above resolutions, and definitely report our success at a subsequent meeting of this Conference.

6. Resolved, That Br. T. D. Cook prepare the minutes of this Conference, and request the publication of the same, in the "Magazine and Advocate," and the "Universalist Union."

Adjourned to meet in Gaines, on the second Wednesday in June next.

There were present at the Conference, thirteen ministers—viz. Job Potter, J. S. Flagler, W. E. Manley, C. Morton, T. P. Abel, A. C. Barray, D. Van Alstine, R. Tomlinson, O. Roberts, J. Chase, W. Queal, A. Kelsey, and T. D. Cook.

In the Council, there were several laymen, who seemed to take some interest in our deliberations, though less than was desirable.

There were five sermons preached on the occasion, which we trust will long be remembered by those who heard them, as embodying much useful instruction. It seemed to be the design of the speakers, to call the attention of their hearers to the vital principles of Christianity—to arouse their devotional feelings, and to incite them to activity and well-directed zeal in the cause of Christ and suffering humanity.

In our Council, harmony and good-will prevailed. All the members seemed to be convinced of the necessity of action—of decided and united action. All were in favor of a more perfect organization than now exists among us—an organization which shall tend to the prosperity of our cause, and the spiritual interests of our denomination. If the feelings of Universalists generally are similar to those manifested on this occasion, we trust—may God grant it!—that the day is not far distant, when churches will be organized in every part of our Zion, in which the dying love of our Redeemer shall be commemorated, by visible emblems of his "broken body."

To effect this desirable object, let ministers (who can conscientiously do it) call the attention of their respective congregations to this important subject. Let them speak of the probable benefits which would arise from church organization—from an administration of these Christian ordinances, which tend to improve our religious faculties and qualify us for that spiritual enjoyment, which flows from heartfelt piety and devotion.

Let us all be engaged. A cause which promises so much peace to ourselves, and to succeeding generations, as does the uncorrupted Gospel of our salvation, should be sustained. And shall we be "slothful in business," and not "fervent in spirit"? God forbid! It is our privilege, yea, our duty to be "zealously affected." Let us, therefore, gird on the whole armour of God, and go forth to fight manfully "the good fight of faith"—and the error-bound captive, emancipated from his galling chains, shall (under God,) through our exertions, exult in the liberty of the Gospel. Suffering humanity calls for united exertion on our part. The bleeding cause of Jesus calls upon us to awake, and put on our strength—the strength of Israel's God—for the defence and promotion of the truth. And we have only to obey these moving calls, in order to be enabled to say to our Zion, "Arise, and shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee."

T. D. COOK.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

"GOD IS LOVE."

While nature is constantly proclaiming the goodness of God as our all-wise Creator, revelation assures us of his everlasting love as "OUR FATHER." Love which gave and continually sustains our being—love which shall yet redeem us from the corruption and sin of earth, and fill us with its own divine fulness.

Now he who rejects the volume of inspiration, can not worship God with that deep and ardent devotion, which thrills the bosom of the believing Christian. He may praise him, for the power and wisdom made manifest in the works of the visible creation around him. The contemplation of his goodness may fill his heart with joy and gladness. At best, it can afford but momentary happiness. How quickly vanishes human life! The cold touch of death soon will be upon him, and he called to bid adieu to all the scenes of earth's gladness, and lie down in the cold and silent grave. Death! he has pronounced it an eternal sleep.—Can he praise God in such an hour, with such a belief as this? Could you, reader?

"God is love."—Blissful thought!—ever blessed truth! And then, God is unchangeable.—Love, yesterday, to-day and forever. His goodness is not limited—is not bounded by the narrow shores of time. His love is even stronger than death, and it will raise all men from its dark dominions, to the enjoyment of a new, blessed and holy existence. Will not such thoughts as these, inspire a purer, holier flame of devotion, than can possibly arise from the heart of the unbeliever? Most certainly. Though the Christian believer may delight to meditate on the works of nature—the sun, moon and stars in all their beauty and loveliness—he deems them poor, faint exhibitions of divine goodness, when compared with the new creation on high, where neither suns nor moons shed their rays, but where the Lord, even the God of love, is the light thereof.

Reader, did you ever see a Christian die?—He has no fears in that hour. Love fills his soul and he is happy. He bids a cheerful adieu to the weeping friends around him, and calmly waits the moment when his Master shall bid him come home.

> "Jesus! the vision of thy face
> Hath overpowering charms—
> Scarce shall I feel death's cold embrace,
> If Christ be in my arms."

May the Christian's death be mine! May a firm faith and trust in the almighty God of love, sustain me in life, and cause me to shout in the last moments of my earthly existence—"O death! where is thy sting!—thanks to God who giveth me the victory!"

H. R. N.

Claremont, N. H.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

INFLUENCE.

Few persons are aware of the influence they individually exert upon community. But a little observation will teach us, that we all are governed, more or less, by the conduct of others. Look within the circle of our own acquaintance—has not that man who "tarries long at his cups," been led on, step by step, by the example and influence of others. And thus it is with every vice. Let but one vicious character reside in a neighborhood, and the baneful influence will be but too soon seen. On the other hand, witness the effect which the conduct of a virtuous and upright man has. Does the tippler call for his glass in his presence? Far from that. He would rather be alone. Let such a man suddenly appear in the midst of a company of dissipated and reckless revellers, and his very presence awes them into silence. For virtue ever has, and ever will command respect, even of the most abandoned themselves.

Are Christians aware of the influence which they exert? Are they aware of the evil effects of a non-conformity to the holy precepts which they profess? In too many instances, I fear not.

Could they but realize the evil effects which their conduct has upon those who think lightly, or are indifferent upon the subject of religion, methinks they would be constrained to walk worthy of their high vocation, and be, indeed, disciples of Christ. Universalist Christian, are you aware of the Superiority of your faith, and that much is consequently expected of you? Do you not know that there are those who wait for your halting? Oh how necessary, then, that we adorn the doctrine we profess, with well ordered lives and godly conversation! A Christian life is the most powerful argument we can use in favor of the doctrine we profess. A. B. C.

Claremont, N. H.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1838.

THE SPIRIT OF RELIGION.....NO. IV.

Another cause of the want of the religious spirit among us may be in the idea which many may have, that they are well enough, resting where they are. That is, they have no desire, no longing after spiritual perfection, and put forth no energies, strive with no zeal for strength and progress. This is indeed a great and important error. If we thoroughly imbibe such an idea, we shall be chained to the world, amidst all its low and grovelling associations—without one aspiration for purity—without one struggle after holiness. The element of the soul is progress, and he enfeebles and debases it who suffers its faculties to remain indolent, or uses its powers in sordid or vicious action. Would we be virtuous, would we improve in religion, we must lift our eyes as we travel through this valley of shade, to the light that is above—we must look far on and far up to the beautiful and the good. Our spirits must ever strive and mount towards the atmosphere of life, and purity, and love. The circumstances which surround us to-day, should be the goal from which we start onward to-morrow—those of to-morrow, the starting point for the next day, and so we should leave the things which are behind, and reach forth unto the things which are before, and press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Truly, the Christian life is a race, in which every energy must be summoned up and every nerve strained to action, and as well might a competitor for the prize hope to obtain it when lingering and resting in the course, as the Christian to enjoy the spiritual blessings of religion when inactive and stationary in the Christian path. We are told, my brethren, of the delights of religion—do we experience these pleasures and feel them to be indeed richer and purer than all the joys which earth can give?—or, are we seeking for pleasure among "the beggarly elements of the world"—not one sin rebuked, not one evil passion quelled, not one grace brought out or cultivated. And will we sit down thus with shadow upon our brows, and our hearts fixed upon fleeting temporalities, when we can walk forth into the open day, and approach nearer and nearer, by every step we take, to holiness, and purity, and joys, that abide forever? Do we so illy apprehend the soul and its vast capacities, as to confine its power to the limited things of time and sense? Do we not know that the apples growing by the Dead sea, though outwardly beautiful and tempting to the view, are filled with dust and ashes? Are we contented with learning the alphabet of religion—will we not apply ourselves to comprehend the whole system? Have we stood within the porch of the temple and gazed afar off upon "the holy of holies," without ardent desires to draw closer and closer, to it? Have our hearts been touched with the love of God, and have we reared within them no altar to his praise? Brethren, if we would have spirituality, if we would have zeal among us, we must not remain inactive, we must not remain contented with our present attainments in religion. Let, then, individual piety prevail. Let every heart be a shrine of prayer, and every action an exhibition of "the beauty of holiness," and we shall not need incentives to any good work. All other causes of irreligion, coldness and indifference, can be resolved into one—the lack of individual piety. Think of the capacities of the soul, think of the pleasures of religion, think of the cause of the Gospel, think of the emptiness, the vanity of merely temporal pursuits—and all that is good, and all that is lovely, and all that is pure and holy—all that tends to make us more devotional, more zealous, more spiritually minded—"if there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think on these things." In ourselves we must begin the reformation—in our own hearts must we build up the Gospel. With "the kingdom of heaven within us," we can go forth rejoicing and strong, to the building up of the waste places of our Zion. With our own thirst quenched and our own souls refreshed, by the waters of salvation, with a zeal according to knowledge, we can invite the wanderer and the pilgrim to come and drink. And louder and louder will be shouted our triumphs, and over a wider and a wider field will wave our banners of victory, and we shall go forth armed and irresistible in the brightness of the panoply of heaven—in the power and glory of the truth!

Brethren, I am now about to draw the subject which has been presented for your attention these few weeks, to a close. It may be that it has become wearisome to you, that I have taken up too much time and space with these articles. I hope that this is not so, but if it is, I must say that I consider that I have but discharged a duty, and that articles like these are called for, and called for, too, from abler and more experienced pens than mine. To me, it seems, however, that I have not said enough—that much more should be said, and that much more forcibly should what has been said have been urged and pressed upon your attention. Brethren, practical religion is the great essential of Christianity. We may toil, we may strive, we may war merely to build up a sect—and yet, what boots it all? It is far better to have brought one stray sheep back to the Shepherd's fold—to have turned the footsteps of one prodigal homewards to his Father—to have poured light and gladness upon the path of one sin-darkened wanderer. The doctrines of men are fallible—opinions may be erroneous—but the spirit of religion, the spirit of Christianity can never be wrong, will never lead us astray. On the rock of truth would I stand—and though every device of men went down before the sweep of desolation, yet would I stand, holding the banner of Christ aloft, shouting "salvation!" over the stormy waters, and defying every billow that dashed and foamed against its adamantine foundations!

Brethren, let practical religion be the object for which we strive—the principle acting within us. Let the possession of love to God, and love to men, be our aim And when we practice according to the Gospel, we shall see no decline, no coldness among us. We shall see temples on every side, and crowds of worshipers thronging through their portals. "Salvation!" "Salvation!" will burst from every lip, and joy, and gladness, and songs of praises will be felt and heard through out all the extent of this broad and goodly land.

And permit me in closing, to say, that I think it needs no prophet's tongue to tell, that when this spirit attains among all Christians, the authority of creeds and the domination of sectarism, will be broken and thrust by. There may never be a perfect agreement of opinion, but there will be mildness, tolerance, and love. While the stake of the martyr, and the prisoner's chains, will be looked upon as wonders in the history of man—also all religious persecution will be remembered as a thing of horror. Then will the Gentiles come in—then will unbelievers turn to the truth, and all men will see a loveliness in the Gospel. Then will the time of its triumph have arrived, and the shouts of regenerated nations, will go up like the voice of many waters, and the voice of mighty thunderings—"Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" E. H. C.

A PLAN TO REVIVE SOCIETIES.

After conversing with several lay and ministering brethren on the subject, I am induced to submit the following plan to the general consideration of our brethren, preparatory to any action upon it in our associated bodies.

It is well known that, within several years past, societies of Universalists have been formed in various places, which, after a time, ceased to have preaching, and finally ceased to represent themselves in their several associations, or even to be known as having existed, except in old files of our periodicals. They have thus remained until the present time—unknown, if not unknowing. It is believed that, in many cases, where two societies existed, there are yet materials enough left to form one good society, could but those persons become acquainted with each other, and their "first love" be revived within them. In other cases, the dormant society, even, is strong enough to be a good, large society, could the members, by any means, be awaked to their duty and interests. At all events, information of their condition and numbers—their wishes and ability in regard to sustaining stated or occasional preaching—is very desirable to the yet surviving members of their respective associations. And this information can be obtained by some plan like the following, which I will propose in substance, to the Central Association, at its next session, for its adoption. Brethren in other Associations, who agree with me in opinion and feeling, will, I think, render a service to the cause of God's impartial grace, by bringing up a similar plan for adoption in their respective associations.

1. That a committee of three or five brethren be appointed, with power to raise the necessary funds, and to employ one or more preachers to visit every society in the bounds of the Association that has not stated preaching, and to preach to them a Sunday, inquire into their condition, location, numbers, their desire for stated or occasional preaching—ability and convenience for having the same, and such other matters as the Committee may deem it useful to know—to advise with, and instruct them in such measures as may seem to be required for their prosperity and well-being—and to report the whole to the Chairman of the Committee, at the earliest day.

2. That a collection be taken up in the forenoon of the last day of the Association, to raise the necessary funds, (where the collection in the afternoon is needed to defray the expences of the visiting ministering brethren from beyond the bounds of the Association,) and also, that collections be taken up by these destitute societies, at the close of their services, and that all be paid over to the Chairman of the Committee, for the purpose of carrying the measure into effect.

3. That after this visitation has been performed, and the results made known to the Chairman of the Committee, he shall call a meeting of the Committee, to consult thereon, and see if some plan may not be devised by which those societies desiring preaching, may be revived—whether two or more feeble societies in the same vicinity, may not be united into one, by making known to all the condition of each one of them; and in all such cases, let the Committee again engage one or more preachers to visit each such society, preach with them another Sunday, (taking up a collection,) and communicate to them the views of the Committee, etc. After which he shall pay over, and report to the Chairman, as before.

4. If on the second visit, he finds that a union of two or more societies can be effected—or the society be revived alone—let a day be appointed for doing it, and suitable measures be taken—and after it is done, let the fact, together with the condition, wishes, and prospects of the society be reported to the Chairman of the Committee, as before.

5. Let the Committee make a detailed report of all their proceedings to the next Association, and another collection be taken up, (if necessary,) to defray all the expences they have incurred in the performance of their duties, and to compensate them for the day spent at the meeting of the Committee, aforenamed.

In this way, at least much valuable and necessary information will be obtained by the Associafion and these societies—the preacher acting as an officer of the committee, will feel less delicacy, and be able to do more in the way of instructing the society, gathering information from them, and taking up the collection to defray the expences of the Committee—and, I do believe, that these dormant societies, by finding themselves thus cared for, and with the aid of the information they will receive by these means, will, in many cases, be encouraged to "arise, and shine," believing that the day is at hand, and the night is nearly over and gone. At all events, it can do no harm—the expence is but trifling—and the prospect of some good is great. If, however, any brother can devise a better or more feasible plan to remedy the lethargy that has crept over many of our friends, no one will be more ready to drop this plan, and adopt that, than A. B. G.

DUELLING.

It is no longer pretended, or supposed, that duelling is in any respect compatible with Christianity. And it is equally inconsistent with civilization, and mental and social refinement. With those claiming the highest place, in a highly cultivated community, and in a Christian land, both these considerations should have their full share of influence. But as the duellist can scarcely be supposed to respect the institutions of religion, it is more probable, that the discovery that his principles are not even the mask of refinement, will correct his practice—lest he should be thought vulgar, or even superstitious.

The origin of single combat, or duelling, is found in the superstitions of some ancient nations; who in order to detect the criminal in certain dubious cases, resorted to various expedients—long since exploded by all enlightened jurists. One of these extraordinary methods, was to cast the accuser and the accused into water—when he who sank was considered innocent, as it was presumed that nothing but diabolical agency, and of course guilt, could sustain him at the surface. This was a favorite method of trying witches, in the times and places where witches were.

Another process, was plunging the arm into boiling water, or oil—the evidence of guilt being supposed to consist in the fact of burning, or rather scalding the part immersed. Walking barefooted among red-hot ploughshares, or through burning coals, constituted other modifications of this singular system But unfortunately these various experiments appear rather to have tested the skill and address of the parties, in devising and applying expedients for evading or neutralizing all probable consequences; rather than means of detecting the guilty, or discovering the innocent.

The trial by single combat, is an appendage of the same system; and was instituted for the same purposes. It differed from modern duelling in nothing, save that it was not always directly sought by the parties—was imposed by authority, and decided in the most public manner.

As superstition encroached upon Christianity, and almost entirely assumed its place—when human justice was often compromised by the preponderance of lawless power, and merely secular tribunals were the sport of the most corrupting influences—when the church furnished the only hope of protection for the oppressed, and when its determinations were final; in its weakness, it adopted and too frequently enforced all the methods of trial here enumerated. The parties, usually after several days fasting, partook of the eucharist, or Lord's supper, and then under the eye of the prescribed judges proceeded to the trial. When the nature of the form consistently admitted, the cathedral or church was the place—but in other cases, the open field was the theatre of these revolting conflicts. They were denominated "trial by the judgment of God,"—might be claimed as a right, or imposed by the authority of the church.

So long as the public mind was in a situation to sustain any of these usages, with a view to ascertain the right, or approve the innocence of an individual, there is at least an apology for their existence and observance, however painful and revolting the superstition in which they were founded. But when more enlarged and correct views expunged them from the catalogue of equitable and Christian institutions; and when certainly none of the original reasons for resorting to their use can exist in a Christian or civilized community, it is surprising that the most abhorrent in all its bearings should still be retained.

We certainly would excuse the church from all other interference in the matter of duels, except that of protesting long and loud against them,—and using every argument, and every rational inducement to convince the world of their degrading and demoralizing character. But so long as we must have them—so long as angry man must be appeased with blood, let the practice of stealing from the public eye, and perpetrating the fatal deed while reason is dethroned by passion, be authoritatively and effectually prevented. Let the parties have time to cool—time for deliberate and sober reflection—time to think of their families, their friends—of the duties they owe to these, to their country, to the dignity of human nature, to the laws of society and of God. And if in view of all these considerations they must appeal to mortal combat—then bring them forth as gladiators to be gazed upon in mockery, or to feel the execrations which are uttered around a gibbet.

Let these things be done, and duelling will soon become matter of mere history.—But we may look in vain for so desirable a result, while the honorable approve, while fashion sanctions, and while even ladies can smile upon this national sin—this moral abomination.

S. T. S.

"THE PRO AND CON OF UNIVERSALISM,

Both as to its doctrines and moral bearings, in a series of original articles. By GEORGE ROGERS. In three volumes."

This is the singular but correct title of a duodecimo work, now being published in Cincinnati, Ohio, by its author—four numbers of which have already been issued, each containing 24 pages. The whole work will be completed in two series of 16 numbers each, making three volumes of 256 pages each, at one dollar for each series, or two dollars for the entire work. To complete the details relating to a bargain, I would say, that the work is handsomely printed with good type and on fair paper; so that when completed, and neatly bound, it will form a very handsome addition to a library. It is intended to issue it semi-monthly; but the "hard times" have caused some delays. Now for the matter of the work.

First we have "Alice Sherwood," a most interesting tale—located in the beautiful valley of Shesheq—ah—stop!—"Universalia," on the banks of "the beautiful daughter of the Otsego lake"—the Susquehanna. The characters, we are told, are all real personages—some of whom I could not but recognize—as are also the events. The meeting of the Susquehanna Association is described—but let every one read for himself, that can procure the work. Then follows the "argument" in favor of Universalism, "from the attributes of God," "thoughts on the law of God," and the "argument from the relations of God to man." Thus far, the numbers received. After various other sound and well discussed arguments, interesting tales, and anecdotes of actual occurrence, we are promised the author's travels in some fourteen or sixteen States and Territories of the Union, and a Memoir of his life—all of which can not fail to be highly interesting to the reader. For not only has Br. Rogers' life and ministry been singularly eventful, but he has a very happy knack in relating his adventures—a quaint humorous style in relating its annoyances and disagreeable occurrences, and a felicitous mode of making every thing shed light on the bearings of the great doctrine of universal grace, or of Partialism, as the case may be. As there is an anxiety to get rid of foreign small bills, I would advise all who can afford it, to hunt up a good bank note, (and Ohio money is surely current in Cincinnati,) and send it on to Br. Rogers. Even if it was as good as old gold, they will get the full value of their money in return.

Subscriptions will be received at this office.

☞Br. Rogers—Send the Pro and Con to Porteus Morgan, Remsen, Oneida county; Avery M. Backus, West Winfield, Herkimer county; Rev. W. M. Delong, Lebanon, Madison county; Torry Luce, Hartwick, Otsego county, New-York; and Lysander Gilmore, Jamestown, Grant county, Wisconsin Territory, and charge Grosh and Hutchinson $1 for each. Also, send to Jesse Richards, Binghampton, Broome county, N. Y. Some of the above names have been forwarded before, but lest you did not see the notice, we send them again. A. B. G.

A SCATTERING SUBSCRIBER.

The Postmaster at Quincy, Ills. writes us that Earl Pierce, formerly of that place, who owes us $5., has run away. Should any of our agents learn his stopping place will they please take measures to collect the amount?

Br. Holmes of Silver Creek is informed that the remittance has not been received.

Br. Bazin—Send Expositor to Richard W. Gorton, Sherburne, and Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Oxford, both of Chenango county, N. Y. Credit the latter $2 and charge G. and H.

Br. Tompkins—Send Repository to Mrs. Rudd, Champion South Road, Jefferson county, and charge G. and H.

Also, credit R. E. Roberts, Detroit Mich., $2 and charge G. and H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the 1st Sunday in April, by Br. C. B. BROWN, at the Court-house in Pulaski.

There will be preaching on the 2d Sunday, by Br. HAYWARD, at Hallsville—Br. C. B. BROWN, at Binghampton—Br. WAGGONER, at Salisbury Centre, at Esq. Snell's, in the evening—Br. C. B. BROWN, at Onondaga South Hollow, and on the 2d Sunday in each month, during the year.

Br. E. E. GUILD will preach at Harpersfield, on Sunday, April 8, at 11, A. M., and in the Stone Schoolhouse, between Hobart and Harpersfield, in the evening—at the School-house near Stoddard Stephens,' in Harpersfield, on Wednesday evening, 11th—at the Southern Church, in South Worcester, on Sunday, 15th, at 11 o'clock—at the School-house near Peter Hanson's, in Meredith, on Friday evening, 20th—at Colliersville, on Sunday, 22d, at 11 o'clock—at Jacksonborough, on Sunday, 29th, at 10 o'clock—and at the Academy in Worcester, at 3 o'clock—and at Richmondville, on Sunday, May 6, at 11 o'clock.

☞Union please copy.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

Rev C B B, Mexico, for M C, J C W, J C, G A P, A C, J F C, S D, R B, P D and J R—P M, South America, for E B and H H—T G, Connaught, (O) for self and E F.—E F, Martinsburg, (O) for self and others—C T C, Madison, for self and S C—P M, Pleasant Vale, (Ills)—P M, Adams, (Mass) for S E D, J A B and I S—T W, Mt Pleasant, (Pa) for self, B W, J S and E C—P M, Leyden, for A J and Rev J A A—P M, Knox for E S—J U P, Whiteford, (O) for self, B J, L B L, A M and S P—P M, Clockville, for H S and G W—P M, Hammond, for J B and L L.—P M, Clarendon, for J S, J O and W H—W H T, Jamestown, for self, R P, J P and W H P—P M, Knowlesville, for W O T, T B, W P, A S and P D—P M, Salisbury, for Z M T—Rev W A, Wolcott for S M Jr, E H, A D, B M U, E T, A W, D C, J B and M L—P M, Burlington, (Vt) for R F S, P H and O H S—J B, Cortland, for J R W, G K E R C M R—P M, Harrisonville, (Ills) for S S and J H—P M, Montrose, (Pa) for D S and S M S—P M, Danube, for H M—J A, Copley Centre, (O) for self, C O, D D C, A G S and E T—P M, Burtonville, for D C C—P M, Pharsalia, for T H—P M, Kingsbury, for E S—P M, Bombay, for self, W W W and B R—Rev J G B, Ghelmsford, (Mass for self and M D B—P M, Coshocton, (O) for A McG, F B, R R and J R—P M, Little Meadows, (Pa)—R E R, Detroit—J L L, Yates—P M, Cazenovia, for J S—J S C, Sardinia, for self, Z W F and F H—P M, Cooperstown, for A T—P M, Sodus Point, for self and D McI—A S G, Salisbury, for A P, G W A, L B and H B—J R, York, for R S, L L, J K, E C, A C, A R, D H, J M, J H and H M—R R W, Monroeville, (O) for J U and D U—Rev E E G, Walton, for self and K M—P M, Wadsworth, (O) for J P and A V—Z C, Wethersfield Springs for self, D W, A F and D B G—S M, Lowville, for C L and W D.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

WINTER AND DEATH.

BY MRS Z. PORTER.

From death, "the great teacher," that monarch uncouth,
What solemn instructions are given!
Of him I'll take lessons in wisdom and truth,
And bow to my Father in heaven.

When Winter's drear curtains encompass with gloom
The scen'ry of nature around—
My spirit would turn to the cold, dusky tomb,
Where silence its dwellers surrounds.

When wild winds come sighing and moaning along,
And nature seems mourning her dead—
When reft are the forests of verdure and song,
And all their rich beauties are fled.—

My spirit would visit the moss-covered stone,
The mound, and the hallowed bed,
The asylum of sorrow—there, silent and lone,
Retire and converse with the dead.

When spirits seem whispering low in the blast,
Remembrances throng to the heart—
Sad records come borne on the wings of the past,
And dark are the truths they impart.

I turn where in durance the subjects of hope,
Are bound till the bright morn shall come,
When the voice of their Saviour, their prison shall ope,
And summons his ransom'd ones home.

O land of forgetfulness! land of repose,
Where beggars and kings are allied!—
Neither honor, nor fame, nor distinction it knows—
Vain boaster, where now is thy pride?

Henderson, 1838.

EXCITEMENTS IN RELIGION.

Christian brethren, we hear much, in these days, about excitement. Why, every prayer—of a Christian at once perfectly rational, and perfectly devoted—every prayer is an excitement; and every religious service, every sermon, is an excitement as great as he can well bear; and every day's toil of virtue, and contemplation of piety, is a great and glorious excitement. Excitements! Is a man never to be moved by his religion but when some flood of emotion is sweeping through society—when agitation and disorder and confusion are on every side of him? Is it only when the tenor of quiet life, the pursuits of industry, the pleasures of relaxation, are all broken up, that he is to feel the power of religion? I do not say that this is any body's theory; but if this is the fact which results from any form of religious teaching, then I ask, for what end was the whole tenor of life—for what end was the pursuits of industry and the pleasures of society ordained? For what was the whole trial of life—so exquisitely moral, so powerfully spiritual—for what was it appointed, if the seasons for obtaining religious impressions are to be ordered by human interference, that they come only in idleness, disorder, and a derangement of the whole system of life? Excitements in religion! Are they to be things occasional, and separated by the distance of years? Is a man to be excited about religion, only in a certain month, or in the Winter; and when that month, or that Winter is past—yes, when all nature is bursting into life, and beauty, and songs of praise—is the religious feeling of the people to be declining into worse than wintry coldness and death? Is this religion?—the religion whose path shineth brighter and brighter to the perfect day?

Let us have excitemets in religion—but then let them be such as may be daily renewed, as never need to die away. Any excitement in society that can bear this character, I would heartily go along with. The Christian religion, I am sure, was designed powerfully to excite us; nothing on earth so much—nothing in heaven more. It was designed to arouse our whole nature, to enrapture our whole affection, to kindle in us a flame of devotion, to transport with the hope and foretaste of heaven. But its excitements, if they be like those that appeared in the great Teacher, are to be deep, sober, strong, and habitual. Such excitements may God ever grant us; not periodical but perpetual; not transient but enduring; not for times and seasons only, but for life; not for life only, but for eternity!—Dewey.

Sin is never at a stay; if we do not retract from it, we shall advance in it; and the further on we go, the more we have to come back.—Barrow.

No man will take counsel, but every man will take money; therefore money is better than counsel.—Swift.

AGENTS.

OHIO.

Mentor, Rev J. Bradley
Middlebury, R. Clark, P M
Middlefield, H. L. Bishop Esq
Mounroeville, R. R. Webber
Mt. Gilead, S. Emery
New-Haven, J. Sweete
New-London, T. Case, P M
Newport, S. H. Harvey
Norwalk, A. Brownell
Oberlin, Rev S. Huil
Ohio City, Col. W. Allen, and Rev J. Whitney
Old Hickory, Jason Jones
Painesville, Ransom Curtis
Perrysburg, Rev L. L. Sadler
Peru, Comfort Eaton, or M. Pond
Portage, James Birdsall
Rome, S. Rogers, P M.
Richmond, Landon Smith
Royalton, J. Raymond
Rutland, Charles Rickerson
Salem, O. F. Francis
Sanbury, Rev A. A. Davis
Saybrook, Rev A. Bond
Scipio, Dr Rufus Cowles
Sutherland, Isaac Johnson
Springfield, L Bancroft
Steuben, Lyman Babcock
Toledo, Leander Hilt
Wadsworth, J. Pardee, P M
Warren, J. Rawdon
Willoughby, J. M. Henderson, P M
Windsor, M. McIntosh
Worthington, Chauncey Cook
Zanesville, J. Dare, Esq

MICHIGAN.

Adrian, Rev A. H. Curtis and J. S. Comstock
Ann Arbor, Rev N. Stucy, Capt. C. Carter and E. Higby
Andover, Dr A. Beach
Armada, D. Sessions
Auburn, M. Hubbell
Battle Creek, S. McCamely, P M
Bassfield, I. Randall, N. Torry
Bloomfield, F. Patrick, Rev E. Gage
Booton, J. H. Murray, P M
Borodino, R. Root, P M
Brooklyn, A. D. Lamatter
Clinton, Dr T. C. Adam
Cold Water, Selleck Seymour
Columbia Lake, A. Pouchu, P M
Commerce, C. H. Paddock
Cranbrook, E. T. Chester
Detroit, R. E Roberts
Dixboro', J. Gale, or S. H. Hazzard
Flowerfield, E. S. Wheeler, P M
Goodwinville, J. E. Day
Grand Rapids, Dr S. Wilson
Grass Lake, D. Walker, P M
Green Oak, C. Carter
Jacksonopolis, P. B. King
Jonesville W. Bacon
Lapeer, R. Bronson
Ledi, O. Howe, P M
Marian, Daniel Persons
Marshall, H. I. Phelps
Mineral Point, A. W. Comfort
Nankin, J. Mason
Niles, Chauncey C. Britt
Northville, S. Hungerford
Otsego, E. Sherwood
Ore Creek, John Henry
Pleasant, Valley, F. W. Goodenow
Plymouth, J. D. Davis, P M
Pontiac, B. Mercer
Ray, D. Sessions
Romulus, D. Curtis
Saginaw, Arden Moses
St. Josephs, G. W. Brittian
Spring Arbor, A. Williams
Summerfield, A. Hooker, P M
Sweetland, J. E Howard, P M
Tecumseh, S. Barnard
Tipton, B Knight
Troy, L. Cone
Unadilla, U Coulson
Utica, Dr H. R. Shetterly
Wheatland, Elias Branch
Whiteford, J. U. Pease
Whitmanville, Rev J. Gage
Ypsilanti, W. Wilson

ILLINOIS.

Atlas, George K. Watson
Aurora, J. L. Adams
Belvedier, Joseph Kerr
Bloomfield, J. Van Fleet
Chamblee, Mancel Talcott, P M
Chicago, N. H. Bolles
Clear Lake, B. Barney, P M
Clio, John Bushnell
Commerce, N. Derthick
Dixon's Ferry, J. Whipple
Dupage, Jonathan Roice
Hennepen, B. Brewer
Henderson, J. P. Fuller
Highland, J. H. Goodwin, P M
Holderman's Grove, T. Howe
Jacksonsville. F. Grimsley
Juliet, N. H. Cutter
Liberty, J. Hunsaker
Lower Alton, S. W. Robbins
Magnolia, David Myers
Marsailles A. D. Butterfield
Meredoria, C. Eble
Middle Grove, E. Rose, P M
Naperville, W. W. Dean and A. H. Howard, P M
Oquaka, Rev A. R. Gardner
Ottawa, A D. Butterfield
Pleasant Vale, J. Jackson, P M
Peoria, D. Stillman
Quincy, John P. Robbins
Roscoe, Clark Bliss
Stevenson, W Carr
Sangamon, F. Darrell
Table Grove, J. Harris
Vermillionville, W. R. Coon

INDIANA.

Allensville, Dr P. S. Sage
Columbo, Z. French
Fort Wayne, I. Slater
Greenville, D P. Porter, P M
Home, J. Larimore
Leavenworth, Rev E. B. Mann
Laporte, J S. Chapman
Lima, J C. Kinney
Madison, N Lodge
New-Harmony, O. D. Chaffee
Valparaiso, W C. Talcott
West Point, W. M. Porter.

MISSOURI.

Boonville, B. F. Hikcox

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Buckshead, A. Feaster
Double Branches, Rev A. Fuller
Lexington, Dr J. H. Souter

VIRGINIA

Carlton's Store, J Bagsley
Elizabethtown, Rev. E. R Crocker
Grave Creek, W. Baldwin
Kanawha, G. H. Patrick
Matthews, C. H., E. Barnum
Norfolk, M. Bonny
Richmond, M. L. Cary

KENTUCKY.

Louisville, G. Chapin
Flat Rock, J. Wilson
Simpsonville, W. Welch

NEW-HAMPSHIRE.

Claremont, H. R. Nye
North Wolfeboro', J F. Desmasea
Portsmouth, Rev M. Ballou
South Lyndeboro,' Rev. C. S. Hussey
Washington, Rev S. Laws
Westmoreland, T. Skinner

PENNSYLVANIA.

Athens, Z. Flower
Beaver, Ovid Pinney
Bethany, A. Swart
Brooklyn, Col. F. Baily, Rev T. S. Bartholemew
Coffee Creek, S. Dutton, Esq
Cussewaga, R. Temple
East Hempfield, Rev J. Myers
Erie, R. Cochran, P M
Friendsville, C. Leet, P M
Great Bend, S. Hatch
Hamlinton, E. H. Webster
Harmonsburg, B. Skiff
Harbor Creek, John Dodge
Hollidaysburg, J. G. Comstock
Knoxville, A. Knox
Little Meadow, D Barney, P M
Marietta, Hon. J. Grosh
Meadville, J. Hastings
Mead's Creek, George Patchan
Montrose, S. Gregory
Mt. Pleasant, T. Wheeler
New Milford, B. H. Foot
North East, S. Averil
Northville, H. Baker
Oil Creek, H. Goodrich
Penn Line, L. Wright
Philadelphia, Revs A. C. Thomas, S. W. Fuller
Pittsburg, Davis and Chappel
Prompton, E. Jenkins, P M, Rev S. P. Landers
Reading, Rev J. Perry
Shoshequin, J. Kingsbury, P M
Smithport, W. Smith
Sugar Creek, S. Crouch
Sullivan, A. D. Fortes
Williamsville, E. M. Howard

To be Continued

MARRIAGES.

March 1st, by Rev. C. S. Brown, Mr. Daniel M. Covey, to Miss Marantha Baker, both of Triangle. Also; Mr. John Houghtailing, to Miss Sarah Juliette Covey.

In Frankfort, on the 22d inst., by Rev. Mr. Rogers, Mr. Amos H. Thomas, to Miss Mary A. Gates, both of this city.

In Fort Plain, January 24th, by Rev. H. Lyon, Mr. James C. Adams, to Miss Mary Ann Fox, all of Fort Plain.

In Palatine, March 7th, by the same, Mr. Reuben W. Sanborn to Miss Maria Pealer, both of Palatine.

At Ford'sbush, March 15th, by the same, Mr. Jacob Bush, of Minden, to Miss Angeline Davis, of the former place.

In Canton, by L. Buck, Esq., Mr. Ambrose Wilson, to Miss Julia Hill, both of that place.

In Harford, January 31st, by Rev. S. Barnes, Mr. Oren Ellis, of Bath, to Miss Sarah Bowley, of Dryden.

In Onondaga, March 11th, by the same, Mr. James Louw, of Locke, to Miss Elizabeth Rowland, of the former place.

In Boylston, March 12th, by Rev. W. Sias, Mr. Hosea Ballou, to Miss Mary Ethridge, both of Bolyston.

March 2d, by the same, Mr. Seth West, of Smithville, to Miss Elizabeth Houghtailing, of Greene.

January 15th, by Rev. W. M. Delong, Mr. Murville C. Shapley, to Mis Jane Simmons, all of Lebanon.

January 1st, by T. Wheeler, Esq., Mr. Albert J. Barrows, to Miss Christiana Simpson, both of Preston, Wayne county, Pa.

February 11th, by the same, Mr. Peter S. Foster, of Carbondale, Luzerne county, to Miss Catharine Armeter, of Mount Pleasant, Wayne county, Pa.

DEATHS.

In Fulton, Oswego county, on the 5th inst., Mrs. Abagail, consort of Capt. Eber Hubbard, aged 58 years.

Although Mrs. H. never made a public profession of religion, by attaching herself to any Christian Church; she enjoyed the hopes of the Gospel. Her life was one of unexampled mildness and benevolence. She was an affectionate wife, tender mother, and kind neighbor. She bore the pains and privations of a protracted illness with almost unparalelled fortitude; and when death apparently drew near, she not only submitted with resignation, but even desired the hour of dissolution to come. The sympathies of numerous friends, and the consolations of the Gospel, were tendered on the 6th, to the few mourners that reside in this section of the country.

Editors in Vermont and New-Hampshire, will please copy the above.

In Winfield, very suddenly, on March 5th, Eliza, daughter of Avery and Phebe Backus, aged 5 years.—Funeral on the 7th—sermon by the writer.

I saw a flower in beauty crowned
Upon a vernal day,
Its fragrance breathed on all around—
It was the flower of May.
I looked again: The parent stem
Alone, then met my eye;
The flower was in a brighter realm,
Where flowers can never die. T. J. S.

In Auburn, March 13th, of inflammation in the bowels, Mr. John G. Standart, aged 28 years. In the morning of his days he was cut down by an illness of thirteen hours duration. His death, from its suddenness and from the respect felt for him, excited much sensation. He was a believer in the Resitution, and died universally lamented, especially by the poor of this village. May his widow, parents and relatives, find consolation in the Gospel.

Suddenly, in Butternuts, on the 15th ult., Mrs. Nancy Washbon, wife of Mr. Zeba Washbon

In Leyden, February 9th, of a bilious complaint, Joel Jenks, aged 77 years, funeral on the 10th—sermon by J. A. A.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months: $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, APRIL 6, 1838. NUMBER 14.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER VI.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

DRESS.

It would appear from the admonitions of the Apostles Paul and Peter,* that the ladies, in their day, were in the habit of arraying and ornamenting their persons, in a manner which these teachers deemed rather indecorous. As the precautions of the apostles, upon this subject, were not extended to men, it is supposed that females in ancient times, were more given to excess in dress, than the other sex. And it is sometimes thought that these distinctive characteristics of the sexes, continue to the present day. Without pretending to decide upon this point, I must be permitted to say, that the time, attention, and expense, bestowed on dress, by many females, gives no inconsiderable strength to the above supposition. But allowing it to be true, that females are more inclined to excess in dress than men, the cause I suppose to exist, not so much in any greater degree of inherent vanity or love of display, as in the disparity in their condition and occupations. Men are engaged, the greater proportion of the time, in the business transactions, the stirring scenes of public life; and their minds being thus absorbed, are not so liable to give much importance to the trivial subject of dress. But females, being debarred, to a great extent, by the usages of society, from participating in those busy affairs that are of a public character, are thrown upon the immediate resources of the imagination, to supply this deficiency. And, moreover, believing their prosperity depends much upon their exterior appearance, they have been compelled, as it were, to allow dress to form an important item in their occupation and their thoughts.

That due attention should be given to dress by females, and that, in this manner, by a judicious display of correct taste, they can improve their appearance and personal attractions, is indisputably true. But ladies should know, if they are not already aware of it, that there is such a thing as intemperance in dress!—that, like every other blessing of Providence, when dress is indulged in to excess, when the love of it degenerates into a passion, it becomes an evil, entailing misfortune and wretchedness. Excess is intemperance. And that ladies sometimes dress to excess, can not be doubted by those who are blessed with sight.

Many evils arise from an excessive love of dress. It absorbs the mind to the neglect of useful avocations. Young ladies would do well to remember that they were not created solely to dress and adorn their persons. There are duties, ardent, responsible duties, which will devolve upon them in the several stations and relationships they will be called to occupy. To be enabled to discharge them faithfully, it is necessary that you should bestow much study, reflection, and forethought upon them. But how can this be done, when the attention is wholly absorbed by dress? The young lady who is wholly intent on adorning her person, is very liable to neglect the more important work of cultivating the mind. It may be noticed, as a general rule, that such ladies think little, and care less, about mental improvement—so that while without, all may be dazzling and perfect, within there is nought but a moral and mental waste, where lurks many an insidious foe to happiness.

*1 Tim. ii: 9; 1 Pet. iii: 3, 4.

An excessive love for dress, leads to extravagance in other respects. The lady who deems it an object of the highest importance to float upon the very crest of the ebbing and flowing tide of fashion in dress, will imagine it essentially necessary that an equal style should be observed in all that pertains to her. If she enters the marriage state, houses, and furniture, and equipage, must correspond with dress, and she plunges into needless expenditures, which often end in ruin. How many who have started in life with the fairest prospects, have speedily been brought to bankruptcy and poverty, by an inordinate love of display!

An intemperate attachment to dress, is destructive to health, as it invariably leads to a mode of dress, directly at war with the construction and wants of the human body. It is a fact no less shocking than true, that thousands of females in the United States, are annually hurried to an early grave, solely by those torturous improprieties in dress, which are dictated by fashion. Every well informed physician will bear witness to the correctness of this declaration. It is truly surprizing that young ladies who possess the ordinary powers of reflection granted to rational beings, will deliberately persevere, in face of the startling, horrid array of facts before them, and contrary to the admonitions of the enlightened, the wise, and the prudent, in dressing in such a manner as to undermine the most vigorous constitutions, induce painful diseases, and hasten premature death! There is an infatuation in regard to this evil, that is wholly unaccountable.* If young ladies will not listen to the advice of friends, or the warning of physicians, I beg them to open an ear to that sepulchral voice which comes up from myriads of "the early dead," who have been consigned to the cold grave, by their miserable slavery to the cruelties of fashion! The weekly bills of mortality throughout our country, display a record of the dissolution of multitudes of young and lovely beings, from diseases induced by improper dress, that should strike terror to those whose practice is bringing them to the same fate. It is melancholy to reflect how many who peruse these lines, will continue, for the sake of dressing themselves in conformity to the arbitrary laws of fashion, to brave the frightful catalogue of diseases, until death stares them in the face, and opens his icy arms to receive them in his embrace! Allow me to ask the young lady whose eye is now resting here—are you one of this number? I trust not. It would be too much like arraying yourself in bridal robes to go down to the company of the dead! If you must injure your health—if you must bring on death in the prime of life, I pray you do it in some good cause—in the cause of love, humanity, and duty—in a cause upon which you can look back with satisfaction, even in the struggles of death. Be entreated not to court the embraces of the "king of terrors," by a course so nearly suicidal as that which I am condemning! Do I magnify the danger? Ask your physician—ask the learned physiologist—ask the dying—ask the dead!

Not the least surprizing thing in relation to this evil, is, that so many parents should look calmly on and behold their daughters committing this self-murder, without taking any decisive measures to prevent—yea, perhaps approving of it. Mothers often exhibit an ignorance, a carelessness, a fatuity, in this respect, that excites the astonishment and sorrow of the reflecting. They have a duty to discharge, regarding the dress of their daughters, which they can not neglect without incurring deep guilt. How many mothers, when it is too late, when insidious disease is laying its palsying hand upon the life-springs of beloved daughters, would sacrifice the wealth of the Indies, could they but recall them to the days of childhood, and restore that health which has been destroyed by their infatuated blindness!

*The reader can not mistake the evil to which I refer, viz., tight lacing.

An inordinate love of dress, involves its victims in a servile bondage to the caprice of others. For whom do they dress?—for whom do they expend time and money, and invite the approach of poverty and disease? Not for themselves, surely—for when they are in retirement, all finery is laid aside.* No—they dress for others alone—for the public gaze—for the eyes of the multitude. They appear to feel bound by the most imperious necessity, to sacrifice ease and comfort, and exert all their art to attract the attention of the throng. And in the fulfilment of this supposed obligation, they will exhibit an assiduity, a perseverance, which is unfortunately wanting in the discharge of all the worthy and useful duties of life! Is not this a state of dishonorable slavery to the whims of the thoughtless? There is an anecdote so appropriate to this point, that I can not forbear relating it. "A priest of China sedulously followed a splendidly dressed mandarin through the streets, bowing and thanking him for his kindness. Enraged at his pertinacity, the mandarin demanded what he meant? 'To thank you for the use of your rich dress and jewels,' was the calm reply. 'Why,' said the astonished mandarin, 'I never loaned them to you.' 'No,' said the priest, 'but you have allowed me to look at them, which is all the enjoyment you can derive from them, except, perhaps, the pleasure of takidg care of them, and that is a pleasure I do not covet.'"

"But should we not follow the fashions of the day," exclaims the fair reader. Most certainly, so far as those fashions comport with good taste, modesty, economy, and health. But when they violate either of these requisites to female attractions and usefulness, they should be rejected as decidedly as other practices of an immoral and unhealthful character! What is fashion in dress, and whence does it emanate? It is the vitiated taste of a few of the unprincipled dress-makers in France, who give it all its fluctuations and extravagance, solely to fill their coffers. Are American ladies generally aware, that in this respect they have, to a great extent, become the dupes of Parisian dress-makers and milliners? The prints and patterns which they despatch to this country, are not copied from the dress of ladies of high standing and good taste. They are devised by French mantua-makers, and sent to America for the purpose of keeping open here a market for their second-hand laces and cast-off tawdry.—These assertions are perfectly well founded. Mrs. Willard, a celebrated American lady, who travelled a few years since in France, describing in her Foreign Journal, a well dressed French woman, who was ridiculing the "prints" prepared to be sent to this country, exclaims, "A thought struck me at that moment, which made me half weep.

*It would be well for young men to know, that not a few of those ladies who run to the greatest excess in their dress for public show, are the most slatternly and careles when in seclusion. To test the correctness of this remark, call upon them in some hour when they do not expect company, and a moment's contemplation will show, that display, and not neatness, is their ruling passion.

These figures, said I to myself, thus ridiculed by those who understand dress in perfection—by which the very milliners of Paris, who send them abroad, would not, for the sake of good taste, (modesty out of the question,) dress themselves—these are the very patterns by which my young and lovely countrywomen are making themselves up—the idols to which they sometimes sacrifice decency and propriety!" It is earnestly hoped that this deeply humiliating statement will have an influence to dampen the ardor of many of our ladies, in servilely imitating those foreign prints, with which our fashionable emporiums abound.

Could those young ladies who imitate every extravagance in fashion, but be aware how ridiculous and repulsive they frequently make themselves appear to the eyes of those persons whose regard they would win, how differently would they conduct.

"O wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursels as others see us,
It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
And foolish notion."

The most abandoned of the female sex, can and do flaunt in attire as gay and fashionable, as the respectable. Hence, young ladies can not be too often reminded, that dress is a worthless foundation upon which to base their claims to the respect and affection of gentlemen. Who, in these days, ever thinks of judging of the character of a lady by the fashion of her habiliments? It would be as uncertain a criterion as the color of her eye, or the height of her stature. By this criterion, the virtuous and the vicious can not be distinguished; and if there was no other badge of excellency, all would be upon the same level! Discreet and sensible young men never fall in love with dress—it has little or no influence in guiding their affections. They do not look to the outward attire—which alike covers the good and the evil—to discover the excellences of a lady, but to the intrinsic moral and intellectual worth of the wearer. A well cultivated mind, a sweet, gentle disposition, with a plain, simple garb, possess far more powerful attractions, than an ignorant mind and a perverse disposition, arrayed in all the finery that ever was invented by that most fertile in expedients of all human soils, the imagination of a dressmaker. Never, therefore, dress with the expectation of being esteemed by community, or loved by any, on account of the texture, shape, color, or expense of your attire. All anticipations of this character, can be entertained but to end in disappointment and chagrin.

I would, by no means, influence young ladies to be negligent or indifferent in regard to dress—I would have them bestow upon it all the attention it properly deserves. It is the excess, the intemperance in dress, and a servile bondage to the caprices of fashion, against which I would caution you. And I again warn you that you can not be too particular in so dressing as not to injure health. You should remember that you have lungs, and that to insure health, the chest must be permitted to expand without opposition, that the lungs may have free and full play. If you dress in such manner as to prevent the expansion of the chest and the full inflation of the lungs, unavoidable disease ensues, and early death follows. Mothers should understand these facts, and should bear them in mind when superintending the attiring of their daughters.

Let your dress always comport with neatness, propriety, and economy. Never swerve from the dictates of these standards. Neatness will prevent you from arraying yourself in gewgaws and tinsel, and running after all the absurdities of fashion, and will dictate an adaptation of dress to your form, complexion, age, and circumstances. It will allow of no extremes, either in extravagance or oddity. It will teach those who are fair, that "beauty unadorned, is adorned the most," and those who are plain, that simplicity will add far more to their attractions, than gaudy trappings. Dr. Johnson once remarked, that a certain lady was dressed the best of any he had ever seen; for but a moment after having conversed with her, he could not recollect what she had on. That is, she had nothing odd, vain, or unbecoming in her attire. Propriety will forbid dressing in any manner that will violate that modesty which is the charm of your sex, or following any fashion that will undermine your constitution, or in the least degree injure your health. Economy will dictate the necessity of always dressing within your means; and it will also show you the impropriety and deep folly of involving yourself, or any with whom you are connected, in debt, to array your body in useless and silly finery!

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1838.

LUKE XV: 11-32.

Many have been the applications which have been made of this parable; but, as with my young friends, so with every intelligent and self-determining student of the Scriptures, the first question is this—Upon what occasion, and for what purpose were these words (whatever may be the subject of study) employed at first?

In the first verses of this chapter, will be found a notice of the occasion which called forth this as well as the two preceding parables. The tax-gatherers and foreigners who dwelt among the Jews, were peculiarly obnoxious to this holy people; but it would appear that Jesus did not repulse them, either by his manner or by his religious discourses. Such characters we find almost always among those who thronged to hear Jesus; and that he should permit their attendance, be friendly to them, and even eat with them, seemed to the self-styled orthodox and religious of that day, a very grave objection to his character as a religious Teacher. To some such grumbling objections the Pharisees and scribes were giving utterance when Jesus replied to it in the three parables of "The Lost Sheep," "The Lost Piece of Silver" and "The Prodigal Son."

Few, we presume, need to be informed who the tax-gatherers and heathens, or publicans and sinners, were. The tax-gatherers were those who collected the custom, or tribute assessed upon goods and property throughout the Roman Empire. Every where such officers are unacceptable, but particularly to a subjugated people who pay their taxes to those who oppress them. It was no uncommon thing among the tax-gatherers of the Romans, that justice was violated and extortion practised. To all these causes of dislike add this, that these agents of the Cesars were generally Gentiles, that is, not Jews: the chosen people entertaining feelings of hatred and contempt towards all other nations. This feeling originated the other epithet under consideration—heathens, sinners, or profane—for themselves the Jews regarded as a holy people, and all other nations they regarded as profane. Every foreigner was to them a profane person.

Jesus, in vindicating himself from the aspersion thrown out against him, proceeds to make a supposition which would, in spite of themselves, extract a sentence of self-condemnation from at least all parents among his accusers. The bearing of the story they might not see until they had approved the father and condemned the elder son; but as soon as they reflected on "that to which it tended," they would find that they were, in their feelings, exactly like the elder son whom they had condemned. When this was done the story had served its purpose.

It were not a difficult, and certainly it would be an advantageous exercise, for many of the youthful readers of this paper, to make out occasionly such paraphrases as the following, which is almost verbatim from the papers of one of our young friends, who at the time of writing it, had not much exceeded his seventeenth year.

A certain man had two sons. The younger of the two, perhaps impatient of the restraints of home, and proud of his own (supposed) ability to manage his own affairs, requests from their father that he would bestow upon him now, that portion of the inheritance which is, one day, to be his. The father indulges him in his request, and he is thus placed in circumstances less favorable to virtuous conduct than is the elder brother, who remains at home under the immediate instruction and guidance of his father. Now considering his youth and less favorable circumstances, you will not be astonished that he should renouce the curb of reason, and run headlong into those delusions which catch the unwary. Accordingly, we soon find this wandering youth in pitiable circumstances, with all the means supplied by his father for his well-doing completely wasted and unavailable. As those among whom he had fixed his residence, and with whom he had wasted his patrimonial inheritance in the thoughtless and unwise pursuit of pleasure, were not any wiser managers of the talents committed to them than himself, his destitution could not be relieved by the companions whom he had chosen. At last to such a degree of distress had the mismanagement of this youth reduced him, that he was glad to accept of the lowest of all servile employments. This was the miserable result of his separation from home and the guardianship of his father—this the dire consequence of becoming

"Lord of himself—that heritage of woe,
That sad possession, which the human breast
But holds, to rob the mind within of rest."

So craving was his hunger, and so destitute of means and of friends was this self-guided youth, that he was desirous and just upon the point of satisfying his cravings with the offal that the swine were eating, when his better judgment prevailed over a sense of shame, unwillingness to return, and every other consideration, and, together with a recollection of the better fare of every one in his father's service, enabled him to form the resolution of returning to his father.

What feelings of shame and remorse must have been the companions of his homeward journey! But then he has formed the determination to confess his follies and transgressions freely unto his father, and meekly to bear his ejection from the family he has disgraced, and his being ranked with the hired servants. Now if he succeeds in making this acknowledgment of the wrong he has done—if he only makes such a confession as he has purposed in his heart—and if he only maintains this submissive spirit, whatever may be his reception—he will at least have unloaded his bosom of a weight of guilt that is preying upon it—he will, in a great degree, be restored to peace and tranquillity, and he will have a claim to magnanimity of character.

But what do you suppose must have been the additional felicity of his lot when he perceives, while yet a good way off, his father coming to meet him, and finds himself clasped affectionately to the paternal bosom, which is overflowing with forgiveness and with joy? How much augmented must be his love of that father?—how much strengthened his resolutions to abide in his service! He makes confession of all his turpitude, and beholds in his father no angry glance—but an increasing tenderness, a yearning of affection towards him, pity for his sufferings, and joy that, in spite of all the delusions of folly, his son is now returned to the paths of wisdom and peace. The first transports of joy being over, a magnificent fete is arranged for the evening, when, as is customary among yourselves, hired musicians and dancers were engaged, the best calf was killed, the best robes were put upon the returned wanderer, and every demonstration of joy was made which is usual upon the most festive occasions.

At the wanderer's return, his elder brother was abroad in the fields at his labor. When returning at even-tide, the festivities had already commenced—the musicians and dancers had collected and were making merry while supper was being prepared. This strange noise excited his curiosity, and from one of the servants he inquired what all this meant. He was informed of his brother's return and of the joy of his father. How different the feelings of the brother from those of the father! "he was angry and would not go in." With much condescension his father, being informed of his uneasiness, goes forth to entreat and pacify him. The elder son contrasts his constant service with the foolish career of his brother, and reflects upon his father for manifesting more kindness towards the son who had disgraced him, than he had ever done towards himself in all the years he had lived beside him and served him. This unbecoming spirit and language the father overlooks, and with calmness and gentleness reminds his son that he is every day receiving tokens of his father's kindness, and every day sharing in all the comforts and enjoyments of his father's house. Far otherwise had it been with his younger, his foolish, but now his penitent son: for almost against hope, yea, as it were from the dead, he had been restored to a father's love and to a sense of duty. Therefore, says his father, it is surely not unbeseeming to rejoice upon so important and joyful an occasion.

To you, said Jesus, who object and are offended at my reception of strangers—of these Roman officers and citizens—at my addressing my religious instructions and admonitions to them as well as to you who call yourselves God's chosen and peculiar people, this apologue has a useful application. To such of you as with a good and honest heart, are ready to make it, I leave it with sincere wishes for its beneficial operation.

We said that we had made the above paraphrase almost verbatim from one which we found among the mass of papers which our friend has entitled his "Sunday Mail." It is not, however, a close copy, for in making such we should have been endorsing an error which we think the paraphrast has got into. He endeavors as you may observe in the very commencement of the paraphrase, to make the supposed case and the real case, or the story of the younger son and the circumstances of the Gentile world, run exactly parallel. He endeavors to make out a correspondence or resemblance in every respect between the younger son and the Gentiles. But this exact correspondence between the parable and what it is intended to illustrate, we can not always find, nor is it wise to look for it. And in following it out our young friend has lost sight of the main design; at least involved himself in difficulty in making this main design appear at the last. We have, therefore, to avoid this too common error, varied from our original and omitted some fancied resemblances. This parable has frequently suffered in the same way from older expositors.

The spirit of the elder brother is not yet extinct. Even at the present day it is too prevalent. Reluctantly are the arms of forgiveness and the means of doing better, opened to him who has been unwise or criminal. The prevailing spirit of society is to mark indelibly every transgressor—ever to remember a stain; and the effect of this conduct is to render the once fallen hopeless, and to make the guilty still plunge deeper and deeper in guilt. Nor are there wanting, in this day, those who would shut the gates of Heavenly mercy against "one half the world." Our legislation, our social intercourse and our theology, would, therefore, all of them be improved by an abstraction of the one spirit, and an infusion into them of the other. Unless we rise from the meditation of this parable with the spirit of the elder brother somewhat mortified within us, and that of the father somewhat corroborated, we may fear that our study has been profitless and in vain. P. P.

Brilliant Spirits.—It is a strange thing, but so it is, that very brilliant spirits are almost always the result of mental suffering, like the fever produced by a wound. I some times doubt tears, I oftener doubt lamentations; but I never yet doubt the existence of that misery which flushes the cheek and kindles the eye, and which makes the lip mock with sparkling words the dark and hidden world within.—Miss Landon.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 20.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., March 9th, 1838.

Mr. Skinner:

Sir—Last night yours of the 26th ult. arrived here after the short passage of ten days. As usual you dilate upon my humor. You figure better as a humorist, than as a logician. As I have to do with you in the latter character, and not in the former, you will please excuse my unceremoniousness in returning such compliments. Your style, if not your temper, is indeed improving; but much as I may sympathize with you, neither your prayers for me, nor your great good humor can justify me in witholding a full exposure of your unenviable posture, and the singular imbecility of your present communication. And yet I could wish that its impotency was its most reprehensible attribute; for if I do not greatly err, the sequel will shew that there may be something more discreditable to your cause than a mere failure in the departments of facts, reason and evidence.

2. In the first six paragraphs there are but three assertions worthy of a single remark. You say I do charge you with making the Saviour say, "these shall go away into temporal punishment." Certainly I do; for with me every thing is either temporal or eternal as respects duration. Do you now deny this! It is, Sir, the just sentence of your lately admitted doctrine of antithesis. They must go away into either the one or the other. You say not into endless, consequently into ending; not into eternal, but into temporal punishment. So Paul contrasts when he says, "The things that are seen are temporal, but the things unseen are eternal."

3. In your defence of your theory of punishment, of which we shall speak in its proper place, you confound chastisements and punishments, and quote Paul and the Prophets speaking of God's worshipping people, as though what is said of them is true of fallen angels and wicked men. The words "for our profit" with you apply to all wicked angels and men!

4. The third assertion, "In this discussion," you say, I "have attempted to prove endless punishment merely by the force of aionios, and can give no other reason under heaven in favor of endless misery." I merely reply that this is a double error in fact—an assertion as baseless and as truthless as your assumption of post mortem purgatorial punishment, as detailed in your standard No. for September, 1836, thankfully received here the other day, (of which in its proper place.) With what regard to truth could you say I "have no other reason under heaven in favor of endless misery"? Such is your finale of the two first propositions.

5. You then resume the proof of your first affirmative on the third proposition, and continue for nine paragraphs the attempt to repair its breaches. Your efforts on this proposition have sealed your reputation for all your distinguishing excellencies as a controversialist, and more fully show the reasons why your brethren have put you under the saddle in their team. I must therefore request our readers to read over and over your letter, from paragraph 7 to paragraph 15 inclusive, and to ponder diligently what I say upon it.

6. In paragraph 7 you charge me of an ingenious and evasive course in examining your words indicative of absolute interminable duration: for that is the purpose for which you produce them; and yet you do not make a single specification of evasion or ingenuity in the case. I affirm that time, eternity, and duration are substantive ideas; and that but one of your words is ever found in any book applied to the substantive ideas of time, eternity, or duration. This is evasion! This is ingenuity! And what is your affirmation in the proposition, but that there is a word in human language that signifies duration without end, never applied to the future punishment of the wicked? This is your proposition. Well, now, where is the ingenuity and the evasion in affirming and proving that five of your words are never used in the sacred Scriptures in reference to simple duration at all, whether of time or eternity! Is it evasive to keep to the very terms of your proposition! In all logical truth and propriety every word you have adduced is an evasion of your own proposition; for not one of the terms is found in the Bible as an epithet of duration. Again, though you enter upon this subject in a mighty bluster about ingenuity and evasion, and with a threatening aspect, what misapplication, or misstatement, or deception have you adduced? Not one: I say again, not one. You even only attempt it in a single instance, and in that you humble your own understanding to the dust.

7. I said in my last that neither aptharsia nor athanasia is ever applied to God or angels, heaven or happiness. You add, "I am surprised at your recklessness;" and say, "Had you forgotten that the apostle has said of God, "Who only hath immortality?" If you were, indeed, astonished at my recklessness, I am truly so at your assumed stupidity. Why, Sir, is it possible that you confound a person's possessions with his attributes of character! Is every item of your property an attribute of your character! or is every adjective applicable to you that is applicable to your property! Should I say of you, "that you only have a certain mystery," will that authorize any one to say that I called you a mysterious character, or applied to you the word mystery! Do you, Sir, apply the word earth to the Lord, because you read "The earth is the Lord's"!!! This is the sum total of all your specifications of evasion, ingenuity, recklessness, etc. etc. etc. on my whole exposure of the sophistry of the proof of your third proposition by a class of words not one of which is ever applied to duration, to heaven, or to happiness, in the sacred Scriptures, and, I believe, in no other volume.

8. But you say I concede "that five of them embrace the idea of duration." Why did you not quote my words? I said of the whole six—"One of them excepted, the others never but by implication import duration." If you thus pervert my words, I can not wonder at your freedom with the dead apostles. As in some of them is found the idea of corruption, of distance, (as aperantos,) of divisibility, and of mortality, so is the idea of duration found in them. These ideas are just as much in these words as duration; and you might as well say that either them or their contraries indicate absolute corruption, distance, divisibility, or mortality, as that they necessarily signify indefinite duration. Even take their negatives in composition, and I ask, can you say immortal, indivisible, uncorrupt, frontierless, or borderless (aperantos) duration! There is no affinity or congruity between such epithets and simple duration. Indissoluble, immortal, incorruptible, etc. apply to things that are compound. Our present life is partly animal, intellectual, spiritual. Our nature is now partly corruptible, divisible, and mortal. Hence such compound terms as immortal, incorruptible, indivisible, etc. are applied to a future state.

9. If you, Sir, had looked your dictionary, you would not have asked me, unless for some of your readers, why aperantos refers to space and not to time. Recollect, too, that your proposition is to adduce a word literally signifying absolute duration, which the Holy Spirit might have applied to the punishment of the wicked had he wished to have communicated such an idea. Well, then, let us try it; for you have proved the proposition and found such a word. These shall go away into—immortal, incorruptible, indivisible, borderless punishment!!—This is your proof.

10. "Not all of it," you say, "for I gave you the word aidios, which you have misspelled aeidios in order to deduce it from aei, always; whereas I and other learned men deduce it from hades, invisible," etc. Such is your strong proof: for this word aidios, you say, is applied to God denoting his absolute eternity. I thanked you thrice for your candor on your producing this word; but, alas for the frailty of your candor! It is all gone. And here is where I think you have sealed your reputation for both learning and candor. It is here, I fear, there is something more reprehensible than sheer imbecility.

11. Sir, is it a fact that you can not read Greek, much less understand it! If not, why do you commit yourself in this way and produce the impression upon all scholars that you are wholly destitute of even an elementary knowledge of the language? There is not a Greek scholar on earth that would say I had misspelled aeidios when I spelled aeioon along side of it to show that both words, aioon and aidios, sprung from the same root and are formed in the same manner. Please read again my 19th paragraph, and see how I have spelled these words. Open your Greenfield, Parkhurst, Schrevellius, Robertson, Stokius, or any other Greek Lexicon in America, and see whether they do not all spell both words alike and derive them both from one root.

12. Why do you not give the name of some lexicographer that has derived the word aidios from ades? You say, "There are some respectable critics who suppose it to be derived from ades." Why did you not name them? I believe, Sir—nay, I am sure, you can not name one! You will now have to sustain your veracity and your learning at the same time. I pray you, then, give us your respectable critics, chapter and verse—your dictionary authority.

13. It is impossible for any one skilled in Greek to imagine that aidios comes from hades, as it is to derive eternity from the word invisible. It is, I say, impossible, for five reasons. 1st. The first letter of each bears always a different spiritus or mark—aidios has the lenis, and adees, written in English hades has the asper. 2d. There is no i in hadees, and there is an i in aidios with a syneresis always over it. 3d. In hades there is the long e, written double ee, which is not in aidios. 4th. They are both compound derivative words, and the one can not be derived from the other. They are just of as different families as the word endless and the word invisible. How in the name of reason, Sir, can you derive absolute eternity from the word invisible! And in the 5th place, all dictionaries in the world, certainly all that I have seen, derive aidios and aioon from aei.

14. Mr. Skinner, your pretensions to Greek literature and a critical knowledge of those words concerning which you have scraped together from other smatterers such a farago, is forever gone. I suspected it on several occasions before—as when you introduced kolasis you always write it in the wrong case, besides other blunders which a scholar could not make; but I was determined to give you cord enough—and now, Sir, see how you swing.

15. You have now finished the controversy on the philology of Universalism, as I before said, in favor of the truth, far beyond all that I expected. You have said that aidios is that word which signifies absolute endless duration; that had it been prefixed to punishment, it would have made it absolutely endless and interminable. In thus deciding you have refuted yourself and all your efforts to explain away both aei and aeioon; for it is incontrovertibly certain that aeidios derives all its endless duration from aei, and that aioonios and aidios are branches from the same root.

16. You have then, Sir, sustained my proof of the first two propositions, by sealing my facts and reasonings upon those long disputed words; and you have in another way established all my positions in contending for the absolute eternity indicated by this word; for it is applied to the punishment of the wicked and to God, and to nothing else in the Bible. The everlasting chains of darkness have now, in your plastic hands, been converted into God's purposes; but this still helps the truth; for all his purposes are eternal and immutable! You now appear to have lost your sagacity at every point: for you add, paragraph 11, by my admitting this word to mean endless duration, I have swallowed the naked hook—(what stupidity!) and sustained your third proposition! How can this be, inasmuch as this very word is applied to the chains of darkness or prison that confines wicked angels—a prison which while it holds them fast to the day of "eternal judgment," secures them for ever.

17. It is not my province here to descant upon all your wayward fancies—nor is it necessary. But surely your honorable allusion to the eternal counsels of God, under the appropriate imagery of "the chains of darkness," will secure to you some distinction amongst your brethren. But I shall hasten to your ten weighty arguments begun to be examined in my last letter. Your effort at philosophy—your defence of your first argument on the uselessness of endless punishment, seems to be, that because we can see the usefulness of some evils, and can not see the usefulness of endless punishment, therefore it is useless. Of this logic we shall have occasion to speak more fully; but first we shall finish our begun review of your philosophy.

18 You assert that eternal punishment is "pernicious" to the whole universe. "It must be pernicious to the happiness of saints, angels, and all benevolent beings that know it." It exhibits too, in the "Father of all, the spirit of infinite malignity and revenge insatiable." So you affirm—and that is your proof. Query—Is the present punishment of sin and your "future punishment" pernicious to the happiness of saints and angels and all benevolent beings who now know it or shall hereafter know it? You dare not say it is. How then can you affirm that the mere continuance or increase of it will be so? If temporal reasons and causes justify your present and future punishment, may not eternal reasons and causes justify an increase and continuance of it for ever? How far you and the heavenly hosts differ on the subject of divine punishment for sins, and how differently you and they conceive of condign and suitable judgment, may be learned from the beginning of the 19th chapter of the Apocalypse. You regard it as an exhibition of "infinite malignity and insatiable revenge;" while they sing as follows: "Alleluia! Salvation, and glory, and honor, and power to the Lord our God! True and righteous are his judgments, [punishments;] for he has punished the Great Whore that did corrupt the earth with her fornication, and has avenged the blood of his servants at her hand. And again they said, Alleluia! and the smoke of her torment rose up for ever and ever." Thus, Sir, you see how far you and the heavenly intelligences differ about this pernicious thing.

19. But you say it is dishonorable to God also. It supposes that he could not or would not prevent it. If there be any sense in this, of which I am very doubtful, your admissions dishonor God infinitely more. You admit that sin exists, and sin is the cause of punishment. Now God could not or would not, as respects past, present, and future punishment, prevent sin.

20. You assert also that future punishment is opposed to the benevolence, mercy, wisdom, power, and justice of God. These are your 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and eighth weighty arguments. It is as easy to transfix these five weighty arguments with one shaft, at one time, as to take them in single file: for they all rest upon a common fallacy. Sin and present sufferings are as much opposed to these perfections of God, on your own reasoning, as endless punishment. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain in consequence of the permission of moral evil. Whenever you reconcile this to infinite benevolence, mercy, wisdom, power, and justice, I will by your own arguments reconcile eternal punishment to all the same perfections of the Deity. For if you assume that the end in view justifies the permission of the endurance of moral evil, with all its pains and agonies; for seven or ten thousand years; I have only to assume that similar or greater ends in view may justify perpetual suffering and punishment. The principle is the same. The difference is only in degrees. If the Creator could have created and blessed moral agents without sin or punishment, would he not have done it? And if this has hitherto been impossible, on what principle or fact in philosophy can any one infer that it may at some future period be possible!

21. To my mind, Sir, there is no argument, no sense, no philosophy in your ten arguments. God can not do every thing that he has power to do, or that he has mercy to do. He can only do what all his perfections, guided by infinite and eternal wisdom, say is consistent with his whole nature. He can show mercy, and he can punish sin; but he can not do the one or the other in any way that is not in unison with all his perfections. Well, now, God is immutable in all his excellencies, Yet he permits sin, punishment, and death; and who can say that what is now may not hereafter be; and that what is just and right and benevolent in time, may not be just and right and benevolent to eternity!

22. Your theory, Sir, is the most baseless conceit in the universe. It has not a single fact nor argument to support it. It is the superlative of the weak and beggarly elements of assumption. Your hypothesis is without fact, without philosophy, without analogy, as well as without Bible authority———Let us take a parable from the brutal creation. Look at yonder boundless plain: see how many beasts of burden, sheep, cattle, and domestic animals of every species are oppressed and tortured by human hands, or by a thousand accidents. Add to these all the wild beasts of every species that have been lacerated, torn, and bruised by one another. See the millions of birds, beasts, and reptiles—not to invade the inhabitants of rivers, lakes, seas, oceans, the animalculæ that people every thing that grows. Hear, Sir, the myriads of groans, shrieks, and agonies that rend the heavens and melt the stony heart of man. Who could endure for a single day to look on all the writhings, wrestings, distortions, convolutions of this congregated mass of sinless sufferers!—Who, Sir, could endure to hear and see so much misery for an hour without melting into sympathy! And do you not believe that God, who is infinite in mercy and benevolence, whose goodness is boundless and unsearchable, has had all this groaning and travailing creation before his mind, not only for six thousand years, but from the dateless records of a past eternity, and that in full sight of it he called all those beings into existence, and permitted these sufferings for reasons to man or angel, perhaps, for ever inscrutable; but to his mind perfectly wise, just, benevolent, and merciful in reference to a boundless whole, an infinite system, which his eye alone surveys and understands. I ask you then, Sir, to show how you can reconcile this with your idealism, your a- priori reasonings, your hypothetical divinity? If God, in all his power, wisdom, justice, mercy, and benevolence, did give birth to such a system and allot such sufferings to sinless and unsinning brutes; may he not, I ask, for ever punish wicked men and spirits, by whose rebellion all these miseries, groans, and agonies have diffused themselves over the face of animated nature, and cast at least a temporary gloom over universal being?

23. If farther evidence be yet wanting in demonstration of the quicksands on which your temple of reason stands, I would inquire whether from your own reasonings on the power, wisdom, goodness, justice, benevolence, and compassion of the Creator, could you fling yourself back before sin and sorrow were conceived or born, you could have expected or inferred from all the perfections of the Deity that he could possibly have originated such a mixed system of good and evil as now obtains, as far as known to us through the whole rational creation? From what attribute or excellency of the Almighty Father could you, before the event of sin and punishment occurred, have inferred the probability of the catastrophies of angels and men? I am bold to say, Sir, you never could, from any promises or a-priori reasonings in reach of human faculties, have anticipated such events. How then, Sir, let me compassionately and benevolently ask you, dare you, from the empty storehouses of your ephemeral experience, memory, and reason—from your little horizon—from the deep valley covered with the mists of multifarious ignorance in which you stand, presume to say that a state of endless misery for wicked agents is useless, pernicious, dishonoarble to God, malevolent, unmerciful, unwise, unjust, and impotent on the part of God; when, upon your own philosophy, present sin and suffering—nay, the origination of a mixed system of good and evil, is equally to be reprobated as useless, pernicious, dishonorable, etc.?

24. But to cap your climax of unfounded reasoning, you add that the eternal punishment of wicked men is contrary to the veracity of God. This is your ninth weighty argument. Your proof? You say, "For he has declared that he will not contend forever, nor be always wroth, [with a certain people I trow,] and that he will not cast off for ever." I thank you for this proof; for it proves that when you please for ever and always, your aei and aion, do signify endless. Your only proof for this weighty argument is a positive disproof of all your reasonings upon aei and aioon; for here you rely upon it three times as certainly intimating without end. God, you say, will not contend—without end, or for ever!!! Never was there on earth a system more suicidal than your Universalism. It is always knocking out its own brains upon its own reasonings and upon its own verbal criticisms. It will not wait for the sentence of the law.

25. Your tenth argument is the whole Bible—the voice of all revelation! Eternal punishment of the devil and his angels, and wicked men, is contrary to the voice of revelation. If this be so, your nine arguments were foolishness, yourself being judge. They are no part of revelation.—You have given us nine arguments, and then the voice of all revelation! What a logician! Your tenth supersedes the nine, and dooms them not to be a part of the voice of revelation. Lest I should seem to sport with your frailties, or rather those of your system, I shall hear you once more, as you promise, on the fourth proposition.

Controversially yours, A. CAMPBELL.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

CONFERENCE AT PAVILION.

Although duty and affection called me away, yet the disappointment of my not being able to attend the Conference was great. Having taken a conspicuous part in calling it, the brethren had some reason to expect that I would assist in leading the way. Had I been there, I should have endeavored to carry into effect all the objects mentioned in my articles on the cause in western New-York. It is gratifying to learn, that one of the most important of them was discussed and approbated, and it is hoped that the next Conference will not adjourn, until each member of it has pledged his devotion to a proper and wholesome organization of societies or churches.

I am informed, that some of the brethren present, expressed astonishment at what had been recently written by others as well as myself, on the condition of our cause in western New-York; and that they thought there was no reason for such an outcry, that we were going along prosperously enough. Others, it is said, poured copious showers of cold water, with a design to check the ardor of some, who, like ourselves believe there is much to be done and undone before any permanent security can be given to our cause in this region. There is something in this which I do not understand; nor can I, until much which has been said to me by these very brethren, is taken back. If they took the stand which they did merely for controversy, it changes to some extent the complexion of the case—still in my opinion it is better to be of one heart and one voice, without trifling with matters of such vast importance. I appeal to the brethren present at the Conference—is the condition of your respective societies just as you want it to be? is there that punctuality and unqualified devotion to the great objects of the Gospel, which encourage your hearts and do honor to the cause?—if not, ought not this to be their condition? No Universalist will object to any compact, which is in accordance with the spirit of religion; therefore all apprehensions about the loss of friends are unfounded. Neither will it diminish the respect of those who merely support us, in preference to any other denomination. It was observed before the Conference by some, that nothing would be done at that meeting—a remark which, at any rate was unadvisable. Rather let it be said that something will be done, and prepare to do it. To say that I had any doubts of the final triumph of the truth as it is in Jesus, would be denying the faith; but to say that it will take place in spite of the only means adapted to that end, would be a reckless violation of natural and revealed truth; knowing what these means are, I am bound by the highest obligation of duty to God, and my fellowmen, to urge their adoption. G. S.

INFORMATION WANTED.

Can any one inform us where the following persons may be found? They owe us for the Herald, and have paid no attention to our repeated calls for the pay.—There are many others that we shall inquire after, unless we hear from them soon. We now say to one and all that are indebted to us, will you forward to us the amount due on the Herald, and thereby save us much trouble and anxiety?

William B. Hawley, Port Gibson, Ontario county, owes $2.50. L. M. Fisher, Black Rock, owes $2.00. William Estlock, gone to Michigan—owes $2.75. J. S. Higgins, Comstock, Mich., $2.75. C. Brown and James S. Smith, West Dresden, N. Y., each $2.50.—T. H. Allen, Nunda Valley, N. Y., owes $3.00. C. H. Prosius, Sodus, N. Y., owes $2.50. A. Bowen, Clay, Mich., owes $1.50. R. Field, Sodus Point, N. Y., owes $3.00. G. S.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, APRIL 6, 1838.

AN APPEAL TO THE PUBLIC.

During the seven years that I have resided in this city, as a teacher of the religion of Jesus by the voice and by the press, I have endeavored to obey the spirit of the faith I profess—"Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord."—If called to defend the denomination to which I belong, (and I have found that we are, indeed, a "sect that is every where spoken against"!) or the sentiment in which we differ from many of our fellow-Christians, I did it in the pulpit or periodical belonging to us, and strove to do it with proper dignity, and in that spirit of charity required by the Gospel. That I have sometimes erred in the means, or failed in the spirit, I acknowledge with regret; but that I ever refused to apologize or retract when my error was pointed out, will not, I think, be asserted by any who know my course. I say not this, to claim merit therefor; I did but my duty, and the Great Teacher instructs us, that when we have done all that is required of us, we are yet unprofitable servants, having received from our Father in heaven, all we have, even the ability to do his work, and to be grateful for its abundant reward. But I state it, to show my usual course, and my reluctance in departing from it in this instance. The causes and objects of this appeal, are briefly as follows.

More than three months ago, an excitement on religious subjects commenced in West Utica. After some time, a Baptist Elder, (whom, for reasons satisfactory—indeed, imperative to my own mind, I forbear from noticing otherwise,) was employed to carry on the work. After having proved himself a fit agent for the purpose, he removed the meeting to the second Presbyterian church, where the Rev. Messrs. Fowler and Eldridge united with the Rev. Messrs. Savage and Shaw, in giving him their countenance, support and aid. The Methodists, also, I believe, united with them, but moderately and cautiously. Finally, to crown their approval of his labors, after the most objectionable portions had been heard by them, they removed the meeting to the first Presbyterian church, where he continued (except an adjournment back to the second church,) until his farewell discourse on last Monday night. Thus the Rev. gentlemen here named, have assumed the responsibility of his labors—made him their representative or agent in the meeting—and they and their congregations very generally, have approved his discourses and measures, directly and indirectly, without any material exception. And what have they thus so long and so highly approved? It gives me no little pain to make the disgusting recital. For the sake of my erring brethren, I would gladly fling the pall of oblivion over the corrupted mass; but justice to the persecuted and the injured, and a hope that even yet, by this means, some may be led to forsake the evil of their way, compel me briefly and plainly to state the facts. Whole denominations and societies were ruthlessly assailed, their pastors villified, their doctrines ridiculed, and their peaceful conduct uncharitably condemned. The Dutch Reformed, the Episcopal, and the Columbia-street Baptist churches of this city, were thus treated by the chief agent or his satellites. And, yet, the man is upheld!

But for Universalists he reserved the foulest waters of his wrath and abuse. Repeatedly he represented nearly the entire denomination as infidel, irreligious, dishonest, drunken and licentious—our sentiments were grossly misrepresented, carricatured, ridiculed and condemned—our public teachers and private members, men of known Christian character and deportment, were either described so as to be known, or held up by name, in contemptuous and insulting language—their motives impugned, their language, actions and opinions misrepresented, and their private characters loaded with most abominable and disgraceful charges. Many of these anecdotes and dreams we know to be wholly false, others can be proved false in the most objectionable particulars, and we verily believe that not one can be proved true. Even the grave was entered with hyena-like ferocity, and the fair character of its beloved and virtuous tenant—who fell a victim to his benevolent efforts in attending on the cholera-stricken of every denomination—was blackened by the foul tongue of slander!

As meekly as the infirmities of human nature would permit, these unhallowed and painful injuries were endured, until silence ceased to be a duty. Several Universalists mildly remonstrated with those brethren who aided the chief agent in this unchristian and unmanly work—pointed out his numerous departures from truth and decency—furnished them with printed and verbal statements in disproof of many of his charges and anecdotes—asked for proof of the others before they should be circulated as "facts"—entreated to be heard in self-defence (a right granted by justice and humanity to the vilest criminals, before they are condemned)—begged that a retraction might be made of those charges already proved false—and advised and entreated them to pursue a course of conduct less at war with the courtesies of social life, the sanctity of private character, and the justice, candor, and charity of Christianity. But in vain! No retraction was ever made—no defence allowed—no different course pursued!

To instance one case—viz. the declaration that a member of the Universalist church in this city, communed, and then went to a grocery, and there lay drunk for many days. The Rev. Mr. Fowler, and some prominent laymen engaged in the protracted meeting, were credibly informed that the individual described was not now, and never had been a member of either our church or our society; and they solemnly promised that their agent should retract the charge as publicly as he had related it. They also voluntarily declared, that they were anxious that nothing should be stated in their meeting, but what was strictly true; and that if any thing was ever stated of a contrary character, it would be as publicly and as fully corrected. A just and righteous promise; and a truly magnanimous and Christian declaration. But was that falsehood retracted? Have these gentlemen redeemed their promises so earnestly made, and by some of them afterwards solemnly repeated? Have they acted up to their own voluntary declaration, that they desired truth, only, to be stated, and that if any thing else was stated in their meeting, it should be publicly retracted? Alas, "how is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed!" I could weep tears of regret—of bitter sorrow would they but wash out the weaknesses and defections of these brethren—for deeply do I grieve that they have so soon forgotten their promises and resolutions, that every one of these questions must be answered in the negative! Their promises—repeatedly and solemnly made—are broken—the falsehood is yet unretracted!

Permit me to notice another instance, arising from this one. Hearing that Mr. Fowler had avowed such a noble determination, and believing that his ministerial co-adjutors in the protracted meeting, of this city, might have the same regard for truth and justice, I addressed "a friendly letter" to them—mailed March 21, and published in the Magazine and Advocate of March 23d.* In that letter I specified several stories related by their organ, equally false, and pointed out some measures equally reprehensible, and respectfully and affectionately requested the retraction of the former, and the disapproval of the latter. Have they retracted these stories? I truly grieve to say they have not. Was not my request just and reasonable? If so, was it just and reasonable not to grant it?

Not having received from them the justice I requested and expected, I am compelled to appeal to the public. "I speak as to wise men, judge ye what I say."—I call on you in common justice, not to credit the charges made, and the stories related against Universalists, until you have heard the proof, and heard us in our own defence. It is unreasonable to ask us to prove a negative—to require us to prove ourselves innocent of the charges preferred against us—until at least some evidence is adduced to prove us guilty. But unjust and unequal as is the task of proving a negative, if you will induce those who revile and persecute us, to give names, dates and locations to their anecdotes, we will attempt even to prove a negative in those stories which are said to have occurred in this vicinity. Or, if they invite to an examination of the moral and Christian characters of our several denominations, we shall not shrink from that test. In proportion to the numbers on each side, we verily believe they have their full share of immoral preachers, men and women—and that we have our full proportion of members equally fair in character with theirs, for their Christian and social virtues. We ask but to be measured with the same rule by which they measure themselves, and will not shrink from the trial.

This is painful work—but we are forced thus to appear boastful, when we affectingly realize, that neither side has any thing to boast of, but much that should humble it in dust and ashes, instead of striving to exalt itself on the ruins of the other's reputation! But, look at the facts of the case.—Our Christian brethren, misled by prejudice and hasty zeal, have struck the blow, and refused us the liberty of defence. We have turned the other cheek, and they have smitten us again—and again—and yet AGAIN! We have begged for a hearing, and our repeated entreaties have been met with more blows!

The same is true of their cruel misrepresentations of our faith in God's universal and endless paternity and love—a faith which we know "works by love and purifies the heart." Most affectionately and earnestly have we besought our Partialist brethren to meet us fairly, candidly, and in a Christian spirit—to give us their strongest reasons against our faith, or for their own, and hear us show, in turn, wherein they failed to satisfy us that we misunderstood the oracles of divine truth. We have received no answer but repeated insult and injury—or, silence! And for affectionately and respectfully addressing the friendly letter before named, to those brethren, I have been publicly reproached—yes, reproached by their agent, for presuming to put myself on a level with ministers of the Gospel!!! I supposed that a minister of the Gospel was not a lord spiritual, puffed up so highly that a fellow-worm of the dust dared not approach him with the language of respect and fraternal affection! I supposed, and yet suppose, that, in becoming a preacher of "Jesus Christ, and him crucified," I should be meek, lowly and humble, as was my Master before me—should minister, rather than be ministered unto—be the servant of all men for His sake, even while I was the Lord's freeman—more carefully avoid doing wrong, or when done, the more carefully acknowledge my fault, that the cause of religion might not be evil spoken of on my account! The lowly path my Saviour trod—the humble station He assumed among men—the meek and unassuming conduct of the compassionate Friend of publicans and sinners—oh, God—my Father and his Father—give me grace to desire and to adorn it, alone, and to those who may desire them, I will gladly leave the posts of worldly honor, pomp and power!

But I digress! It is painful to my feelings to have occasion to trouble you with this catalogue of injuries, and of unmerited reproaches for merely asking those who inflicted them, to grant us, at least, a fair trial before they condemn us. But my duty calls me to the task, and I obey. To you, then, as to the jury selected by themselves, I appeal. Though I appeal in my own name, I know that many, and I believe that all my Universalist brethren approve my course, and will endorse my appeal. I ask you, then—I affectionately entreat you, in justice to us, and urge you, in duty to yourselves, to hear our defence. You are as capable of judging what is right for you to believe or to disbelieve, as any one can be to judge for you. As Protestant Christians, it is your duty so to judge. As men who are accountable for your faith, each one for himself, and to God only, it is your interest so to judge. The Bible is full of injunctions to induce you to act as freemen in this matter. "Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good"—"Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves."

Do you esteem us so vile, or ignorant, that you think a hearing unnecessary? Such opinions were once entertained of Jesus of Nazareth, and of his humble followers. It was even asked by Nathaniel, "an Israelite in whom there was no guile," "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" He was rightly answered by Philip, "COME, AND SEE." If Universalism is true, you should know it. It does more to reconcile the providences of God with his character, to harmonize his apparently discordant attributes, and to reconcile the Scriptures with themselves, and with nature and reason, than any other system of religious faith known to us. Surely, it can not fail to fill your souls with joy, and peace, and fulness of glory.—with the purest love to God and man—to know that God is, in very truth, our Father and unchanging Friend, and that, after duly chastising us for our transgressions, he will ultimately save all mankind from sin and death, and make them endlessly holy and happy in immortality!—On the other hand, if Universalism is false, you should know it, that you may ably withstand the arguments of its advocates, and become the instruments of God in saving them from the error of their ways. Thus whether Universalism is true or false, you should know it for yourselves, and not merely by hearing its supposed doctrines presented by those ignorant of them, or so prejudiced as to be unable to state them fairly. To this duty, then, we invite you—come to it well prepared to examine it in the light of Revelation and reason.

"Imposture shrinks from light,
And dreads the curious eye;
But Christian truths the test invite,
They bid us taste and try!"

Our periodicals and books are numerous, and our house of worship is open every Sunday, so that means for acquiring information are free and easy of access.—"Come," then, "and see" for yourselves—examine both sides, and after a fair hearing, give your verdict candidly, conscientiously, and in the spirit of good-will to all mankind.

I desire anxiously to present several other items to your consideration, but my limits do not permit me to do so. I therefore close this painful task of exposing the injustice of my Christian brethren, by fervently praying to Almighty God—their Father and my Father—to bless those who persecute and evil entreat us—to forgive our enemies—to turn the erring into the way of truth and the wicked into the way of holiness—to grant all of us, more, and still more of his holy and all-benevolent spirit of grace, that we may better imitate the lowly and compassionate Jesus; and, at last, to crown us, and a ransomed world with immortality, freed from all imperfection, sin and sorrow, through Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world! Amen. A. B. GROSH.

Utica, March 27, 1838.

PROTRACTED MEETING IN UTICA.

However unwilling I may be to attach any importance to an ephemeral excitement, or to trouble our distant readers with the local affairs of this city, it has been deemed proper to publish in our columns the foregoing Appeal to the public. It may do good elsewhere—at least, it will serve to correct false impressions abroad, concerning our cause in this city. Of it, and of the "Friendly Letter" which preceded it, 1000 copies [of each] were printed in pamphlet form and gratuitously distributed in every section of the city. What the result will finally be, God alone knoweth; and to him we commit ourselves and our cause. We have cast the seed on the waters and believe it will manifest itself after many days.

I understand that they claim 700 converts. Thus far only about 200 have been admitted into all the churches, and of these, far the greater part have been members of those societies or regular attendants on their meetings, for years past. Their conversion is from the congregation or society into what is specially designated as the church.

It may be well to state, for the information of our friends abroad, that not one person known to be a member of either our church or society, has been converted by them—not one person known to have been well informed and firm in the belief of universal salvation—and but one, (a female,) that is known to have been a tolerably regular attendant, even, at our meetings. Several who held pews in other churches, and occasionally attended our meetings, have been converted, and attempts have been made to pass them off as converted Universalists; but to the credit of some of the converts themselves, they deny the report. These are the facts of the case so far as I can learn them; our friends abroad may rely upon them without fear, any thing that may be told them to the contrary notwithstanding. Our meetings are better attended, and our friends are in better spirits than usual, and even the public voice acknowledges that we are more benefited by this excitement, than we have been by any thing else that has occurred for many years.

A. B. G.

Br. J. Whitney had a public discussion with two Campbellite preachers, at Royalton Centre, Ohio, on March 7th. The cause of God's impartial grace did not lose any thing by the investigation, of course.

---

* As that letter has since been published and extensively circulated in pamphlet form, by some friends, the reader is referred to it for further information; this will render unnecessary any repetition of it in this Appeal. A. B. G.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

I find on my desk a number of publications yet unnoticed—a few of them yet unread—which seem to ask at least a respectful naming.

1. "A sermon on religious excitements and protracted meetings, elicited by a protracted meeting attended by the Author, in Whithingham, Vt. By H. F. Ballou, Pastor of the Universalist societies in Whithington and Wilmington." Boston—Abel Tompkins—pp. 16, 8vo. —A well written discourse on a trite subject.

2. "The Bible—a light in a dark place. A sermon delivered at the dedication of the Universalist meeting-house in Warren, Mass., Wednesday, December 20th, 1837. By M. H. Smith." Boston—G. W. Bazin—pp. 16, 8vo.—An able discourse in favor of the superiority of revelation as a teacher of divine things, over nature.

3. "A sermon delivered at the opening of the Universalist church in Dover, N. H., December 8, 1837. By Moses Ballou, Portsmouth." Portsmouth, T. J. Whittem, printer—pp. 16, 8vo.—Br. Moses is so well and favorably known to our readers, that they can easily imagine how he would treat a plain yet interesting subject. It is an argument for the divine paternity and beneficence, life and immortality, and the universality of salvation. N. B. The above were received in due time, but it was in a busy time, and hence were laid over till now.

4. "Slander Rebuked. A discourse delivered in the City Hall, Hartford, Conn., on Sunday evening, February 25, 1838. By Rev. Asher Moore." Hartford, J. B. Eldredge, printer—pp. 16, 8vo.—The Rev. P. L. Platt, publisher of "the Gospel Witness," a Baptist paper, in a discourse in Hartford, slandered Universalists and misrepresented Universalism, and in his prayer pronounced that "Universalism is the worst sort of infidelity, and the last resort of crime." This is the text—apocryphal and untrue though it is—and the sermon delivered from it is a severe rebuke of the author of the text, as well as of the crime he committed. It was heard by a crowded auditory, and published by request of the hearers. To me it seems too severe, but not having been present, I can not say how far the manner may have tempered the matter, nor how much the accompanying provocations may have demanded both.

6. "A short sermon"—Text, Dan. iii: 21.—8 pp. 12mo. This is an anonymous production, mainly intended for gratuitous distribution in consequence of the protracted meeting, and its peculiar success, now being held in this city. It is understood to be the production of a talented layman of this city—no friend to bigotry, superstition and religious defamation. I presume the writer took off his gloves when he wrote it, though it is not undignified in its severity, nor very bitter in its playful irony, however it may feel to those whose unsound flesh it cauterizes with so much skill. I am informed that every variety of appellations is plentifully bestowed on it by its numerous readers, just as their gustatory organs happen to be tuned. Its detail of facts, in support of the parallels drawn between the "golden image," and the character of the deity proclaimed by revivalists; and between the motives of the worshippers on the plains of Dura, and of those "in the valley of the Mohawk, even in the city of Utica," are not, I believe, denied by even its most prejudiced readers. One gentleman, I hear, has asserted, however, that it is not true now, because the fine carpet of the first church has been taken up since the "lawyers, doctors, merchants, and great men" have went down on their knees at the sound of the music. Be that as it may, the sermon has caused "no small stir" in this place, and whatever may be its merits, our fervent prayer is that it may do much good to all who read it, and that the blessing of God may rest on its worthy author, however much he may differ in faith from A. B. G.

DELEGATES' EXPENCES.

I have been requested to call the attention of our societies to the resolution, passed at the last session of the State Convention, providing for the payment of the expences of delegates to the State and United States Conventions. The justice, propriety, and even good policy, of such a measure, have been so often stated, as to need no remarks; but it has been suggested, that a renewed publication of that resolution, and the mention of a day for putting it into practice, would be beneficial. The following is the resolution:—

The committee to report a plan for defraying the expenses of delegates, etc., reported the following, which was adopted.

Whereas the annual expenses of delegates to the respective Associations, and to the State and General Conventions, amount to a heavy and often burdensome tax on such delegates, which hitherto has been generally borne by themselves alone, therefore,

Resolved, That this Convention recommend the following plan to general adoption, by our order throughout the State—viz. That each society take up a collection on some Sabbath shortly preceding the annual meeting of the Association to which it belongs, and send the amount of said collection to the Standing Clerk of said Association—that said clerk shall defray the expenses of the delegates to the Association so far as necessary, not exceeding one-third of the whole amount received—that the delegates to the State Convention, appointed by the said Association, carry the remainder of said funds to the Standing Clerk of the State Convention at its next session, to be equitably expended by him in defraying the expenses of the delegates attending the next session of the United States Convention, having regard to the distances travelled and the expenses incurred by each.

Resolved, That the Standing Clerk of this Convention be required to keep a correct account and vouchers of all expenditures, and to report them annually to this Convention—and that each Association be requested to require a similar proceeding from its Standing Clerk for the information of the societies contributing to such funds.

Resolved, That it be recommended to each pastor of one or more societies, to mention and urge the taking up of said collections for the purposes above named.

I am further requested to state, that the first Sunday in May is proposed as the day on which all Universalist societies assembled for public worship, shall take up said collection, and place it in the hands of their Treasurer, to be by him paid over to the regularly appointed delegates.

But as some societies will not have preaching on that day, it is suggested that all such societies take up their collections on the first Sunday after the above named, on which they hold regular meetings.

The above suggestions are particularly intended for the Central Association; but if they are of any use to any other societies, good will be done by their adoption in other Associations also. Preachers will notice, by the last of the above resolutions, that the Convention relies on them to propose the measure to the several societies to which they minister and to carry the measure into effect. A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

Removals.—Br. C. S. Hussey, of South Lyndeboro', N. H., has removed to Pottsville, Schuylkill county, Pa. —where he wishes to be addressed in future. Br. J. W. Talbot has removed from Boxboro' to Warren, Mass. Br. Sylvanus Cobb, from Malden to Waltham, Mass. Br. H. Beckwith, from Dunstable, Mass., to Amoskeag, N. H.—Br. W. H. Waggoner, of Eatonville, has engaged to remove to Watertown, to succeed Br. Morse; and will commence his labors there on the fifth Sunday inst., after which he wishes to be addressed there. Br. L. C. Marvin has removed from Newark, N. J., to Braman's Corners, Schenectada county, N. Y.—and wishes to be addressed accordingly. Br. H. Belding, of Duanesburg has removed to Fort Plain —and Br. H. Lyon, of Fort-Plain, is at present in New-York.—Br. H. Bacon, of East Cambridge, has received and accepted an invitation to become pastor of the society in Haverhill, Mass. Br. R. O. Williams, of Conn., has received and accepted an invitation to settle with the society, in Dover, N. H.

New Societies.—A new society was formed in Franklin, Ohio, under the labors of Br. Hoag, in March. Br. Manford, of Dayton, Ohio, in a letter to the Glad Tidings, says a society of 30 or 40 members was formed in that place, who will probably build a meeting-house soon. A society was formed in Chardon, O., in February last, and a church of 23 members admitted by recognition at the same. Sermon by Br. Davis of Pittsburg. A society was also organized in Batavia, same county, in December last, under the labors of Br. H. Bell.

A public discussion on the question—"Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of endless misery, or universal salvation?" was to commence on the 12th ult., at Greenville, Georgia—Br. P. Brownson, of Mulberry Grove, on the part of Universalism, and Rev. Mr. Crane, of Talbotton, Baptist, of the other part. May God give power to his truth.

Br Bazin—Please send Expositor to Rev. W. M. Delong, Lebanon, Madison county, instead of New-Berlin.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. Williams in Madison.

There will be preaching on the 3d Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. Brown at Mexico, and at Union Square at 5 P. M.—Br. Britton at Black River village and at Carthage in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. Britton at Brownville—Mr. Delong at Erieville.

Br. Williams will preach on the evening of the 7th inst., in the school-house in Stratford St. (Madison).

Br. Goodrich will preach on Thursday at Page Brook, at 7 P. M. and at New-Ohio, Friday April 20th, at 2 P. M., at which time a society will be organized.

Br. E. E. Guild will preach at Harpersfield, on Sunday, April 8, at 11, A. M., and in the Stone School-house, between Hobart and Harpersfield, in the evening—at the School-house near Stoddard Stephens,' in Harpersfield, on Wednesday evening, 11th—at the Southern Church, in South Worcester, on Sunday, 15th, at 11 o'clock—at the School-house near Peter Hanson's, in Meredith, on Friday evening, 20th—at Colliersville, on Sunday, 22d, at 11 o'clock—at Jacksonborough, on Sunday, 29th, at 10 o'clock—and at the Academy in Worcester, at 3 o'clock—and at Richmondville, on Sunday, May 6, at 11 o'clock.

☞Union please copy.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M Phelps for A B and W V—Rev J S F, Darien Centre, for W S, R K, O S, J D, L R, S H and A W S—M W J, Marathon—P M, Howlet Hill, for S B, G H, I D, A L F and E L—A R F, Hammondsport—J B, Weston (Vt)—P M, Wolf Creek (Mich) for C H, J M B and D F C—P M, Gibson, (Pa) for A C, C C and A R—P M, Home (Ia) for self W E Y and D M L—P M, Chesterville, (Pa)—E C C, Athens, (O) for self P S, S P, F C, E H and J C—P M, Earlville, for self, J C E and J M—P M, Peruville, for S L, A A B, J S, G McK Jr and E W C—J L W, Hoosick Falls, for self, A G P and G P—P M, Clarkson, for J L—S J, Queensbury—P M, South Egremont, (Mass) for B J and O H—S S, Waterford, (Pa)—J B L, New-London (Ct)—M M, Rodman—Rev C B B, Hastings, for S C and G W—W W, Euclid, for self, J B, K W, W W and J L—J H, Clayton, for C P, G C, T J E, D P, R L, G S W and J S—E D H, Fultonville, for self and G F—L B, Canton, For D W, F C, J C, B B, N H, L W, S H, A F, T G and Z N E—Rev G S, Van Buren, for B E D and J E—Rev J L, Boston, for self, W S, J J, E T, T C, W C R, Z H, T O, E S, P C, P S, J F, J W, D F, N M J, L R, A A, E F, S N, A S, S H M and B W—C B, Goveneur for R C, S B, J C S, A G, W R, J S and E S—P M, Smithville, for S H D and S S—P M Gorham, for L G—C B F, Constantine, (Mich)—Rev J B, Carthage for self J D, S F, W F G and E T A—P M, South Edwards, for R L and J W—P M, North Lansing, D J and J C—R P, Canajoharie, for self, N B, D K and J D—J S Jr, Pavilion, for J S, P C S, S B, J S, I S, L G P, J C, E O, A W and J W D—P M, Watervliet, for J D S, D E, D W, W G T, E F and M H T—J B Bellville—P M, Gilbertsville, for W B and D W—S P Rush—P M, Braman's Corners, for E L, A B, N J H, J L Jr, A G, B D, J S, J K, J B, W A J, C F and C G—P M, Sempronius, for A D, J M, L D, R W and Z R—P T J Waddington, for B B, N B, A T M, S J D, C D B and W D H.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DEVOTIONAL MOMENTS.

The solemn night is closing round me fast,
Eve's loveliest star is glimmering in the West,
A gentle sadness o'er the earth is cast
And all harsh sounds are sinking to their rest.
A sweet, low murmur from the river steals,
The voice of slow and half forgetful waves—
And journeying to his wild and sparry caves,
The prince of storms his weary chariot wheels.
The clear, cold moon looks out among the trees
With a grave smile, like some complacent friend;
When mournfully beneath the lattice bend
The way-worn objects of her courtesies.

Thus, Father, bends my spirit unto thee,
'Mid the bleak deserts of her pilgrimage,
Nor doth the nursling to its mother flee
With surer trust in power that will assuage.
Abject and weak, oh Father, I have nought
But my necessity with thee to plead—
All things are thine and thou dost nothing need—
By earthly coin thy favors are unbought.
Yet dost thou deign from thy all-glorious throne,
To smile upon the meek and contrite heart—
Unto the mourner, of thy strength impart,
And to the poor thy watchful love make known.

Lord of all lords! Eternal King of all!
Within whose hand the earth is but a grain!
Myriads of systems answer to thy call—
Yet makest thou not one spire of grass in vain!
I gaze upon the deep blue paths wherein
Thy watchful sentinels untiring glide,
'Till thought becomes a dark and eb'ess tide,
And longer contemplation seems a sin.
Away, weak reason, that doth pause before
The distant threshold of thy goal is won—
Thy orbit is around thy spirit's sun,
Thy strength is love—"be silent and adore." J. H. S.

Towanda, Pa.

CHRISTIAN KINDNESS

What a fascinating character is the man of distinguished kindness! He is invested with indescribable loveliness; he may not have the glory in which the hero, the patriot, or the martyr is enshrined; but he is adorned in no common degree with the beauties of holiness.—He carries about with him the majesty of goodness, if not the dominion of greatness. The light of his countenance is the warm sunshine, to which the spirits of grief repair from their dark retreats, to bask in its glow; and his gentle words are like soft melody to chase away the evil thoughts from the bosom of melancholy and to hush to peace the troubled reflections of the distempered mind. As he moves along his career, distributing the unexpensive but efficient expressions of his regard, it is amidst the blessings of those that are ready to perish, and the notes of the widow's heart which he has turned to joy. When he comes unexpectedly into a company of his friends, every countenance puts on an appearance of complacency; and it seems as if a good genius had come among them to bless the party. As he looks around on the circle with a smile of beneficence that has found an abiding place upon his brow, he presents the brightest resemblance to be found in our selfish world of the entrance of our Saviour among his disciples, when he said "Peace be unto you!" and breathed upon them the Holy Ghost. Although he neither seeks nor wishes an equivalent, in return for his many acts of benevolence, his gentle spirit receives back, in a full tide, the streams of consolation which had ebbed from his own heart to fill the empty channels of his neighbor's happiness. Who can be unkind to him, who is so kind to all? What heart is so hard, what mind is so cruel, what spirit is so diabolical as to wound him, who never appears among his race but as a ministering angel? There is a magic in his tears, to melt to sympathy the stubborn soul of cruelty itself, which has a tear from no one else: and no less a magic in his smiles, so far as to relax and soften the hard features of envy, as to reflect for a moment the sunshine of his joy. While he lives, every man is his admirer; and when he dies, every man is his mourner; while he is on earth, his name has a home in every heart; and when he is gone, he has a monument in every memory; and this is the description of his character—the record of his praise;—LOVE IS KIND.—Universalist.

He is treated like a fiddler, whose music, though liked, is not much praised, because he lives by it; while a gentleman performer, though the most wretched scraper alive, throws the audience into raptures.—Goldsmith.

EXTRACT

What more glorious employment can man be engaged in than searching the Scriptures, when the sun of divine truth has illuminated his mind with the knowledge that the will, and purpose, and pleasure of the Father, in the Son, is to gather all in one, and make them partakers of eternal life, holiness, love and bliss? The doctrine of woe is a crushing weight on the intellect, and a cloud of sorrow and torment before the sun of joy; and as imagined proofs increase, the receiver's grief increases.

Not so with the truth; joy on joy increases with the strengthening faith in ultimate universal purity and bliss. The searching of the Scriptures then, is like the miner who has struck a rich vein of gold, and the farther he progresses, the purer, broader, and more extended he views the golden path, and only sighs because he has not power to gain it all, nor store-house large enough to retain it. Yes, reading the Scriptures with such elevated and honorable views of God and his designs, is happifying indeed, and proofs on proofs glisten before the eye, and reach the heart, penetrating to the understanding; and become like the rich notes of the full-toned anthem which strike on the ear, and engage the mind and heart till every thought, feeling, and emotion, is baptized in the stream of harmony; and purified from all that is sensual and earthly, the soul is elevated, ay, till fancy's ear catches the glorious notes of seraphic melody that float to the cherubic-circled throne where rests the spirit of omnipotent Love.

The truth of God—the doctrine of universal love and purity is a mirror in which is reflected the beauties of the adorable and perfect character of the Most High;—we there see love that never fails; wisdom that is unerring and knows no contingencies; power that is almighty and omnipotent; and goodness that pervades and enliveneth all things; and a strong and living faith in this doctrine will give a mighty energy to the moral powers; purification and expansion to the affections; and elevation, strength and soundness to the mind; scattering all fear, and making the heart the temple of love, the mind the abode of truth, and God the supreme object of the affections.

It holds out no inducements to sin by asserting that repentance can save from the merited punishment; but teaches that virtue alone is bliss in this state of being, which we should cherish as the children of a holy Parent. This doctrine can alone insure the prayer of benevolence, and the holy aspirations of our better nature, that fervently desires the happiness of all; and there is no vice that it has not a tendency to weaken, and no virtue, either individual, domestic, social or religious, that it does not strengthen; and beside it there is no true comforter at the solemn hour of death.—Ladies' Repository.

SCHOOL MASTERS.

There is scarcely any profession in the commonwealth more necessary, which is so slightly performed, as that of a schoolmaster. The reasons whereof I conceive to be these. First, young scholars make this calling their refuge; yea, perchance before they have taken any degree in the university, commence schoolmasters in the country, as if nothing else were required to set up this profession, but only a rod and a ferula. Secondly, others who are able, use it only as a passage to better preferment, to patch the rents in their present fortune, till they can provide a new one, and betake themselves to some more gainful calling. Thirdly, they are disheartened from doing their best with the miserable reward which in some places they receive, being masters to the children, and slaves to their parents. Fourthly, being grown rich, they grow negligent, and scorn to touch the school but by the proxie of an usher.—Fuller.

There is speaking well, speaking easily, speaking justly, and speaking seasonably. It is offending against the last, to speak of entertainments before the indigent; of sound limbs and health before the infirm; of houses and lands before one who has not so much as a dwelling; in a word, to speak of your prosperity before the miserable; this conversation is cruel, and the comparison which naturally arises in them betwixt their condition and yours, is excruciating.—Bruyere.

Indolence of body and mind, when we aim at no more, is very frequently enjoyed; but the very inquiry after happiness has something restless in it, which a man who lives in a series of temperate meals, friendly conversations, and easy slumbers, gives himself no trouble about. While men of refinement are talking of tranquillity, he possesses it.—Steele.

Nothing of an earthly nature when closely considered, can fully satisfy the soul.

MARRIAGES.

In New-Hartford, March 29th, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. DANIEL SICKELS, jr., of the firm of Brooks and Sickels, of this city, to Miss PERCES GILLETT, of the former place.

In Scipio, February 28th, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Mr. VOLNEY BISHOP, to Miss SARAH JONES, both of Scipio.

In Auburn, March 13th, by the same, Mr. JAMES P. BENEDICT, to Miss MARIA WARDEN, both of Auburn.

In Mottville, March 22d, by the same, Mr. MARTIN M. REYNOLDS, to Miss JERUSHA HUFF.

DEATHS.

In Auburn, March 6th, a son of Mr. Peter Freyzine, aged 2 years. His death was caused by morphine, which, unknown to his parents, he obtained from a phial, and in a few hours was a corpse. In life we are in death. May consolation be found by the parents in the Gospel. G. W. M.

At Jacksonburg, Mich., on March 1st, of consumption, Mr. ASAHEL HIGBY, recently of New-Hartford, Oneida county, N. Y., aged 34 years.—Observer

A most amiable and excellent young man, and a consistent believer in the Restitution. We sympathise deeply with his widowed mother, and numerous relatives and friends, in their melancholy bereavement. A. B. G.

In Greig, February 24th, of an affection of the heart, Mr. OLIVER FORSYTH, aged nearly 76 years. He had long been an unwavering and consistent Universalist, and died in full enjoyment of faith in the Restitution—literally breathing out his life with the praises of God on his lips. May the rich comforts of the Gospel of God, flow into the hearts of those who mourn. Funeral on the 26th—sermon by J. A. A.

AGENTS.

WISCONSIN TERRITORY

Cassville, Marcus Clark
Green Bay, B. G. Plumb
Mineral Point, Josiah Pierce
New-Berlin, W. Field Jr, P M
Plattville, E. S. Wheeler
Racine, Lemuel R. Smith
Sinsinaua, L. Gilmore
Troy, Levi Harris

ALABAMA.

Jonesboro' Dr J. Kelley
Mount Meigs, W. Montgomery

MASSACHUSETTS.

Boston, Abel Tompkins, Marsh Capen and Lyon, Trumpet office
Brimfield, T. Field
Cheshire, C. Hinman or P M
Cummington, West village, H H. Chesebro
Cabotville, A. Chapin, 2d
Danvers, Rev J. M Austin
Dudley, Rev J. Boyden
Florida, D. Thayer, P M
Lynn, E. Thompson
Methuen, Rev J. G. Adams
Monroe, Rev J. Barber
Palmer, C. Chase
Petersham, C. W. Millen
Plymouth, Rev A. Case
Provincetown, J. H Mason
Salem, Rev M. H Smith
Sandy Bay, Rev C. Spear
South Wareham, B. H. Gurney
Stockbridge, Rev A. B. Manley
Woburn, J. V. Pierce

VERMONT.

Allburg, Rev J. Baker
Bennington, James Bushnell
Brandon, L. C. Lawrence
Chester, Rev S. Laws
Corners, R. Straw
Finneyville, Rev H. Gifford, A. Putnam
Guilford Centre, W. Martin
South Shaftsbury, D. R. Allen
Stow, D. T. Allen, Rev E Ballou

CONNECTICUT.

Canterbury, R. W. Robinson
Danbury, Rev S. C. Buckley
Hartford, Rev A. Moore
Newtown, Rev F. Hitchcock

MAINE

Baring, M. Fowler, P M
Hiram, Rev T. J. Tenny

RHODE ISLAND.

North Scituate, A. B. Mowry
Providence, Rev W. S. Balch

NEW-JERSEY.

Highstown, Rev J. H. Gilson
New-Brunswick, J. L. Page

TENNESSEE.

Church Grove, W. S. Flemming

LOUISIANA.

Clinton, R. W. Patrick

CANADA,

Bath, John Dean, P M
Bayham, H. Smith, P M
Brockville, A. B. Dana
Chippewa, S. Wheeler
Delaware, A. Ladd
Godmanchester, J. S Lewis
Gosfield, J. Strong
Hamilton, C. Mitchell
Kempville, L. Clothier, Jr
Merrickville, Dr. B R. Church
St. Thomas, J. Chase, 2d
Toronto, A. Milne
Van Kleeks Hill, J. Griffin
Waterford, A. Murphy, P M

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months: $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, APRIL 13, 1838. NUMBER 15.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER VII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

RECREATIONS.

Many of the remarks addressed to young men, in regard to amusements, will also apply to ladies—especially in respect to the excess into which human nature is liable to run. We love whatever is pleasing. This love induces a continuance in those recreations which afford pleasure; and unless the reason is allowed to exercise due control, those practices will be persevered in, until they become sources of pain instead of happiness. It is highly important that young ladies should possess true views of the nature and design of the recreations proper for them; as an ignorance or want of precaution on this point, has been a fruitful source of degradation and ruin to countless multitudes of their sex.

What is recreation? It is not slumber, or stupor, or idleness; but it is simply a change of employment! Recreation to the student, is to go out to exercise in the open air. But to the man whose body calls for much bodily exercise, it is a recreation to enter the student's library and peruse his books. The young lady who engages constantly in needle-work, or any sedentary employment, to find recreation, must enter upon some active occupation; but she who is habitually employed in the stirring duties of domestic life, will find equal amusement in occasionally plying the industrious needle. The design of recreation is, by a change of posture and employment, to call into exercise portions of the body, and faculties of the mind, that were in repose, and to give rest to those that were active—health and vigor are the fruits of this change. When the brain of the scholar becomes weary, he should relinquish his mental struggle, and call into action the muscular powers of his body. But when the body of the laborer is exhausted with toil, he should rest from his toil, and call his mental faculties into labor, by reading or instructive conversation. Both will experience enjoyment, and be benefited by the change. But mark and remember, it is the change only that causes the enjoyment. When recreation of any character, is continued beyond a certain degree or duration, plainly indicated by reason, its nature changes, and it becomes a labor, instead of an amusement. This is a plain hint from nature, that all recreations in order to be valuable and beneficial, must be engaged in moderately and temperately. And I will here repeat, that to enjoy any amusement, young people must prepare themselves for it, by previous industry and deprivation, of a character different from the recreation to be engaged in.

From these remarks, it will be perceived that the gratification of the passions, is not the entire design and end of recreation. The healthy state both of body and mind, depend upon proper relaxations and changes. Nature is rigid in her exactions in this respect; and whoever violates them, must suffer that penalty of pain and disease which she affixes. Moderate and judicious recreation, therefore, is not only proper, but is a duty which must be discharged, to insure health. But still there is danger, in a greater or lesser degree, always attending amusements. It is evident that many practices called recreations, are not such, properly speaking. Some of those practices are plainly sinful, and should, consequently, be strictly avoided. Others are wrong, because they produce more injury than benefit—and others still, are dangerous, because although, perhaps, innocent in themselves, their tendency is to induce that excess which is evil. Permit me to cite your attention to a few of the most dangerous of those practices to which young ladies frequently resort for recreation.

Dancing is one of the most fascinating amusements of youth. It may be called nature's recreation. The various species of beasts in the full tide of their happiness, gambol over the plain, and throw their bodies into fantastic shapes. Dancing is a recreation resorted to by all nations. From the most polished circles of civilization, down to the wigwam of the savage, it exerts its "witching sway." In ancient days, and still among various nations of modern ages, dancing was, and is, one of the amusements, in times of exultation and rejoicing. The Saviour mentions, that when the Prodigal Son returned, there was music and dancing. National dances were formerly engaged in, when celebrating important victories. When the Israelites had crossed the Red Sea in safety, we read that "Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her, with timbrels and dances." When Saul and David were returning from the slaughter of the Philistines, "the women came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet King Saul, with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music." Dancing was also a religious ceremony of rejoicing. When the Ark of the Lord was brought up to Jerusalem, David danced before it as it proceeded "with sound of the cornet, and with trumpets, and with cymbals, making a noise with psalteries and harps." In modern times, a portion of the Eastern Dervishes, and a sect of Friends, called "Shakers," make dancing a part of their religious exercises.

That dancing, when cultivated as an exercise, is proper and healthful, is undeniable. Such an exercise for females especially, whose habits are usually sedentary, must be of a salutary character. But still, dancing has become the source of great evil. As it is conducted in our own times, it usually causes much more injury than benefit. The intoxicating beverage usually drank—the unhealthy viands usually partaken of—the improper manner of dressing, which so confines the lungs, that when they require the most play, they have the least—the late hours, the over fatigue, and the exposure to cold and damp—all combine to make modern dancing assemblies the prolific sources of dissipation and disease. Such convocations should be condemned most decidedly, by all who are interested in the welfare of the young. I would most earnestly caution young ladies against attending them, or giving them their countenance. They are not justified by Scripture, reason, or experience. But dancing in private circles, in the presence of friends and relatives, engaged in temperately, with proper precautions, I consider an appropriate and healthful recreation. It is the abuse of this exercise, against which I would warn you. The good sense of every discreet young lady, aided by the advice of parents or guardians, will instruct her as to the proper time and occasion, when she should engage in this recreation.

Card-playing is often engaged in by young ladies. Although this practice may not be so deleterious as dancing, under improper circumstances, still, young women can pass their time in some other manner, far more to their improvement, both in mind and manners. A lady at a card table, always seems out of her proper place. There is something in its associations so masculine, so entirely opposed to womanly delicacy and propriety, that a female appears to step down from her appropriate sphere, in engaging in game with cards.

Referring you for further remarks on this subject, to what I addressed to young men; and also to what I there said on theatrical amusements, I merely add, that those remarks will apply, with more impressive force to the young lady; inasmuch as female character is more delicate in public estimation, and her sensibility more refined in fact, than that of the gentleman. I therefore reiterate here, with renewed earnestness, all the warnings and remonstrances I have there uttered.

There are many recreations in which young ladies can engage, that are both proper and beneficial. All amusement should, if possible, be made instructive, as well as healthful. Exercise in open air, when the weather is favorable, is highly beneficial to females. And a walk through the fields, can be made to instruct the mind, as well as invigorate the body. A slight acquaintance with the principles of botany and geology, will enable you to obtain much amusement and instruction, in examining the class and nature of plants and flowers, and the structure and composition of soils, stones, and rocks. The young ladies of this country, are generally very deficient in giving themselves exercise; and in this respect are far behind those of some foreign countries. "The English girls, it is well known, will walk five or six miles with ease. They are never afraid of the air. They do not reason as our girls do, that to be pretty and "interesting," they must be livid, pale, and consumptive; and in order to be so, exclude themselves from the open air, from walks and parks. But they reason naturally, that health is beauty, and that sickness is otherwise. English girls, it is said, are almost the only girls who climb up the sides of the Alps, or struggle ancle deep, up the ashes of Mount Vesuvius." "How often," says Miss Wakefield, "has an anxiety for the delicacy of the complexion, or the apprehension of her being a romp, restrained a girl from the indulgence of enjoying with any one, exercise in a sufficient degree to secure her from that feeble, sickly, languid state, which frequently renders her not only capricious, but helpless throughout the whole of her life." "Let the utmost attention be paid to the physical education of females, not simply to their diet, temperance, and cleanliness, but to the practice of bodily exercise. Let them have such physical recreation as shall be consistent with their delicacy of sex, and as shall serve to procure for them vigorous constitutions and sound minds. Strengthen their physical powers, and you may then give energy to their intellects, brilliant tints of beauty to their persons, animation to their spirits, and grace to their manners."*

Music is a recreation peculiarly appropriate to young ladies. I would have every young woman cultivate her taste for music. The Creator could have had no object in bestowing musical powers upon us, but that they should be developed and trained to execution. Music exercises the mind, and has a purifying and softening influence upon the disposition. This amusement, however, should not be permitted to interfere with the more vigorous recreations, or with the ordinary and useful occupations of life.

*Address on Female Education, by Rev. Charles Burroughs.

Social parties are proper for young ladies.—They bring different minds, dispositions, and manners in contact, to the mutual benefit of all. The time at such parties, should not be fritted away in frivolous pursuits and idle conversation. Useful and interesting topics should be introduced, upon which the company can freely and pleasantly interchange their opinions. To instruct each other in desirable accomplishments and valuable information, should be the general object.

It is hardly necessary to remark, that young women can find at home, many means of profitable recreation. Numberless little attentions and kindnesses to parents and friends—the instruction and improvement of younger brothers and sisters—perusing aloud some valuable publication for the edification of the family circle—all will afford the purest satisfaction and enjoyment. In fine, let your recreations always be characterized by delicacy, discretion, and moderation, and beneficial results of a corresponding character, will be your reward.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A QUERY. NO. 1.

BY REV. SAMUEL GOFF.

It is well known to every careful observer of the actions of the religious community, that there are persons who profess the Christian name, who frequently exercise a spirit of the most unrelenting hatred and opposition towards those who differ from them in religious opinions. And in no case is this spirit more clearly manifested, or more frequently exhibited, than in their opposition to those who believe in the final reconciliation of all intelligent beings to God. The idea that all mankind are to be purified from sin, exalted to an equality with the angels, and made partakers of the enjoyments of the saints in light—or, as the apostle has it,—"delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God"—seems to be so repugnant to their notions of the government of God and the plan of salvation, that when this sentiment is advanced, they are fired with holy zeal to put it down, and in defence, and for the protection of the holy Catholic faith. And they set about the work of persecution in good earnest. Nothing that can be said or done, with safety to themselves, is left untried for the extirpation of "heresy," and the upbuilding of the "true faith." In their foulest aspersions, and their most false and slanderous imputations against the doctrine of "the restitution of all things," they seem to think they are doing God service.

The spirit of religious intolerance and bigotry manifested by these sectaries on many occasions, is not dissimilar to that exhibited by the persecuting Jews in the days of our Saviour. It is also nearly allied to that disposition of mind, which seeks its own gratification, and the accomplishment of its own designs, however ridiculous and absurd, or whatever expense or injury of character it may be to those whom they oppose. And in this respect, it does not differ materially from the spirit of persecution that was exercised to its full extent, during the early ages of the Christian church. In short, it is a spirit which seems to be directly opposed to the first principles of the Gospel of Christ.—While the true spirit of Christianity enjoins it upon us "to love our neighbor as ourselves," and "to do unto others as we would that they should do unto us," this seeks wholly its own aggrandizement, and the degradation and misery of all such as dissent from its requirements. Their only object in many cases, is to oppose the doctrine of God's universal grace, and bring reproach and shame upon its advocates.

Now, these very persons are of that class who believe there is no change after death. This being the fact, I wish to inquire of these individuals, if they expect to be possessed of the same spirit in the future state, which they manifest towards Universalists here? If they answer in the affirmative, then I would respectfully ask them, in what do you suppose the joys of the future state consist? If they give an answer that will involve the operation of this spirit, I envy them not the happiness they enjoy in anticipation of such a state—for I am certain, that if man's capacity for enjoyment is increased in the immortal state to the extent it is believed it will be, they must (on the supposition that there is no change after death) be the most miserable of all beings. For who can conceive of a punishment more severe, or a state of misery more complete, than for man's moral capacities to be enlarged and so constituted, as to increase in infinite progression, and then to be continually exercised in acts of hatred, illwill and revenge towards his fellow creatures? If there is enjoyment in such acts as these, it must be nearly allied to that supposed to be enjoyed by the fabled monster of the infernal regions, in decoying unsuspecting mortals from the path of virtue, and dragging them down to his own dark and dreary abode. From the enjoyment of happiness like this, we would pray, good Lord deliver us. But I rejoice to believe, that these principles of our sinful nature will ultimately be eradicated—the world redeemed from sin—and every individual of the human family made the happy recipient of future life and endless joys.

Van Buren, N. Y., 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

REVIVAL MEETINGS.

BY THOMAS DUDGEON.

"Here some are thinking on their sins,
An' some upo' their claes;
Ane curses feet that fyled his shins,
Anither sighs and prays.
On this hand sits a chosen swatch
Wi' screwed-up grace-proud faces;
On that, a set o' chaps at watch,
Thrang winkin, on the lasses
To chairs that day." Holy Fair.

These lines are taken from the most eminent of all the Scottish poets—Burns; and are, I regret to say, a most accurate description of the spirit and practice which prevail at a Scottish preaching and sacrament, in a few of the most superstitious and ignorant districts of Scotland.—Very different indeed, are the manners and conduct in the more enlightened portions of that pleasant land. It is a subject worthy of remark, that in those parts of Scotland, where existed the most pure, brave and uncompromising followers of Christ, the Covenanters, the religious practice is now so debased as to have called forth the true and satirical pen of Burns.

I fear much, that in this country a parallel instance of dissipation is to be found. I allude to Camp meetings, Revivals, and such like. In justice to Scotland, however, I must say, that such a fearful desecration of our holy religion as is painted by the poet, is confined to day light. Can our protracted meetings say as much for their votaries? Let all those who deceive and are deceived, consider that in the primitive and best times of Christianity, no such criminal extravagances were ever practiced. Then, excepting on the occasion of our Lord's supper, devotional exercises were always performed early in the morning. At that season the mind is cool and unencumbered with selfish pursuits. In the evening, from the stimulus of food, and worldly passions, the pulse is increased and a slight fever ensues, the intellect is in a certain measure obscured and warped, and all the animal propensities become in a proportionable degree strengthened. In a word, we become carnal and devilish.

It would be a cause of rejoicing among sober Christians, never to hear any more of holy fairs in any part of the Christian world.

New Hartford, March, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CHRISTIAN SOLDIER.

The faithful believer in the Gospel of Jesus, finds himself engaged in a continual warfare. His antagonists are sin and error. These enemies he must meet; and with them, battle face to face, and arm to arm. His panoply is a heavenly one. It is described by the apostle, Eph. vi: 14–17. It consists of the girdle of truth, the breast plate of righteousness, the sandals of peace, the helmet of salvation, the shield of faith, and the sword of the spirit. With this armour he has nothing to fear from the power of the enemy. Though a host should encamp around him, he has nothing of danger to apprehend; for "the battle is the Lord's," and salvation is of our God. He will save the Christian soldier in the day of fight.

Does the devout professor of the religion of the Nazarene, realize the station he occupies? Does he know under whom he has enlisted? And does he desire to be faithful in the service of his Master? Then he must "watch and pray." Enemies are all around him—yea, and the worst of them, within! He must keep a constant eye on these, or they will overcome him. O, how strongly should he pray for the power of faith and love, to overcome them!

Soldier of Christ! Speculative theology will not give thee victory. Cold, frozen philosophy, alone, will not cause thee to overcome. A devotional love of truth must be thine—a longing after Christ and his spirit—a faith, hope, love in him, stronger than death. Then—if thou hast these, go forth, and shrink not when the battle shall wax warm—and fear not, though the spirit of darkness shall appear exulting in power over thee. His advantage is but momentary!

"Yet nerve thy spirit to the proof,
And blanch not at thy chosen lot;
The timid good may stand aloof,
The sage may frown—yet faint thou not!

Nor heed the shaft too surely cast,
The hissing, stinging bolt of scorn;
For with thy side shall dwell at last,
The victory of endurance born."

Thou wilt come off conquerer, and more than conquerer through him that loved thee. And how glorious will be the victory—a victory of love over hatred—purity over sin—life over death! May it be ours, through the strength of the mighty God of Jacob! J. G. A.

Malden, Mass.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1838.

LUKE XVII: 20–38.

The following are the principal questions which seem likely to be suggested during an examination of this passage, and these we have endeavored to answer with brevity; yet with clearness enough, we hope, for those who are earnest and attentive investigators of these ancient writings.

1. What object had the Pharisees in view, when they inquired of Jesus when the kingdom of God should come?

So full of envy and hatred were the Pharisees towards Jesus, that it is not at all improbable that, on this as on other occasions, they were digging a pit into which their intended victim might fall.—Probably the question was put that they might ensnare him in his speech. If not from this detestable motive, it is not likely that the inquiry proceeded from any motive more noble than curiosity. Frequently did Jesus, as well as John his forerunner, announce that the kingdom of heaven was at hand. Indeed, with such frequency was this proclaimed, that it is stated as the burden of the announcements of both; for proof of which see Matt. iii: 2; and iv: 17. Besides, as is very generally known, there was a prevailing expectation among the Jews of that age, that the prophecy of Daniel regarding the kingdom which the God of Heaven was to set up, was about being accomplished. If, then, these inquiring Pharisees had no design to entrap Jesus, it is altogether likely that they desired merely some gratification of their curiosity, regarding an event for which they were anxiously looking. It may frequently be observed in the replies of Jesus, that a direct answer is seldom given, at least such a one as to supersede altogether the exercise of thought and judgment on the part of those to whom they were given. Accordingly, we think, that in the reply which Jesus made on the present occasion, he did not give such information as was wanted, but only put his inquirers into the right way of thinking, and gave them some clue or data by which they might be guided, in the use of right reason and good judgment, to make out the desired information for themselves.

2. What is the amount of the answer which Jesus gave to the Pharisees?

We find that the very youngest of our friends, family, understood that the Pharisees and the Jews generally, were expecting a king and a kingdom of a temporal nature; and, therefore, we presume this is very generally known to Bible-readers. Every one will readily perceive, then, that Jesus insinuated that they were looking in an erroneous way for their king which had been promised them. They were expecting to hear that the Messiah had appeared here or there, in some part of their country—they were observing scrutinizingly for marks of a temporal prince among the descendants of David. In this expectation, he says, they must be disappointed, for not in this way was their king to be discovered. According to one translation of the words entos umon, Jesus tells them that they need not look abroad for manifestations of the new reign, they must all look within; while according to another version of these words, he informs them that they need look no longer into the future, daily expecting the announcement "Lo here is Christ, or lo there," but but they must look around them upon present phenomena, for he was already among them. Observe, how Jesus abstains from testifying that himself was the Messiah. Those who believed not the works—the miracles which he was continually performing, would not believe his word. To have borne such testimony to such hearers, would have been casting pearls before swine, or the sacrifice to dogs who were ready to turn and rend him.

3. What days are those which the disciples would be anxiously looking for before they arrived, mentioned in the 22d verse?

The train of thought in the mind of Jesus seems to have been this: The Pharisees are now eagerly observing for signs of their Messiah; and a day is coming when the faith of you who believe that I am the Messiah will be tested—when ye will think "the Lord delayeth his coming"—when, thinking that if I had been the true Messiah the old dispensation should have been abolished and thus my character established, ye will be ready to yield up your faith in me, and listen to the delusive rumors which shall then abound of Christ having at length appeared. In patience possess your souls, and give no heed to such delusive announcements. We know from ecclesiastical history, that this prophecy was fulfilled, and that many disciples yielded themselves not only to doubt the Messiahship of Jesus, on account of the still-existing dispensation of Moses, but actually fell from their profession of faith. We know also, that false Christs, imposter-Messiahs did appear and managed to work such prodigies as almost to deceive "the very elect."—If the above explanation of this verse be not satisfactory to any of our readers, they will find two others in Dr. A. Clarke's commentary, from which they may choose.

From verse 24–30, the narrative is occupied with another reason for patience in his disciples: His coming to put away the old dispensation and establish his own, would be generally, if not universally, sudden and unexpected. This prophecy was fulfilled; for even after the siege of Jerusalem had endured some months, when famine and carnage had swept away their thousands, when the Romans had destroyed a great part of the walls of Jerusalem, there were found Jews who would not believe that Jehovah had forsaken them, who still trusted in their being His chosen people, "and that yet, even yet, the power which smote Pharaoh, and Sennacherib, and the enemies of the Maccabees, would reveal himself in irresistible terror." My young readers will find no better commentary upon this and other references to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Jews as a nation, than the pages of Josephus' history of the Jewish war, or of Milman's History of the Jews. The history fully explains the prophecy.

The remaining verses of this paragraph are occupied with an earnest admonition to his disciples to make their speedy escape, when they saw the signs which he had instructed them to understand as the immediate forerunners of Jerusalem's destruction. If on the house-top—on the battlemented roof enjoying the breeze and fresh air, he exhorts them, on the sight of the Roman eagles, not to make so much delay as to come down by the inside stairs into the house, nor to wait to take anything with them, but immediately to descend by the external stairs and make the best of their way out of the devoted city. If in the field at labor, he exhorts them not to go back to where they laid aside their coats when they began work, but instantly to hurry away from the neighborhood of the city. As their lives depended on this expeditious removal, he reminds them of the fate of Lot's wife, and insinuates, that though following his directions may seem like throwing themselves defenceless upon the world, it is a much more effectual method to secure their lives, than to take refuge as many would do, in a fortified city. There was occasion for urging this expeditious removal, for after the Roman army sat down before the city, the insurgent party within put to death every one who attempted to escape, and the Romans without crucified every deserter they could capture. Some mornings, they had as many as five hundred nailed to crosses, whom they had taken in the attempt to escape from the city under the veil of night. Jesus informs them, that only by attention to his directions, only by making a hurried exit, could they secure their safe retreat—for even of two engaged together at work only one shall escape, and that one will be he that leaves all and takes to immediate flight: the lynx-eyed zealots will assuredly pounce upon him who turns back to make preparations for a deliberate departure.

Again we recommend our readers to the historians mentioned above. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

WAKEFIELD'S TRANSLATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

An intelligent young friend of mine, who had been brought up in a family where the most strict and severe discipline of the Calvinistic school prevailed, lately left the parental roof and journeyed to the far West. Those who have read the Life of Murray may form a pretty accurate conception of the manner in which my young friend was disciplined, by picturing to their imaginations a family where similar punctiliousness, and may I say sanctimoniousness? formed part of the domestic arrangements. In this family, a chapter of the Bible was read daily, morning and evening—but it would appear that this daily lesson from the "book of books," failed to render the work either an intelligible or an interesting subject of study. And, really, as such a perverse mode of interpretation has to be adopted by those who have previously imbibed the Calvinistic creed, such a result is not to be wondered at. At the West, my young friend was entertained for some time at the house of one whom he had been forbidden to visit or keep company with, by his parents, and in an epistle which I received from him, he thus mentions the different effects of the family worship of his heretical host, from those produced by that of his own family:—"You know that reading the Bible was as regular in my father's family as was the Jewish morning and evening sacrifice. To me this was always a dull, dry employment. The Bible seemed to me the most mysterious and unintelligible of all books, and with so little interest did I usually listen, that I could barely avoid falling asleep. I could never bring it home, as it were, to my business or my bosom feelings.—The frequency with which I have listened to it, or been forced to peruse it, has left the language of the Bible quite familiar to me, but I never read a book from which it appears to me, I have carried away so little meaning. Indeed, it would not be too strong an expression of the state of my feelings to say, that I was thoroughly disgusted with the Bible, and almost every thing connected with it. But, thank God, a few weeks at the house of —— —— —— have rendered this sealed book—this book of an uncertain sound, at once intelligible and highly interesting. Strange, that one whom my father always represented to me as an infidel, or worse, should have been the means, in all probability, of preventing me from becoming an open and avowed infidel, and at least, of inclining my heart to the study of the sacred Scriptures! Strange, indeed, but true! Mr. ——, reads from the New Testament in his family twice a day. This surprised me the first night; but not more than to find that with what he read and with his remarks, the chapter of the evening was the first that I had ever seemed to understand, or take the least interest in. Each day my interest in the book increased, and at last I sat down, at every leisure interval, to find in this formerly dull and mysterious volume, narratives the most interesting, and letters the most persuasive, affectionate and practically useful. It was, indeed, with unfeigned regret that I parted from this abode of intelligence, enlightened Christianity, and cheerful piety. What a revolution in my opinions and feelings a few weeks have produced!" Further on in his letter, my youthful correspondent mentions that his host used the version of Mr. Wakefield, than which I know no one translation better calculated to render the New-Testament to all, what it has now become to my correspondent, a book tenfold more intelligible, and a hundred fold more interesting than as it exists in the common or authorized version. Let him that doubteth try. A. N. S. S.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

HOPE.

"Cease every joy to glimmer on my mind,
But leave, oh! leave the light of hope behind."

How rational an expression of the feelings of every heart do these lines contain! How descriptive of the nature of man! Such is his constitution that a great proportion of his enjoyment is derived from the expectations of the future. This is no less the case in the zenith and descent of life than while toiling up its rugged acclivity. In childhood's fantastic hours, his mind is cloyed with the prospective delights of youth. In youth, "hope's blasd wreath" entwines the brow of manhood, and he feasts his anxious desires upon the bright visions of future distinction. When manhood's corroding cares press around him, he looks for happier days, until at length perplexed and fatigued by continual disappointment, he seeks a solace in the pleasures of anticipated retirement—the last retreat of earthly hope. And when retirement comes, its imaginary charms possess no relish, and wearied with pursuing the illusions of time, the disappointed soul concentrates its expectations beyond the darkness of the grave—grasps a hope that will not prove illusory—a hope based on the promises of God and from necessity ultimating in a glorious reality—a hope that gleams upon the pathway of age, and lights its enfeebled steps down the declivity of life.

How dreary, how disconsolate would be our existence, without the "light of hope"! Prosperity would be destitute of enjoyment, and adversity would be cheerless as the dungeons of despair. In short, existence would be a curse, for man would be placed upon a level with the brute.

Clinton Liberal Institute. J. M. E.

It is an incontrovertible position, that true virtue must be sought in a middle course, as extremes always lead to vice. Thus fanaticism and atheism form the two extremes, while pure religion is the middle virtue. Avarice and prodigality, where generosity constitutes the happy medium.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 21.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Richmond, Va., March 21, 1838.

Dear Sir—Yours of the 9th inst. reached me last evening, after ten or eleven days journey. It is related of a certain kind of fish, that it emits after it a dark substance, filling the surrounding waters with blackness, thereby to elude its pursuers. But I am in hopes the superincumbent darkness proceeding from the emission of your pen, will yield to the light which a few plain facts in the case will be able to produce. I shall not, however, follow the example of my illustrious opponent, by seeming "to sport with his frailties," and by charging him with "sheer imbecility," "singular impotency," "assumed stupidity," "truthless assertions," "wayward fancies," "total destitution of even an elementary knowledge of language," etc., etc. These and similar charges are all no doubt vastly polite, especially in a MAGNUS APOLLO of theologians and critics, and will serve greatly to enhance his honor and glory in having entered the lists with such an opponent! But as I aspire at no such high honors, you must pardon me for not bandying such phrascology or returning such compliments.

2. I have no doubt our readers, as well as myself, are desirous that we should "ascend from words to things," and leave, as soon as possible, a logomachy in the discussion of which the great literary opulence of my opponent compels him to assume la grande hauteur du mepris exhibited in your last. I should scarcely have returned to say any thing further on the second and third propositions, had not your last exhibited uncommon ardor and assurance in defence of positions I deem wholly untenable. A few passing remarks on some of your statements and the exhibition of two or three important facts bearing on those two propositions, I think will soon set the matter at rest.

3. You say, paragraph third, I "confound chastisements and punishments." I think these are scripturally synonymous. But if not, it is certain, if Paul speaks truly, that "all are partakers" of "chastisements," and if the Deity is not wofully disappointed in the results proposed, they shall finally cause all to be "partakers of his holiness" and "yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness." See Heb. xii: 6–11.

4. In saying you had attempted to prove endless punishment merely by the force of aionios and that you had no other reason to give, I meant to be understood relative to the second proposition, i. e., the discussion about aionios, on which we were then engaged. And I can now think of no argument you adduced in favor of endless punishment but the very word in dispute. You made no attempt to show from the nature of punishment, that it must be endless. What other argument did you adduce?

5. The mode you adopt, paragraph seventh, to sustain former evasions and denials relative to aphtharsia and athanasia, is singular enough, you assume that immortality is not an attribute of God, essentially and necessarily pertaining to his being and person, but is a sort of commodity which he has laid up as a possession, to which he can have access, and make such use, as occasion may require! Verily, my learned opponent is growing wiser in the mysteries of his mysterious theology every day he lives!

6. It is amusing to witness your efforts to evade the force of your own concessions, paragraph 8, relative to akatalutos, aphthartos, aphtharsia, athanasia, aperantos, and aidios. After admitting "that five of them embrace the idea of duration" you wish to neutralize that concession by adding of the six, "one of them excepted, they never but by implication import duration." Very well, if they import it by implication it is sufficient to sustain my proposition, inasmuch as you have not shown and can not show that the duration they imply is ever a limited duration. Yet for availing myself of the concession, you indignantly charge me with perverting your words! Strange perversion this, of a concession which, in attempting to evade, you do but confirm! You attempt to ridicule the idea of duration being attached to those words which you confess imply duration!

7. But to put a veto on all further evasion of your concession, or denial of my position, I now inform you that there is something more than an implication of duration in several of those words, and shall give my authority. Robinson, one of your own favorite Lexicographers, and in all conscience orthodox enough for any one, unless he be a thorough Catholic, gives perpetuity as one of the definitions of aphtharsia. He also says of aphthartos, it is "spoken of things imperishable, enduring. 1 Cor. ix: 25; 1 Pet. i: 4, 23, and iii: 4."

8. So far from being convinced by looking into dictionaries that aperantos refers to space only, and not to time, a much fuller conviction of the opposite is the result. Jones, in his Lexicon (London Ed., 1825,) which comprises the substance of Damm, Sturtze, Schleusner and Schweighaeuser, gives "endless, boundless," as the definitions of aperantos. It is here derived "from a pr. and peraino, to carry to an end, terminate, finish, execute, accomplish." Perasmos, the corresponding substantive signifies conclusion, end. Eccl. iv: 8. Robinson defines aperantos, "unlimited," and Loveland, "endless, boundless, excessive." I might multiply authorities but it is useless.

9. With all these facts staring us in the face, how strange the obstinacy that can still persist in denying the propriety of connecting any of these words with duration, or with punishment if the Scripture writers had intended to represent the latter as endless! Would it be absurd, Sir, to talk of akatalutos, aperantos, etc. punishment, when you translate the former, and the best Lexicographers define the latter, endless? The only absurdity in the case would be the monstrous idea that punishment itself could, by any possibility, be endless. And I am fully satisfied that the grand reason why none of the inspired writers ever applied either of them to, or connected them with punishment, was that they did not choose to represent the latter as endless.

10. I now proceed to a farther notice of aidios. I did not, as you say, myself derive the word from hades; but merely said some respectable critics so derive it. I made the remark because you so confidently affirmed that all the learned world were agreed that it was derived from aei. You now say I can not name one exception. I mention the name of Nathaniel Scarlet, of London, who in conjunction with Mr. Creighton, a learned clergyman of the Church of England, gave a new translation of the New Testament, in 1798, which was highly commended both by the Critical Review and the Monthly Review contemporary therewith. See a Note on aidios in that version; also a Note of similar import in Kneeland's Translation published in Philadelphia in 1822. I, however, concede that a majority of critics are with you, as to the derivation of aidios; and I have no disposition for a controversy about that, when we are agreed as to the meaning of the word—that it signifies endless.

11. But while I concede that aidios is derived in part from aei, I shall be obliged to cross your path in another very important point, where you say, "it is incontrovertibly certain that aidios derives all its endless duration from aei." For it has another and a very important root, which I must thank you for putting me in the way of examining a little more critically. It is dios, which Jones' Lexicon defines thus, "dios, divine (fr. zeus) divine in nature, incorruptible as salt is said to be. Il. i. 214; pure, serene, Od. t. 540.—divine in power, vast, immense, mighty, formidable, m. 104.—venerable, noble, dia gunaikon; divine of women. Zeus, gen. dios, accus. dia and zena. Jupiter, a poetic name for the high and pure air. From a Hebrew word signifying to command—in Arabic to shine—and is pronounced theia, and in Persian zee. Of the same origin as theos (God) or the principle of light."

12. Thus, Sir, we see that quite as important a root as aidios has, is the very name of God. It is this that gives it a much stronger import of endless, than aion has: for while the second root of aion, simply denotes being, the second root of aidios denotes the divine being. It signifies not only endless, but divine in nature. This, also, beautifully confirms the explanation I before gave of Jude 6th, that the chains there spoken of were the divine counsels, or the endless and changeless purpose of God. But you think this explanation only "helps the truth." I think so too; but it is a truth very different from the theory you attempt to sustain. Recollect, these wicked beings were to be held in these endless and divine chains only until "the judgment of the great day." Do you imagine Sir, because it was God's eternal purpose that his Son should die for sinners at the time he was crucified, that therefore his Son must eternally die?

13. In no passage of Scripture is aidios applied to punishment, though I think it would have been had the Divine spirit intended to teach endless misery. Hence, by your own admission that it unequivocally signifies endless, and my more ample proof, my third proposition is triumphantly sustained in both of its alternatives. In proof of the second alternative contained in it, viz. a word that could "certify us that God, angels or saints shall have duration without end," I will now add to the six words already adduced, the four following, athanatos, immortal, not subject to death, and akeratos, akerasios, and akeios, pure, imperishable, not subject to decay, undecaying; thus making ten in all. Do you wish more?

14. Like a drowning man catching at straws, you still feebly but vainly attempt to sustain your second proposition. No matter if revelation itself was overthrown, if you can successfully oppose Universalism, the truth of which you yourself are constrained to pray for! How reckless! Are you not aware, Sir, that the position you assume in paragraph 24, makes as much against the Bible itself, as it does against Universalism? If the Bible declares in one place that God will punish, or cast off forever, and in another that he will not cast off forever, what must we conclude? Why, certainly one of two things, either that the Bible contradicts itself, or that the phrase for ever is used in different senses or extent of meaning in the two passages. I take the latter ground: inasmuch as we know that God does reject, or cast off sinners for a season, denominated for ever, or for an age; and when in other and different connexions he says he will not cast off for ever, this phrase being sometimes used to express endless duration, I understand it in these cases in the latter sense.—But you seem to take the opposite ground, and as a Christian, turn suicide and would destroy the Bible itself, the basis of your faith, for the sake of destroying Universalism!

15. One thing more respecting aion and aionios. In my first letter, I showed that Paul (2 Cor. iv: 17,) spoke of a glory "exceeding aionion by an excess—a far more (or excessively) exceeding aionion weight of glory. I asked, if aionios naturally and necessarily signified endless, how it could be exceeded, and that by an extraordinary excess. The question you have never attempted to answer. I now add to this the three following cases from the Septuagint. Exodus xv: 18. "The Lord shall reign," ton aiona, kai ep, aiona, kai-eti, from aion to aion AND FARTHER. Dan. xii: 3. "And they that turn many to righteousness as the stars," eis tous aionas, kai eti, through the aions, AND FARTHER. Micah iv: 5. "And we will walk in the name of Jehovah our God," eis ton aiona kai epekeina, through the aion, AND BEYOND IT. These facts with what has before been said, ought to settle finally the second proposition in the negative, unless you can offer something in favor of the affirmative, from the nature or design of punishment itself.

16. In reference to your fourteenth paragraph, I will only remark that I wrote kolasis in the form that it bears in the accusative case instead of the nominative, for no other reason than because it occurred in that case in the passage whereon we were disputing, Matt. xxv: 46, and some of our readers who are not Greek scholars have the Greek and English on the same page of their Testament, side by side; and to speak of the word in the very form in which it occurred, would be more satisfactory to them. And in carefully reading through the Greek Testament in course some what of the Septuagint and such few other Greek works as have fallen under my notice, I have never found any law of language or etiquette that forbade such a course. Will my very learned opponent direct me to one?

17. I now come to notice your pretended reply to my ten arguments against endless punishment. On reading it, I confess I could not avoid thinking of the mountain in labor. I will not imitate your illustrious example by calling it "the superlative of the weak, beggarly," etc., etc. But, really, I am astonished that a man of your acknowledged talents and acumen, could not see that no part of it touches, or even approximates within hailing distance of my arguments. The whole of it, from your 17th to your 23d paragraph inclusive, is based on the false assumption that temporal sufferings and disciplinary punishments are of the same character, and to be regarded in the same light, as endless sufferings and endless punishment.

18. The amount of the whole is this, if temporal sufferings, and limited punishment for sin, are not incompatible with the happiness of saints, angels, and holy beings that witness them, and with the honor, benevolence, mercy, wisdom, power, and justice of God, how can endless sufferings and punishments be incompatible therewith? I answer, the one is but a means, the other an end; the one finite, the other infinite; the one limited, the other unlimited; the one merciful, the other unmerciful; the one a painful journey to a happy and glorious termination, the other an interminable journey of pain and wo, never ceasing, ever increasing, without the least possible good to any being in the universe. Here are radical and infinite differences between the two. You might as well ask, if it is compatible with the character of a good earthly father and the happiness of himself and family, to punish a disobedient son to reclaim and make him happy, why is it not equally so for him to lacerate, bruise and mangle his body, and make him as miserable as lies in his power as long as he lives, and to protract his life merely to torment him?

19. The case you cite from the 19th chapter of the Apocalypse is nothing to your purpose. For the language of thanksgiving and exultation is not used with reference to the sufferers of endless misery, that subject not being named, nor to the individual sufferers of even temporary misery, but with reference to the downfall of Babylon—the overthrow of a corrupt, overgrown and wicked power. But should such language ever occur in Scripture relative to individual suffering, I should regard it as evidence that the holy beings using it saw the end of the miseries and the good resulting prospectively therefrom, whether there were any thing said concerning that end or not in such passage; knowing that other texts do speak of the good resulting from such punishments.

20. In reference to your parable of the brute creation, I remark, that much as the thousands of animals of all species may suffer from man or from each other, or from any and all causes, they still love life, cling to it, and doubtless, on the whole, enjoy much more than they suffer. The notes of joy among them are more numerous than the notes of pain, and this proves that a benevolent God gave them being. We must all suffer death, sooner or later, and doubtless endure quite as much in its agonies as the generality of brutes, whether they die of sickness, old age, or are devoured by each other; and yet we esteem life a blessing, and cling to it, maugre all its troubles; and for one, I bless God for its gift: and if brutes were not dumb, so would they. But did I believe endless misery my doom, I could not bless God for life—it would be a curse instead of a blessing. I have never, like yourself, discovered that the rebellion of wicked men and spirits had any thing to do with the miseries or condition of the brute creation, either in changing the teeth and stomachs of lions and tigers from herbiverous to carniverous their hoofs to claws, or any other similar disastrous change. Will you afford me a little light on the subject?

21. In answer to the "compassionate" queries in your 23d paragraph, I will say that though I probably should not have anticipated, beforehand, precisely such a system as this, in all respects, for want of wisdom to see clearly all its bearings and results, yet I should much sooner have anticipated such an one as the present, than one of infinite and endless sin and misery. Nay, I should have anticipated any and every other system sooner than the latter. And so I think would God and every other benevolent being. When God had finished the creation, he pronounced all he had made "very good." And I believe all he ever created, was, and is, and eternally will be "very good," as it respects the final ultimatum, in reference to which the declaration was undoubtedly made.

22. You will pardon me for not replying to the rigmarole commencing your 22d and filling your 25th paragraph. I shall now sans ceremonie, proceed to the proof of the fourth proposition, viz. "shall eternal life (meaning thereby endless holiness and happiness) be, according to the Scriptures, the ultimate destiny of all mankind?"

23. Before producing the direct Scripture proofs of this proposition, I shall adduce some arguments in its favor, a priori, drawn from the acknowledged attributes of God, which attributes the Bible clearly ascribes to Him. And as you have made some objections to a priori arguments, on the ground of human ignorance of what will or may be, from what God acknowledgedly is, I shall preface those arguments with a few remarks.

24. We all do, and are obliged, whether we will own it or not, to reason a priori concerning God and what he does or will do. We appeal to the infidel in behalf of Christianity, on the ground that he perceives, even in nature, evidence of natural and moral perfections in God, exactly harmonizing with the voice of revelation—that the Scriptures accord with the best and noblest conceptions of God, and must therefore be true, divine, and have originated with him. We all reason a priori against Mahommedanism and Heathenism, that they can not be true, for they are incompatible with the Divine perfections. There are ideas of God too, that are common and universal among all enlightened people of every sect and clime. All acknowledge him to be infinite in wisdom, power, goodness, etc., and all attach the same ideas to these individual words. It is impossible for any one to understand wisdom to mean folly, power to mean weakness, or goodness to mean badness, or any thing equivalent therewith.

25. Moreover, all attach the very same ideas to these words when applied to God, that they do when applied to man, with this difference only, that in the latter they are finite, in the former, infinite—they are the same in kind, differing only in degree. If it were not so, we could have no just ideas of God, and the Bible must have been given to deceive instead of to enlighten man.

26. Now, it is conceded by all, that God is the best of all possible beings, and will do the best of all possible things. But what is the best of all possible things? I contend it is the greatest good of his whole creation, and that this must consist of the greatest amount of ultimate happiness to all the parts thereof. Well, now suppose he were the worst of all possible beings, and would do the worst of all possible things—what would he be likely to do? Why we suppose he would produce the greatest possible amount of wo and misery eternally throughout his whole creation, by making every part thereof as sinful and wretched as possible. If we suppose him to be a medium between the best and worst possible beings, we might either suppose he would place all his creatures in a medium condition, neither very happy nor very miserable, or else make a part of them endlessly holy and happy, if that were possible, and the other part endlessly sinful and miserable. The last is the result of your theory; the first, (or the result of the greatest possible good,) is mine.—Which is true? One question more: Was old Clootie himself, as Burns calls him, bad as he is supposed to be, ever accused of doing any thing as bad as creating sentient beings, on purpose to render them endlessly miserable. What worse thing could the worst possible being possibly do? Yours in all benevolence, D. SKINNER.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

ORGANIZATION.

I have been requested several times to furnish such a system of organization, as in my opinion would obviate the prominent objections to churches, and at the same time secure their legitimate object. The method which I propose, appears to me less objectionable than any other that has yet been suggested to my knowledge; nevertheless, as there are many brethren, more wise and experienced than myself, I dare not say a better can not be proposed.

I agree perfectly with the majority of my brethren in this State, that there ought not to be any such distinction among Christians of the same denomination, as church and society—it is opposed to the equalizing spirit of the Gospel—rears a division wall—is pharisaical in tendency, and absurd. A man is a Christian, or he is not—if he is, there is but one place for him, which is the church. A man is a Universalist or he is not; if he is not, who wishes him to join a Universalist society, as a pattern of our faith?—if he is one, he will do honor to the church. What difference can there be among Universalists, that some should only join a society, others a church? For these reasons, it is believed that there can be no such distinction among us as church and society, and that it is inconsistent. There should not be in churches any penal enforcement of the ordinances against conscientious scruples; the pastor, however, if he observes the ordinances, ought to endeavor to satisfy all others of his church of their salutary influence.

It is true that there are statute provisions regulating the organization of religious societies, and which must be complied with, but these relate entirely to temporalities, and can be incorporated into a church organization without any revelation of them; why should not those who are to regulate the temporalities of the church be of it, and officers in it?

As to the nature of the discipline which ought to be adopted, I could substitute nothing as good as is dictated by the Scriptures of the New Testament—these should direct us. It seems proper that there should be a covenant, that the members may feel what they have obliged themselves to do. Some may say this is "too much like the orthodox;" we will refuse then to be temperance men, because it is "too much like the orthodox;" why should we refuse to imitate a good example, because it is set us by the orthodox so called?—The form of a covenant, let churches devise, only have it impressive and Scriptural.

As a method for admission, I would suggest the giving of the right hand of fellowship. This is an interesting and affecting service, and is thought to be sanctioned by apostolic usage. Of the other ordinances, such as Baptism by sprinkling or immersion, or dedication, it would perhaps be preferable to leave them optional with the candidate.

That churches may be so organized as to dispense with societies, let there be two or four deacons, or wardens—a committee of discipline, trustees, clerk and treasurer—the two last officers acting both upon the external and internal affairs of the church.* To an organization of this nature, it appears to me, not even the most fastidious can object. I feel certain, if carried out, it would secure for us an advantage which we have never yet enjoyed; save us much mortification; bring us down to estimate our worth, rather than our numbers and pave the way for a steady and certain progress of truth. It would unmask the pretender, and unfold the character of the genuine professor. G. S.

* The trustees and clerk elected according to the statute provisions, and discharging their duties the same as in a society.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, APRIL 13, 1838.

TRUE LIBERTY.

Reader, what is true liberty? Is it freedom from all restraint?—uncontrolled dominion over ourselves and all in our power? No!—this is anarchy—one of the worst of social evils—a principle more inimical and fatal to true liberty, than the sternest despotism. That hurls the destroying brand from without—this kindles the conflagration within; that slaughters upon a warning given by its very nature—this comes upon us suddenly, and, lo, the dagger is presented to our throat by our own familiar friend! For an illustration of true liberty, look at the blest land in which we live—for a picture of anarchy, behold France in the days of the great revolution.

But there are three kinds of liberty of which I will speak. The first, is freedom from physical bondage—national liberty from the tyrant and his oppressions, or individual liberty from fetters or confinement. But it consists, also, in a due regard to righteous and equitable laws—to the rights of our fellows—to "the ancient landmarks and the fields of the fatherless." Is mobocracy liberty? Are wild riot, and unbridled excess and unrestrained action, true freedom? Is it not Liberty where the rights of all are preserved and held sacred?—where the cattle in the field and the treasure in the store house are rendered safe and guarantied to the owner by the laws of the land? True freedom, then, is liberty from oppression, confinement and chains on the one hand, and from riot, anarchy and excess on the other. And is not true liberty a blessing? Is it not a blessing to go forth, free as a bird of the air or an antelope of the hills, upon such a morning as this on which I am writing, (for it is a beautiful one,) and drink in life from all visible nature?—to feel your pulses thrill and bound to the balmy air—to rejoice in the gushing of the sunlight—to gaze with a vision limited but by distance, on the fair arching sky—to walk where you will—to run and leap, if you please—with no bounds to confine you, no manacles to encumber? Is not physical liberty a blessing? Do you wonder that the sick man pines for it in his chamber, or that the prisoner sighs, when the sunlight streams through his dungeon-bars like a dream of some pleasant land?

But secondly, more glorious than this, is intellectual freedom—the liberty of mounting up as with wings into the illimitable realms of thought—of exploring the arcana of nature—of gathering together the truths of ages, and of searching for the to kalon—the beautiful and the good. Oh! the liberty of thought, of opinion and expression, is more glorious than mere physical freedom. It is more glorious to stand up as Paul stood, though with fetters upon his limbs, yet with a liberty of thought and of speech which almost persuaded Agrippa, and made Felix tremble. The real slave is he who ever bows to the voice of popularity, or cowers and hesitates to declare his convictions at the frown of power! Place me upon a sea-girdled rock—load me, if you will, with shackles of iron—but leave me thought-free—leave to me the liberty of opinion—rob me not of intellectual freedom! Like physical liberty, this also has its dangers. Its enemies are bigotry, prejudice and superstition on the one hand, and recklessness, skepticism and ultraism on the other. We should guard vigilantly against these. They may either erect the stake, kindle the fagget, build the rack—or scatter abroad error, shed blood and destroy the peace of community.—The press is the great palladium of intellectual freedom—let it be ever kept unshackled, free from impurity, servility or bribery. Let each man utter his opinions, with due deference to the opinions of others, yet if he deem it important in justice to himself, to the welfare of man, to the best interests of his country, or to the honor of his God—let him by all means utter it! There is a moral sublimity in the sight of one man, standing up and uttering his opinion fully and freely amid congregated thousands regardless of the edict, the bull or the ban of proscription! It is a glorious charter—the charter of intellectual freedom, and may every man grasp it firmly and use rightly, the privileges which it bestows upon him.

Thirdly, "the greatest of these" is moral freedom—freedom from sin and iniquity—"the glorious liberty of the sons of God"! This involves, indeed, both the others, for where it operates perfectly, physical and intellectual freedom will be found also. Sin is indeed bondage—freedom from it is indeed liberty. Join the loftiest intellect with low and debasing passions, and give those passions sway, and he who possesses them is a slave!—the worst of slaves! We must struggle, we must strive, we must toil, we must pray for this liberty. Tyrants can not take it away from us, oppressive laws can not deprive us of it. We may be chained to the stony floors of a dungeon—we may be shut in from all means of intercourse of thought and opinion with our fellows, yet we should be free!—free with our own exalted and consoling thoughts—free with Faith's vision of things to come—free to commune with our Maker! With this liberty we are the "Lord's freemen," and there are no bonds or chains that can fetter our souls!

Let us war with sin, let us struggle against temptation, let us strive for this liberty—for ourselves and for others—until the shackles of sin fall from every human being, and, rejoicing in the light and life of true liberty, hosannas of salvation, freedom and redemption, through all the world, shall burst from every heart and rise from every tongue! E. H. C.

THE ORDINANCES.

I fear that our brethren who are in favor of organizing churches for the administration of the ordinances, will in some cases overshoot their aim, by attaching undue importance to one of them. For instance, in Br. Sanderson's article on "Organization," in this paper, he proposes that the observance of the other ordinances (that is, all others except the eucharist), should be left to the option of each member. Why not leave the observance of the eucharist, also, to the choice of each member? Would he exclude from the society every Universalist who would not agree to partake of the Lord's Supper? Surely not—such can not be his intention, though his earnestness in behalf of the observance of that ceremony has led him to state as much.

The truth is, many of us who never have observed the outward ceremony of the eucharist, desire the discipline of the church government incorporated into our society constitutions—and therefore, only, do we advocate a church government. Those who wish to observe an outward eucharist, with bread and wine, can then do so; but we ask the privilege, on our part, of enjoying the substance without being compelled to embrace the shadow; and believe that this privilege will not render us worse men and women, or prevent us from being as zealously affected in the good cause, as are our brethren and sisters who do differently. For my own part, I can perceive no difference, whatever, in our societies and members in this region, or wherever I am acquainted. Those who do not observe the eucharist by visible symbols, are, some of them, as cold and dead, and others as warm and active, as those who do. I can not, therefore, throw the whole blame of our want of zeal on the neglect of that ceremony, or attribute the prosperity and warmth of others to its observance. A thankful, grateful heart is the best eucharist—an enlightened mind united with it, the best mainspring of zeal and activity in the cause of God and humanity. So far as the Lord's Supper tends to produce these, and to bring the possessors of these minds and hearts together, it will do good; but all beyond this appears to my mind useless and worse than useless.

In conclusion, I will only add, that I speak for myself only, others must think and act for themselves—and that all attempts to give so much importance to the eucharist—to make it a kind of mysterious charm, a fetish, or talisman, or philter to induce religious zeal, only increase my aversion to aid in any wise in countenancing its observance, and to disgust me with the pretensions put forth in its favor. Christianity in all its parts, is a reasonable service, and I can well conceive how the eucharist may be observed in a reasonable manner, and have a salutary influence; but I never can exalt it above baptism, or dedication, or the right hand of fellowship, or social meetings for conversation, singing and prayer, or even above the social circle or the family meal, when conducted with a reference to an object similar to that embraced by the observance of the Lord's Supper. I know I am a great heretic in the estimation of our Partialist brethren, and I fear that the course pursued by some Universalists is not well calculated to render me less heretical in my views of forms and ceremonies. May God forgive the one who is in error, and keep firm him who is in the right.

A. B. G.

"TRY THE SPIRITS."

We should ever be active and awake in regard to error. We are liable to its encroachments in every way, and at all times. It comes in the garb of an angel of light, and we are deluded to follow it by its beauty and apparent purity. Again it comes surrounded with terrors and gloom, and by appealing to superstitions and by seemingly corroborating our fears, it causes us to believe a lie. "Try the spirits," brethren, "try the spirits." You do not live in the times of Romish power and mental darkness. You have the glorious Scriptures in your hands—read, examine, reflect and determine for yourselves. You have the faculty of reason, use it candidly, impartially, freely. The great book of nature is open to you. It has a thousand glittering records upon its pages and all of them truths—for they are imprinted there directly by the great Source of truth. The way is open to the throne of grace. "Seek and ye shall find." Go to our Father in the spirit of humility and the sincerity and fervor of prayer, and he will guide you. Banish prejudice from your minds. Eradicate every influence received from the mere opinions of others.—Be not deceived by appearances. Examine deeply into the laws of cause and effect. Learn to separate coincidences from miracles, natural occurrences from supernatural. Truth receive, error reject, for truth is eternal, and based upon that, we have an immutable and indestructible foundation. "Try the spirits," brethren, "whether they are of God." E. H. C.

THE PASSION FOR RICHES.

The passion for Riches and its influence upon our social, literary and political character, a lecture delivered before the Young Men's Association of the city of Utica, by James Watson Williams—Utica, Eli Maynard—1838, 8vo. 20 pp.

We return our thanks to the author of this lecture, for a copy politely sent us.

We have read with much pleasure, Mr. Williams' illustrations of the influence which the passion for riches exerts "upon our social, literary and political character." We think they would be read with pleasure also, and we hope with profit, by the public. It is a truth too plain perhaps to need stating here, that acquisitiveness is a predominant propensity of the age. It contracts our social feelings, cramps our literary energies and threatens to poison the streams of our political prosperity. We should be awake to this fact. Strange, that emerging so recently from poverty and obscurity, we should have taken such rapid strides towards luxury and effeminacy. Wealth, it is true, has dug our canals, and constructed our rail roads and built up our thriving marts. But these are not all a nation's glory. The requirements of the intellectual and moral are superior to the animal and physical, and if these are neglected, we do more than commit an error—we sin! And I would ask if the monuments of our moral and intellectual greatness, are equal to those which display our wealth and power? Are our morals any better than they were fifty years ago?—are they as good? Wealth has not generally proved the best of friends to virtue. Depend upon it, we have too much to do with golden dreams. There is too much avarice—too much grasping after riches—too much neglect of the intellectual and the moral!—We must act upon these startling truths—we must be up and doing!

We recommend the pamphlet mentioned above, to the public. We hope it will be in the hands of all who are interested in the welfare of our beloved country, and that it will be the means of arousing the public at large to a sense of the dangers to which we are exposed.

E. H. C.

"Strictures on Religious Tests, with special reference to the late Reform Convention. By Abel C. Thomas." Philadelphia—J. Richards, printer—pp. 24, 12mo.—A Convention has lately been held in Pennsylvania, to alter or amend the Constitution of that State, and submit their alterations to the people for adoption or rejection. Art. 9, Sect. 4, of the old (or present) Constitution reads, that "no person who acknowledges the being of a God, and a future state of rewards and punishments, shall, on account of his religious sentiments, be disqualified to hold any office or place of trust or profit under this commonwealth." This ambiguous clause (for, as it has caused much contrariety of views and practice, it must be ambiguous to some minds,) only secures such a believer from disqualification on account of his opinions; and does not say that any one disbelieving those sentiments shall be disqualified. However, the liberal and tolerant of all political parties and of all religious denominations, desired that all citizens should have the same security from disqualification which is yielded by the above clause to the believers in the two sentiments therein named; and they therefore petitioned the Convention to substitute the following for Art. 9, Sect. 4—"The civil rights, privileges or capacities of any citizen shall in no way be affected, diminished or enlarged, merely on account of his religious opinions." This was refused, and the Constitution remains unaltered in this particular. Hence this pamphlet, reviewing the whole course of Pennsylvania, from its settlement to the present time—comparing its present illiberality with its former liberal policy and the policy of all the other States—nineteen of which, and the federal Constitution, expressly disallow a religious test, while the rest institute one—and replying to the arguments generally urged in favor of any such test, showing its perniciousness and impolicy. It contains within its small compass, a mass of information and authority that cost no little labor to collect and condense, and I hope it may be extensively circulated and carefully read, wherever a religious test is in any wise favored or required—either to hold office or to admit testimony—that hypocrisy may no longer be encouraged, and honesty punished by government.

A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

The Murray Association held an adjourned meeting in Sharon, Medina county, Ohio, February 14th and 15th. Brs. Hoag, Hull, Sweet, Whitney, Davis, Tenney and Sage were present—five discourses were preached, and a concert of praise held. Adjourned to meet in Ohio city, on the last Saturday and following Sunday in August next.

Conferences.—The Hudson River Association Conference met in the eastern Union meeting-house in Nassau on Wednesday and Thursday, March 21st, and 22d Br. A. Bailey, Moderator; and Br. W. Wilcox, Clerk. Eight sermons were preached by Brs. A. B. Manley, Hathaway, Z. Cook, and W. Wilcox, to very attentive audiences. Our friends in that region are awakening to newness of life, and will avail themselves of the stated ministration of the word. "The society in Stephentown," says Br. Wilcox, "which has for some time slept in the dust of the earth, is coming forth to the resurrection of life. The prospect now is that one or two meeting-houses will be erected in this region as soon as business shall regain its wonted activity. May the Lord prosper the work, and hasten it in due time!"

Ordination.—Br. Phineas Hathaway was ordained in the Universalist meeting-house at Saratoga Springs, on Feburary 14th. Sermon by Br. Rayner—prayer, delivery of the Scriptures, and charge by Br. Haven.—Br. Hathaway's labors are divided between Saratoga, Greenfield and Ballston.

Installations.—Br. John H. Gihon was installed as pastor of the Universalist society in Hightstown, N. J., on the second Wednesday in February. Brs. Thomas and S. W. Fuller of Philadelphia, officiated. Br. Gihon's services are divided, half the time in Hightstown, and one fourth, each, in New Egypt and New-Brunswick. Address, Hightstown P. O., N. J. Br. F. Hitchcock was to be installed as pastor of the society and church in Strafford, Conn., on the 5th inst. Sermon by Br. Sawyer.

Removals.—Br. T. J. Smith has removed from Bridgewater, Oneida county, to Winfield, Herkimer county. He continues his labors, we believe, as before. Address—Winfield P. O., Herkimer county, N. Y. Br. E. Gage wishes to be addressed in future at Lima, (instead of Bloomfield) Washtenaw county, Mich. Br. J. T. Goodrich has accepted an invitation to settle with the society in Oxford, Chenango county—and has commenced his labors there. The desk will be supplied every Sunday in the year. Br. N. Doolittle has removed from Oxford, to take charge of the society in North Norwich, Chenango county, and wishes to be addressed hereafter accordingly. He will preach there half the time, and one quarter, each, in Oxford and in South New-Berlin. Br. John Simonds, late of Hopkinton, has removed to Nicholville, St. Lawrence county, and wishes to be addressed accordingly.

The Sentinel and Star in the West has been transferred by Br. Tizzard, to Rev. J. A. Gurley, formerly of Mass. It will be removed forthwith to Cincinnati, where all letters and papers for it must hereafter be addressed, to its new proprietor. We hope fervently that Br. Gurley will be well sustained by our western friends.

Report says that Br. Sanderson has issued proposals to publish a literary, news and religious paper, including advertising, at Ann Arbor, Michigan. It is probably true, though we have not yet seen the proposals, or heard of them from Br. Sanderson.

An animated discussion, which lasted for eight evenings, has been held in Baltimore, between Br. L. S. Everett, and Rev. Mr. Breckenbridge, Presbyterian.—The same general course was pursued by both parties, that characterized their written discussion some years ago—abuse and misrepresentation of a coarse and vulgar cast by the latter; and mildness and courteous reply by Br. Everett. Much good will undoubtedly be—and already is, the result.

Several items of interest respecting the state and progress of our cause, are necessarily omitted this week, but will appear soon.

A. B. G.

NAMES.

In No. 8, current volume, second hymenial notice, we are requested to say that the name Esther, should be Hetty. The fault, if any, was in my taste—preferring the proper and full name to the familiar diminutive, or "nick name," as it is termed. I may as well remark here, that in some cases the nick name has been published as sent us in the notice, (as Betsey, instead of Elizabeth—Polly, instead of Mary—Dolly, instead of Dorothy—Abby, instead of Abigail, etc.) and I have been taken to task for my stupidity in printing it thus; the offended fair one insisting (and very truly) that it was not her proper name! In other cases I have tried another tack, (for I really desire to see ladies as well as "things, called by their right names,") and very scrupulously changed all the Sallys into Sarahs, the Nancys in Anns, the Fannys into Franceses, and the Hettys into Hesters, or, (what is the same name) Esthers. But, alas! who has not read the fable of the Miller, his son and his mule? What others read and laugh at, the poor Editor feels and groans over. I love dearly those tender little appellatives of Elsie, Gracie, Letty, etc., among "auld acquaintance" and at "the cheerful ingle;" but when we go into the street, or the public assembly, or (what is full as public) clap a name into print for all the world to look at it, whether it is my diffidence or respect for others, I can not tell, but I dare not take such liberties without a special licence from a priest, or the fair one herself—and even then I use it with fear and trembling! Will some one please furnish a rule by which I may please every body, and myself, too, in this important matter? He shall have a patent for the invention.

A. B. G.

A REQUEST.

It frequently happens that we send our paper for some time to those whom we suppose to be responsible subscribers, when in fact, the papers are either suffered to accumulate in the Postoffices, or are taken by persons neither able nor willing to pay for them. Now in these "hard times" such dead weights are heavy for us to bear, and we would esteem it a special favor in all our agents—and where we have no agents, our friends, to occasionally examine the package coming to their respective offices, and report all such cases without delay,

G. and H.

Br. Rogers—Send Pro and Con to Amos F. Woodbury, West Winfield, Herkimer county, N. Y., and charge $1 to G. and H.

Br. Eaton's letter to Mr. Eddy in our next.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the 3d Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. Brown at Mexico, and at Union Square at 5 P. M.—Br. Britton at Black River village and at Carthage in the evening—Br. Williams at Oran—Br. Woolley at Hamilton.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. Britton at Brownville—Mr. Delong at Erieville.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. Smith, in Litchfield (Spencer's school-house,) and Br. McAdam, in Clinton—Br. Woolley at Madison—Br. Sias at Perch River and at Pamelia Four Corners in the evening.

Br. Sias will preach on the evenings of the 24th, at Blanchard's school-house—25th, at Zullars—26th, at Evan's Mills—27th, near Anthony's—28th, at Jenk's school-house—30th, at Theresa—May 1st, at Person's Corners—2d, at Watertown—3d, at Adams village.

The Central Association in Michigan will hold its annual session in Ann Arbor, Washtenaw county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, next. It is hoped that every preacher in the State will punctually attend, and an affectionate invitation is given to all others to "come over and help us." Churches and societies will be careful to send delegates properly accredited, and carefully instructed in relation to business to be transacted.

N. Stacy, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Stephen, (O) for J E and L B—P M, Three Mile Bay, for J C, H H D and J V N—P M, Canajoharie Centre, for S C—Rev T C E, Dunkirk—P W G, Pleasant Valley, for self, E M, P J and R T—L B, Parma—Rev S R S, Albany, for A McK and J McK—J F S, Lawrenceville, for E N, H A B, D C B, J L, R B, J P and R A—I. E H, Akron—P M, Newbury (O) for A U and S J—P G, Gustavus, (O) for self, G W P, E N B, J P, L P, A M, D S and B T V—Rev E M W, Cazenovia, for J E and S R—C P J, Tabius—P M, Knoxville, (Pa) for A K and D C—P M East Clarendon, (Vt) for W K and I S D—P M, Madison, (O) for self, I H, H S, I R R, A A, D B, W W and S S—P M, Erieville, for R B, G W, C J, S S, B T and H D W—P M, Town Line, for I J, J W and T P B—P M, Hamilton, for J M—A M, Manlius, for self, D S, S G and A D—C B, Oran, for self, W C W, G S, G F H, S C, P M, L M, P A, C F, E B, E T, E A, J T, S H, S C H, W J C, A M B, J A S and S J—A P, Stockbridge, for B W, H D, W T, G S, A R and J N—J N, Pine Ridge, for A C, N N, S G, A W, W H E H and J C—P M, Fosterville, for E A D—S C, Conewango, for J McC and J L—C D, Victory, for self and I P—E L, Parishville, for self, P D, A L, B P, F P, F P and B T—P M, Otto, for Rev P P F and J D—Rev J H S, Centreville, for W B, W T, R C and J F B—P M, Johnsburg for R and S—S A, Carrol, for A A and J C—E M, Copenhagen, for self and J R—P M, Farmingham, for W W, H C, G L, J W and J P—E A M, Apulia, for B W, R B, V B, I N, T N W, J J and D A—P M Tully, for L B, G W W, S A, S F, R F, E F, A S and A W,

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE WATERS.

Oh! mighty are the waters—
When they rush and roar along;
With the notes of their grand jubilee
That thunder into song.
The torrent, whose proud echoes shake
The mountain's lofty dome—
The cataract, with its rainbow crest
And garb of glittering foam.

Oh! lovely are the waters—
The glad, free streams of earth—
The fountains with their gush of light,
The rills in all their mirth.
And the placid lakes—as mysteries,
Among the hills they seem,
When the stars glide o'er them silently,
Like bright things in a dream.

Oh! glorious are the waters—
Where haughty navies ride—
Or the wealth and lore of busy marts
Sweep o'er the flowing tide—
The noble rivers, as they roll
By fields of plumy grain—
Or bear the sounds of loom and forge
Far onward to the main.

Oh! pleasant are the waters—
They light the darksome glen,
They gladden all the wilderness,
They cheer the hearts of men.
They sing our childhood's songs, in tones
Unchanged by grief or wo,
And old, familiar memories haunt
The places where they flow.

And then the ocean, where the crests
Of warrior billows tower,
And the storms ride free—oh! who can tell
Its grandeur and its power?
It is the soul's interpreter,
That vast, mysterious sea—
A scroll, from which the spirit reads
And knows eternity.

God of the waters! lo! they gush
And move, at Thy command—
Thou sett'st their bounds, and holdest them
In the hollow of thy hand!
So rule our hearts, that all their springs
May flow direct from Thee—
Their streams all holiness and love,
Their depths all purity!

E. H. C.

SABBATH MUSINGS.

While all here is still, as if the breezes had forgotten their accustomed haunt, how that single elm on the lawn shivers and stoops, as if an invisible giant were uprooting it for a trophy! The gust is coming, lighting here and there on the tree-tops, and rolling blackness and tempest before it. Far off the commotion begins. How the roar swells as it approaches, rushing, driving athwart the ivied stems, and whistling among the tossing boughs above! The terrified birds come fluttering each from its domestic tree. How that boy's light laugh mingles with the uproar as he rocks fearlessly in his lofty seat! He feels not more than I that these are tokens of wrath around us, or that these heavy drops are signs of Nature's sorrow. Human joy overflows in tears; and why should not the oppression of her solemn joy be removed in like manner? What a brimming shower! and the sun already gleaming again on the thousand tricklings from the shining leaves which refuse to retain their liquid burden! The whole grove glitters as if beneath the spray of Niagara. In a moment the chill is gone, and but for the pearls which gem those pendant crowns, the gust and the shower might be supposed the dream of a spring noon, the creation of preceding thoughts.

Thus may end, thus will end the storms of the spirit; and in bright and harmonious praise, like that which greets my senses now, shall man bear his part when the vicissitudes of his early day are passed. Praise, praise alone shall be the end, as it ought to be the beginning of devotion, though praise must change and advance its character as the mind of the worshipper advances. The infant's first communion should be praise. He knows, or ought to know, no fear; he knows, or ought to know, no want: for what then should he petition? When he learns that others have wants, he begins to petition for them, and in time for himself. When he becomes a subject of conscience, he is led to confession and to intercession. All this time, praise should be the beginning and end of his communion: praise, first for the low good of which alone he is sensible: then for each new glimpse of glory which his opening vision reveals, till his thanksgivings reach the ends of the earth, and compass the starry heavens. Of the more sacred heights and depths which teem with realities instead of shadows, he knows not yet, nor has learned to praise creative and preserving power as manifested in the external creation for its true grandeur and ulterior purposes. Of the spiritual creation he knows nothing till long after he has been accustomed to adore the Maker of unnumbered worlds. When the rich mysteries of the sublimer creation become dimly discerned, he petitions less fervently for external good. As they wax clearer, his fears perish, his desires subside, his hopes pass through perpetual mutations till they become incorruptible, and his praise is of a kindred nature, however far inferior to that of the unseen world. He thenceforth regards the moving heavens only as they send their melodies through the soul; the forms of the earth only as they are instinct with life; and, no longer calling inanimate forms to witness his praises, he appeals from the infant on his bosom to the archangel who suspends new systems in the furthest void for sympathy in his adoration of the Father of his spirit.—Of higher subjects of praise man knows not, nor can conceive. It is bliss enough to discern the end of human worship, (in kind, if not in degree,) and and in some rare moments, in occasional glimpses of a a celestial Sabbath, to reach it.

O that our earthly Sabbaths could bear something of this character! But as long as so many ranks of mind join in its services, these services must be too high for some, and too low for others. Blessed is the season to multitudes, and holy its rites to innumerable worshippers. But its benefits are of a specific kind; its devotion is peculiar, and can in no degree supply the place of private communion. Alas, then, for those who join not in its rites; and alas for those who look not beyond its rites! Strange that any should turn away coldly from the divinely kindled altar, where multitudes are thronging to cast in their incense, and returning with the reflection of its glory in their faces! Yet more strange that any should avoid the still solitude where the fount of this glory welleth up for ever!

Surely there shall be solitary communion hereafter as there is on earth, a peculiar devotion of the inmost spirit, to which there can be no requisites of outward circumstances. Here, while good men communicate by heart and hand, while the pure bring to the light the movements of the spirit, there is a tacit reserve, there are workings which are known by each to exist in the other, but which are testified by no sign, and could be revealed by no such testimony. Hereafter, though that which is now an intermitting refreshment shall be then the prime element of being, there will surely be, amidst the most perfect congeniality, the most entire sympathy in a common joy, a silent recognition in each of a treasure of incommunicable peace.—Miss Martineau.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

Happy is he who knows a mother's love!

What is so pure?—The patriot expects fame, the friend sympathy, and the lover pleasure. Even religion while she waters her faith with tears, looks forward to the best fruits of her labors, and her love. But maternal affection springs from the breast uninvoked by the wand of hope, unadulterated by the touch of interest. Its objects, are the weak and the woful. It haunts the cradle of infantile pain, or hovers near the couch of the faint and the forsaken.—Its sweetest smiles break through the clouds of misfortune, and its gentlest tones rise amid the sighs of suffering and of sorrow.—It is a limpid and lovely flow of feeling which gushes from the fountain head of purity, and courses the heart through selfish designs and sordid passions immingling and unsullied.

What is so firm?—Time and misfortune, penury and persecution, hatred and infamy may roll their dark waves successively over it—and still it smiles unchanged; or the more potent allurements of fortune, opulence and pride, power and splendor, may woo her—and yet she is unmoved! A Mother "loves and loves forever!"

What is so faithful?—From infancy to age, "through good report, and through evil report," the dews of maternal affection are shed upon the soul. When heart-stricken and abandoned, when branded by shame, and followed by scorn, her arms are still open—her breast is still kind; through every trial, that love will follow, cheer us in misfortune, support us in disease, smooth the pillow of pain, and moisten the bed of death!

Happy is he who knows a mother's love!

EXTRACT.

Let me also urge on the attention of parents and guardians the propriety, nay, the necessity, of making the great foundation of all religion a part of the education of those who are entrusted to their care. Do not be content with merely apprising them of the truths which religion teaches, let them also know the ground on which they rest. This is not the age of implicit faith; the reverence for opinions, merely because they are of long standing and of general extent, is continually diminishing; error has now taken the field, and error of every kind; and it possesses in the peculiarities of the present times, facilities of access to every mind; its weapons are furbished, and its partisans are active; and should truth remain quiescent, and slumber on its rusty armor in dreams of safety, while the foe is abroad and active?—Teach, then, your interesting charge, the nature and the solidity of that foundation on which all your hopes rest; show them that you have not "followed cunningly devised fables"—that your faith is not an hereditary prejudice, nor your hope a fond delusion. Teach them not only that there is, but why you have the undoubted assurance that there is a Supreme and glorious Creator, who is both the Benefactor and the Judge of man—show them how his name is written on every plant, and shines in every sunbeam—let them see in all the wonders of science, in all the course of nature, in the curious arrangements and exquisite adaptations which the structure of plants and animals exhibits, the wisdom, power and goodness of the great Parent of mankind. Accustom them thus early to "follow nature up to nature's God," and thus, while they acquire a taste for some of the purest of earthly pleasures, they will be prepared to find the whole creation a most interesting volume of sacred theology.—Godwin against Atheism.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 3d inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. Benjamin P. Cook, to Miss Catharine Hadcock, both of Frankfort.

In Trenton, (Stittsville), on the 4th inst., by the same, Capt. Orson Umsted, of Whitestown, to Miss Paulina D. Grant, daughter of William Grant, Esq., of the former place.

In Wolcott, March 7th, by Rev. W. Andrews, Mr. William H. Palmer, to Miss Christiana Van Wie, both of Ira, Cayuga county.

In Lakeville, March 20th, by Rev. O. Roberts, Mr. John D. Rogers, to Miss Altheana Munson, both of West Avon.

DEATHS.

In Rapho township, Lancaster county, Pa., March 17th, of consumption, Mrs. Margaret Grosh, consort of Daniel Grosh, in the 64th year of her age. Faithful and affectionate as a wife and mother, she fulfilled her duties in life kindly and unostentatiously, and has left a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn her departure. May her aged and venerated partner, and her numerous descendants and friends be supported in this bereavement by the consolations of a Gospel ample in its promises as all the desires of humanity.

In Duanesburg, March 10th, Alice, youngest child of Edward and Alice Frisbee, aged fourteen months.—"Of such is the kingdom of God."

At St. Croix, West Indies, January 23d, Mr. Isaac W. Elmer, of Seneca Falls, N. Y., aged 38 years. He left home last Fall to seek for health in a warmer climate; but disease had already made such fearful progress, that he lived but a few weeks after his arrival in St. Croix. He died as he had lived, with full confidence in the equity of God. A sermon on the event of his death, was delivered to the surviving relatives and friends at Duanesburg, N. Y., on March 18th, from Job xix: 25, 26, by L. C. Marvin.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH.

Knickerbocker Hall, Southside of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, APRIL 20, 1838. NUMBER 16.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER VIII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

MENTAL CULTIVATION.

That female education has heretofore been lamentably deficient, is a position which admits of not a doubt. In past ages woman has been kept in a state of almost entire ignorance, in regard to the most important branches of human attainment, and has been compelled, in a measure, to occupy her attention with the trivial matters of life. Without pretending to decide the controverted question, whether the gentler sex are capable of rivalling man in the highest walks of literature, still, I do not hesitate to say, that they are capable of making far greater advances in every branch of useful knowledge, than they have hitherto done; and also that they can equal the generality of men in mental attainments, when placed in circumstances equally favorable. Indeed in modern days, many ladies have appeared as shining lights in the literary world. And although they have not so generally grappled with the abstruse sciences, yet in the lighter grades of literature—in vivid descriptions of the gentlest, purest and noblest characteristics of human nature—in the bright pictures of the imagination—in chaste displays of taste and sentiment—in reproof, admonition and advice—they have not been surpassed by their male competitors. The names of More, Barbauld, Chapone, Aikin, Hamilton, Seward, De Stael, Landon, Porter, Hemans, Edgworth, and Martineau, in foreign lands. and of Sigourney, Leslie, Hale, Sedgwick, Stephens, Hentz, Gould, Ellet, Scott, Dodd, Edgarton, Broughton and Downer in our own country, will bear ample testimony to the high and beautiful capabilities of the female mind.

Although female education, within the last half century, has been greatly improved, still it has not arrived at the perfection that is desirable.—The poor are engaged in such constant drudgery, as to be able to pay but little attention to mental cultivation, while the wealthy are frequently led to neglect it, by attaching an undue importance to showy rather than useful accomplishments. Young ladies, as a class, are still too prone to attribute more consequence to the adorning of the outward person, than the cultivation of the moral and intellectual powers—are too liable to imagine that their success in life, depends more upon beauty and accomplishments of person, than of mind. This belief many acquire, no doubt, from that fulsome flattery which is too generally bestowed upon female personal beauty, by the other sex. So general is this practice, that men of otherwise good sense, will frequently lend their aid in perpetuating this idolatry to the fleeting charms of outward beauty, to the neglect of those qualities in woman that are truly valuable. This conduct leads females to overlook their mental capabilities, to deem it of little importance to obtain those qualifications of mind and of habit upon which their happiness and the enjoyments of those connected with them will so deeply depend through life, and induces them to turn their whole attention to those charms and accomplishments, which are as empty and useless as the floating bubble.

Young ladies should summon sufficient discrimination to perceive the origin of this adulation. They should understand that those who indulge in extreme flattery of their personal beauty, either possess such ignorant and shallow minds, as really to believe what they say, that nothing is so valuable as the charms of form and feature—or, knowing better, they hypocritically express their admiration, under the supposition that you are so vain and weak as to be pleased by their empty homage! In either case, they impugn your good sense, and are unworthy your confidence or respect. The attentions of the ignorant and of the hypocritical, should alike be discarded.

I grant that personal beauty in a young lady, is an advantage; and when united with a sweet disposition and well cultivated mind, you have attractions that can not but win esteem. But I insist that loveliness of person without these valuable qualifications, is a misfortune rather than a blessing. It will surround you by the utmost dangers—by fascinations and allurements, from which, owing to the weakness of your moral and mental powers, you will escape with difficulty, if at all. And suppose by beauty of person alone, you succeed in obtaining a companion for life. Of what value can that man be, who has been attracted by your features or form, without deeming any other qualification worthy a thought? He connected himself with you for your beauty, and he loves your beauty only. And do you not perceive that when that beauty decays, as it inevitably must, under the influence of disease or age, his regard will wither with it, and that the after years of your life, must be spent amid vain regrets and unavailing repinings? "We can not help remembering that the ordinary period of life is set at seventy years. The empire of beauty seldom lasts more than ten or fifteen. What is to sustain the beauty who has no other possession, in the dreary interval, when her roses have vanished with her admirers, never to return?" If, then, you have been favored with personal beauty, add to it virtuous principles and the charms of a well cultivated mind, and you can then duly improve the advantages placed within your reach.

"It is an old remark, that the most beautiful women are not always the most fascinating. It may be added, I fear, that they are seldom so. The reason is obvious. They are apt to rely too much on their beauty; or give themselves too many airs. Mere beauty ever was, and ever will be, a secondary thing, except with fools. The most fascinating women, generally speaking, are those that possess the finest powers of entertaining the mind. In a particular and attaching sense, they are those that can partake of the pleasures and pains of their friends in the liveliest and most devoted manner. Beauty is little without this. With it, she is indeed triumphant."*

With the most plain and uninteresting features, you need not be without attractions. A well trained mind and a pleasant disposition, will put forth charms far more captivating to those who are capable of making you happy, and much more enduring than mere outward beauty. Although you may not attract immediate attention in first entering upon the stage of society, yet when your worth is fully appreciated, as it eventually will be, you will obtain a hold on the affections, that time can not annihilate. You will possess a loveliness which instead of being destroyed by sickness or time, will increase, and become brighter and brighter as age advances—securing to you, love, affection, peace and enjoyment, all your days. The man who is won by the attractions of your mind and disposition, is worthy of you in every respect, and will be capable of appreciating all those excellences of the heart which confer mutual happiness. "Knowledge, virtue and truth, are immortal. Time, age and death, can not touch them. Trust me, a plain young lady with a sound head and a well trained mind, and an amiable and well managed heart, will find some way to aim a sharper and surer shaft, and inflict a more incurable wound, than a mere flourishing belle, who has nothing to show but her dress and her person."

Beauty of face and person, and splendor of dress, are not to be compared in value to a well cultivated mind. The one is as evanescent as the morning cloud or the early dew; but the other is as enduring as the sparkling gem of the mine. "There is, and there can be, nothing beautiful, except in so far as it is associated with mind. Show me a woman who knows how to converse pleasantly, to give judicious counsel and exhibit discreet management—who has the ability to know what to say, and how to act on any given emergency—who understands how to economize her wit if she has it—who comprehends how the utterance of scandal distorts the countenance—whose passions and affections are regulated, and who possesses the intrinsic tenderness and truth of the female character—and I will show you one who seems beautiful to me, whatever face she may happen to possess. It can not be repeated too often, that there is nothing truly beautiful but mind. Ask a father which of his children he loves most, the pert and ignorant beautiful daughter, or the plain but sensible, docile and well instructed one?" Ask an intelligent, worthy young man, with which of those two young ladies it gives him the greatest satisfaction to associate and converse, the one with handsome form and complexion, but with an empty, uncultivated mind, or her whose personal appearance is plain, but who is well instructed, and sensible? "Ask husbands what points they most regard in their wives, their beauty, or their knowledge, amiability and good sense? I repeat again, there is nothing beautiful but mind! If I were a poet, you should have it in metre and in song, that a piony or a poppy are as splendid flowers as the rose. But let the one and the other be worn in your bosom, and compare their fragrance and value at the end of a month. Knowledge compared to beauty, is the rose to the piony and poppy. In the family circle, and among those with whom we mix every day, the last thing of which we think, after seeing them a few times, is their personal beauty." Their worth is always estimated by their mental endowments and moral qualities. The witchcraft of personal beauty is soon dispelled by familiarity. Without attractive mental and moral characteristics, it is impossible to obtain the enduring affections of any. "External allurements are continually losing; internal attractions are continually gaining. Sense, spirit, sweetness, are immortal. All besides, withers like the grass." When the mind is uncultivated and barren, in vain is displayed the brightest eye, the fairest face, and the sweetest smile. But even though the eye possesses little lustre, or the countenance little beauty, a well endowed, well disciplined mind, will elicit admiration and love.

> "Mind, mind alone, bear witness earth and heaven,
> The living fountain in itself contains
> Of beauteous and sublime! Here hand in hand
> Sit paramount the graces."

These remarks might be much extended, but it can not be necessary. I trust enough has been said to awaken you to the importance of studying to adorn the mind, and of imparting to it those

* Criticisms on Female Beauty.

mental and moral qualities which are so attractive to the eyes of the discreet and enlightened. You should not allow your thoughts to dwell too much on beauty of person, outward ornaments, or showy accomplishments. A proper attention to these is allowable; but make them not your principal study—neither rely upon them as your chief attractions to win admiration or affection. Their influence can attract none but weak and worthless minds. "Female loveliness can not be clothed in a more pleasing garb than that of knowledge. A female thus arrayed, is one of the most interesting objects—every eye rests upon her with pleasure—the learned and wise, the young and the aged of the opposite sex, delight in her society, and affix to her respect and admiration. Ignorance and folly stand reproved in her presence; and vice, in its bold career, shrinks abashed at her gaze. She moves the joy, the delight of the domestic circle; she excites the praises, the admiration of the world. A female thus armed, thus equipped, is prepared to encounter every trial which this uncertain state may bring—to rise with proper elevation to the pinnacle of fortune, or sink with becoming fortitude, into the abyss of poverty—to attain with cheerful serenity, the highest bliss, or endure with patient firmness, the depths of wo." Young ladies should cultivate a taste for the acquisition of useful knowledge—always selecting such subjects as will throw the most light upon the station you will probably occupy, and the duties you will be called upon to discharge. In this manner you will lay a broad foundation, upon which you can reasonably rest the hope of experiencing much enjoyment through life.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A CHAPTER.

BY J. W. CLOWES.

Time—how swiftly whirl his chariot wheels! how heedlessly he rushes on! Goalless, limitless, boundless Time! Who, whether living or dead, has not felt Time's stalwart arm, and strengthened or fell under its resistless grasp? Here we behold youth, just opening into manhood and vigor—there we follow the remains of age to the gaping tomb. But age does not alone suffice for the devouring jaws of the grave. Alas! youth, and loveliness, and prime, alike fall victims to its rapacity!

V—— was my school-fellow. I first saw him at school. We recited in the same class. Time, the producer and destroyer of all things, soon made us not only acquaintances, but friends. I soon discovered that my friend V—— was a hard student: through the window of his room, while others slept and dreamed away the hours of night in calm and sweet repose, might be seen the small, dim blaze of a "midnight lamp." Let us enter his apartment. We behold before us, a youth just entering upon the threshold of manhood. What huge volume is that which lies open before him? How steadfastly he gazes upon the abstruse page! How wan is that face! How care-worn those brows! How the sparks of intelligence gleam in those eyes! See, he smiles—hark, he speaks—(how sad is that voice!)—what says he? Simply, "I have got one lesson." Look again—the smile has left his lips—another classic compilation is before him. Hear, he again speaks—"I have but one more lesson to get this night; 'tis only one o'clock—by two I shall finish it; but [he sighs] I must rise at the ringing of the bell in the morning, else I shall not be able to get all my lessons."

At his recitations he was punctual. His lessons were well learned—he had studied them assiduously, earnestly, deeply; but, at length, a shade of melancholy overspread his fine features—the deep lustre of his penetrating eye, seemed to have lost its brilliancy—a cloud of care hung over that once calm forehead, bearing, as it were, upon its dark surface, the word "decay."

The Summer was nearly ended—our term of fourteen weeks had closed—the annual Exhibition of —— —— ——, took place on the evening of the day upon which it concluded. The rich, the happy, and the gay were there—the house of exhibition was "to overflowing full;" but still the anxious crowd pressed on, as if they entered but a "crowdless hall." The music sounds—all hearts are light, and joyous, and free. Now smothered confusion reigns throughout the house—now the call imperious, "Come forth!" is heard, and now the student-orator appears upon the stage. Every eye is turned upon him—but, hark! what deep, faint groan is that, which comes like the moan of decay from among the crowd? The press gives way. Whom bear they to the door? A pale and lifeless form—a student. It was none other than my friend V——. When taken to the open air, he soon recovered from his swoon, and on the coming day, revisited his home. But disease "had marked him for her own"—the destroyer had pronounced his doom! After an absence of several months, he again came back to school, seemingly restored in health; but delusion deceived the eye. He plunged again deeply into the intricacies and toils of study; night and day saw him with a "pale cheek and quivering lip," poring over those massy tomes the ancient world has bequeathed us: but the lamp of life waxed dim. He became sick, and again returned home, never more to behold those whom he had left. He died a victim to his own imprudence and misguided zeal. May his untimely death prove a warning to others, who, while they climb the steep of learning, may, like him, inconsiderately rush headlong from the precipice of self-ruin.

Clinton Liberal Institute, April, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1838.

JOHN IX: 1-38.

The following is the substance of a letter from a young man to his sister, and supersedes any farther observations upon this very interesting narrative.

My dear Harriet—I have been obeying one of father's most frequently inculcated injunctions to day, and although it has cost me some little pains, I think myself amply rewarded by the consciousness of difficulty overcome, of a father's wishes complied with, and by other pleasures resulting from my exertions. I have been, then, forming to myself a representation of the affair in the ninth of John. I have been picturing to myself the whole scene, and making myself a spectator of all that passed, as there related. I have painted the countenances of the principal actors, and penetrated into their hidden thoughts so completely, that I now have pleasure in looking back upon the scenes I have pictured, and can almost feel their reality as if I had been actually present and witnessed the transactions recorded by John. I will, now, give you an outline of my imagined scenes.

"On one of the days of Sabbatic rest, I was proceeding along one of the streets of Jerusalem, at the termination of which stood a splendid edifice of white marble with a roof of gold, from the spikes and jagged points of which, so thickly planted that not a bird could alight upon that costly roof, the rays of the sun were reflected with almost insupportable splendor. This was the Temple. As I approached it, I beheld issuing from one of its massive gates a man of remarkable appearance, whom, from his mingled majesty and meekness, a stranger might well suppose to be the Sent of God—the lowly Galilean. A crowd was accompanying him. He paused at the gate where, as I joined the surrounding multitude, I beheld a blind man who had there taken a station for the purpose of asking alms from those who went into the house of God. A small group near to Jesus were debating some question among themselves, and ever and anon casting their eyes upon the blind man, and then upon Jesus. I was near enough to hear one say, 'Who will ask him?' One, whom from the quickness and rapidity of his movements I took to be Peter, said he would, and immediately stepped up to Jesus and inquired why this man whom they were observing had been born blind; if it were a judgment upon his parents for some sin of theirs, or if, in some former state of existence, the soul now inhabiting that body had so offended as now to be punished with blindness and helplessness. Now I perceived that this knot of disciples had been debating some silly question founded upon erroneous views of God's government, or upon the Pythagorean and Pharisee-adopted doctrine of the transmigration of souls. I turned my eyes to Jesus and observed playing on his countenance, an expression of pity, which gave way to a look of authority, as he pronounced with some earnestness a contradiction of their vain supposition. A more appropriate inquiry, he told them, would have been into what good they could do to the blind man, rather than into what had caused his blindness. He told them that thus they might have been led to the same conclusion as he himself had been, for he had thus reasoned, that here was an opportunity of doing good, and especially of manifesting the miraculous powers committed to him; and wherever an opportunity of doing good occurred, there was a call to do it; and in this case so important was the purpose which was now to be served by this man's blindness, that it might be said to be permitted chiefly on this account. Such opportunities, he told them, he must at all times embrace, even as an industrious man employs his days to the best advantage, knowing that at night he must cease to work. I was sent into the world to disperse and dispel the gloom, the ignorance and the misery of men, and I must let slip no opportunity of forwarding the purposes of my mission. Having thus spoken to his disciples, he turned to say something to the blind beggar, and forthwith he began to spit upon the dusty pavement, and knead it into an adhesive ball. Here some one near whispered to his fellow, 'This is contrary to the law,' referring either to the working up the clay, or to the purposed cure for which he supposed it intended. Jesus having applied some of the clay over the eyes of the blind man, desired him to go down to the valley below, and wash his eyes in the waters of the fountain of Siloam. To this fountain, the only one in the city, I followed him, and from the firmness and animation of his step, I concluded that he was strong in his confidence of a cure. Nor was he disappointed; for after staring astonishedly about him for some time, he made his way, without a guide, up the hill to where the Temple stood. His purpose might be guessed from his gladsome, grateful countenance; but his Deliverer was gone.

"I now conceived him to be looking all around for Jesus, and his motions becoming the subject of remark by the by-standers, several of whom were conversing about him. One of the crowd went up to him to ask him whether he were the blind man who had formerly sat begging at the gate near which they now were, and the rest soon joined them. Soon a crowd collected around him, to whom he related the story of his cure.

"I thought that this miracle had caused a good deal of remark, and the Pharisees wished to hush it up, or detect the deceit if there was any. A few days afterwards I thought a party of the leading men among the Jews were assembled in one of the apartments of the temple, and there, with anxious faces, were taking counsel together relative to what should be done about this rumored miracle. After a long conference, and many opinions given which you can imagine as well as myself, I thought they concluded to have him brought before them in the Sanhedrin.

"I thought it was a few days after, and I could see this man, in the custody of some agents of the Sanhedrin, on his way to their council-chamber. Think you he quailed to appear before this temporo-spiritual tribunal?—I trow not. Before this supreme court our blind hero gives a plain unvarnished tale of his cure, and although a majority would set aside the force of the miracle because it was wrought on the Sabbath, contrary to the traditionary law, yet, at the end of the semicircle in which the judges sat, I could see a few of them collected around Nicodemus who were not satisfied with this objection, and could see no honest way of avoiding the inference to which it led the blind man himself, that is, that Jesus was a Teacher—a Heaven-sent Teacher. The ruling party now try another subterfuge: they deny the reality of the miracle. The parents of the man are sent for, and although they testify to the identity of their son who was born blind, they have more fear of the power of the court, and waive all testimony concerning the cure. Their Son, however, who is a great favorite with me, is made of sterner stuff than his parents, and no fears of excommunication can shut his mouth. In picturing his appearance on his being called before the Sanhedrin the second time, I gave him the look of one who is not to be humbugged nor driven out of his common-sense convictions. His replies are admirable, and will render this blind man a favorite with you as with me."

Let our young friends try the effect of forming to themselves such a picture. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SOMETHING NEW.

Truly there has "something new" taken place "under the sun" within a short time past. "And what may it be?" inquires the gentle reader. Nothing short of a union meeting—a union "protracted meeting" of two days continuance, conducted by Methodist and Universalist clergymen! The particulars are as follows. The Rev. Mr. Hoyt, (Methodist,) of Eden, Erie county, N. Y., preached a discourse at Abbott's Corners, same county, on Thursday evening, March 15th, from these words: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" In this discourse, as I am credibly informed, Mr. Hoyt challenged the "intellect of the whole world" to disprove his position, that his text plainly and unequivocally taught the danger of losing endlessly in hell the immortal soul! He also expressed a desire, or at least a willingness, to enter into a discussion of the subject of endless misery, and of the final restitution, but more particularly upon the "awful truth," involved in the words of his text. One of our excellent brethren of that place, was determined that Mr. Hoyt should redeem his pledge or acknowledge his inability so to do. He informed him, that he no doubt could be accommodated with an opponent, who would take up the gauntlet and enter into a discussion with him upon the merits of the text, or in a more general manner upon the subject of the endless misery of any portion of mankind. Mr. Hoyt, however, father declined entering into a regular discussion, but agreed that he would preach a discourse from the same text, and that any Universalist clergyman could have the privilege of following with a reply. Br. Pickering of Buffalo was made choice of by our friends, to reply to Mr. Hoyt's discourse. The time of meeting was fixed on Monday following, 11 o clock, A. M., at the Presbyterian meeting-house at Abbott's Corners. The time arrived, and the house was soon crowded in every part. Mr. Hoyt's discourse was characterized by considerable candor, and even ability, considering the badness of his cause; yet he utterly failed in establishing the positions he laid down. This we believe was evident to many of his Methodist brethren. The sermon by Br. Pickering from the same text, was sound and eloquent, and his reply to Mr. Hoyt's main points, logical and conclusive. Mr. Hoyt's positions were proved untenable even from the acknowledgments of Dr. Adam Clarke, which were produced and read on the occasion. The most perfect good will prevailed between the parties, and I doubt not but much good will result from this amicable examination of the text of Scripture at issue. Our friends were perfectly satisfied with the result, whereas some of the Methodist brethren expressed a little dissatisfaction, to say the least. The result was evidently a little different from what they anticipated.

Br. Pickering, previous to the opening of the meeting, expressed to Br. Hoyt a desire to enter into a regular discussion with him upon the subject of endless misery, or the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. He thought a course of this kind would be more profitable to the hearers, than a mere canvassing of the merits of the text at issue. But to this Br. Hoyt would by no means agree—he wholly declined engaging in any regular discussion with Br. P. His plea was, that he did not consider himself competent to engage in a regular discussion with Br. P.—that Br. P. could take grounds in a discussion of the kind where he could not follow him. Br. H.'s frankness was certainly commendable, but if he did not consider himself competent to discuss the merits or demerits of Universalism at the time he gave the challenge, he certainly should have been a little more reserved. The above acknowledgment must be rather mortifying to a man who all along, before his courage was put to the test, expressed the utmost confidence in his ability to put down Universalism! Perhaps this will be a valuable lesson to him. But to the protracted meeting.

Br. Hoyt had, some little time before this meeting, expressed a willingness to Br. J. Lewis to unite with his Universalist brethren, and hold a union protracted meeting at Abbott's Corners, for the improvement of the place, etc. The Methodists had held a "Quarterly meeting" at this place the Saturday and Sunday before, and had concluded previous to the discussion, to merge it into a protracted meeting. Some half dozen Methodist clergymen had therefore tarried for the purpose of continuing the meeting. Brs. Pickering, Lewis and myself being present, it was thought proper to accept of Br. Hoyt's proposal. Circumstances, however, called Br. Pickering to Buffalo the next morning. Br. Lewis and myself tarried. Two discourses were preached on Monday evening—one by Br. Hoyt and one by myself. I examined the main arguments advanced in favor of endless misery, and then proceeded to establish the doctrine of the final restitution by direct and indirect Scriptural arguments, etc. Br. Hoyt followed me, but scarcely made any allusion whatever to my discourse, nor did he make a very labored effort to establish the doctrine of endless wo! The sermon on the whole was very well delivered, and was characterized by a spirit of candor, and good will. The next morning Br. Hemingway, presiding elder, preached from these words: "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" He endeavored to prove that the escape was from an endless hell. I followed him, and endeavored to satisfy the minds of the congregation of the fact, that this escape as found in this passage, was a temporal salvation, an escape from the awful judgments which were about to descend upon the Jewish nation. To this the apostle evidently alluded—this is the opinion of some eminent orthodox commentators. I then proceeded to deliver a discourse in proof of the positive certainty of the punishment for sin. Br. Hemingway seemed to think that I had preached terror enough, or punishment enough, if I understood him, but that I had left the congregation "in the dark" where the punishment was to be received! I am sure that I was sufficiently definite on this point, for I quoted the language of the wise man, that "the righteous are recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner." Prov. xi: 31. Br. Lewis preached in the evening. His text was, "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul." Psa. xix: 37. It was a sound and an able discourse. Those acquainted with Br. L.'s talents can well judge of its merits. Br. Hoyt followed him, but did not think proper to make any direct reply to any of Br. L's arguments or positions. Br. Lewis and myself expressed our willingness to tarry longer, if any of our Methodist brethren of the clergy, would engage in a regular discussion of the merits or demerits of Universalism—under other circumstances, propriety and other engagements would call us away. But our Methodist friends seemed totally averse to any discussion, and we therefore concluded to leave the next day.

I am well satisfied that a very favorable impression was left upon the congregations generally—and I am sanguine in the belief that much good will result from this meeting. A good proportion of the congregations were Methodists.—They concluded to hold a meeting by themselves one day, after we left—but the general impression was, that there would not be thirty hearers who would attend. We bid our Methodist brethren good bye, and they us, with feelings of perfect good will. The cordial shake of the hand, and "God bless you, and peace be with you," was the mutual exchange on both sides. I make, however, an exception of the Rev. Mr. Castleton, who attended the first day. This is the man that Br. Lewis has had something to do with. This man has been considered as a mighty champion in the Methodist ranks. He has fought against what he calls Universalism, bravely and untiringly, for a long time, and delights in it, where there is no chance of finding an opponent! He has, I am informed, expressed a willingness to engage in a discussion with a Universalist clergyman of talents—but not with a novice! He would discuss the "grand subject" of Universalism with Rev. D. Skinner if he could be had! At this meeting Mr. Castleton had a fair opportunity of engaging in a discussion with Br. Pickering, but he thought not proper to attend to it. He, however, undertook to have a little "bush-fighting" to do with Br. P. on the first day of the meeting, but was glad to soon make a retreat, without accomplishing any thing save being completely disarmed of every argument and position he laid down! The affair was really a treat. Some fifteen or twenty spectators were witnesses of the interview. They were obliged to smile at the evident discomfiture of the Rev. gentleman, yet they could scarce forbear to sympathize with him at his fallen greatness! We hope after this, he will learn wisdom, and be a little more careful in future how he boasts of his great prowess and his great victories in putting down Universalism. A few such victories would ruin any man! Br. Hoyt is a very different man, if we do not mistake him—very friendly and good natured—for him we have much respect. Will our Methodist brethren generally learn a lesson from this meeting? It was indeed "something new under the sun," but we sincerely trust that the meeting was not in vain. New things are often good things in this age of improvement.—Thus, Br. Grosh, I have given you a hasty sketch of this singular meeting. I wrote in pursuance of an urgent request from many of our friends. I think the account of the meeting will be novel and interesting to most or all of your readers.

Nunda, March 29, 1828. N. Brown.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

REASON AND PREJUDICE.

Youth is the season when the mind is susceptible of change, and when uncontaminated by early vices, is easily inclined to virtue. And when once thus directed, it will prove a strong barrier to subsequent vicious practices. Observation and experience have taught me, that principles early inculcated, whether good or bad, are hard to eradicate; and however erroneous the opinions we imbibe relative to subjects of religion, may be, if prejudice should get the ascendancy over our better judgment, we can never remove those errors until divested of it.

In the sober moments of cool, unbiased reflection, our reason oft-times condemns us—still we feel a consciousness of being right, and therefore will endeavor, to the best of our abilities, to harmonize reason with prejudice, and often at the sacrifice of the former. I would like to prescribe for my young friends a remedy for this evil, but as I feel incompetent for the task, I will only say, cultivate reason, and as it exposes error, be aware of its superiority, and renounce error, and in process of time reason will, I think, have regained its old possession, and prejudice will become extinct. E.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SECOND LETTER

To Rev. Z. Eddy.

Sir—I have this day had the pleasure of perusing your letter, in answer to one I addressed you more than four months since. I shall not attempt to account for your unchristian conduct toward me, in refusing to give me a copy of your communication, even after I addressed you a note particularly requesting it, which note you also refused to answer. The uncharitable temper of your letter, gives us ample evidence of the spleen that flows from a proud and haughty spirit, wrung with chagrin at disappointed efforts, constantly made, with a view to bring into disrepute the cause of God's universal and impartial grace, which you dare not assail by fair and honorable means.

Let unprejudiced minds read my letter in connection with your reply, and they will very readily perceive which contains the "bitterness and scurrility." And you may be assured, that your own friends are doing you ample justice, while they look on you with pity, and behold your affected erudition and sagacity in detecting an error in my orthography. The littleness of mind you there displayed, will show the size of the "napkin" required to wrap your "brilliant talent" in, and the adjustment of these affairs, may show where they will hide it.

The satire and irony contained in your second paragraph, and the low, bitter invective against the "Advocate," which you called "scurrilous" while in Carrol, and to which you may again apply for the privilege of vindicating your character, together with the ungenerous reflections upon your neighbors, are so apparent that a reply is unnecessary, and they show us your sincerity in saying, that you "considered the subject one of deep and solemn moment."

You accuse me of being desirous to appear before the public, and endeavor to make it appear that I forced you before it, than which nothing can be more false—it was the unchristian spirit and cold indifference manifested toward me, and your wilful neglect to answer my letter that "forced you before the public." Not one of our readers can find a single word in my letter to you, that would lead to the belief that I intended to publish it, if you were so kind as to give me an answer to the inquiries therein contained.

You are right, Sir, when you "apprehend" that you and I do not use the term "Universalist" in the same sense. I was aware of the "latitude" in which you used this term, before you made this public avowal. You refer me to Mr. Eacker, to illustrate your meaning—you are respectfully informed that he is a member of a Universalist society. We now understand what you mean by "notorious Universalists." This is seen in another part of your letter, where you refer to "infidels," etc., and ask if they are not all "avowed Universalists." Here is to be found the deplorable cause of the ignorance of so many, respecting our views. They are told by their spiritual guides that we are all infidels, and "what the minister says is true," and they dare not investigate the subject. You are not alone in this work of perpetuating ignorance—you have many "pious coadjutors in this cause." Be assured, Sir, I use the term "Universalist" in a sense that would include such men as Mr. Eacker, (who has so frequently reproved you for your notorious misrepresentations of our views,) and all such as you say are "amiable, moral men;" and if there are any others, they "hold the truth in unrighteousness," and are a dead weight to our cause, and may be classed with those Presbyterian Christians whose characters are not quite so "amiable and moral" as is desirable. You think a Universalist church would be a strange thing under the sun. Your real or affected iguorance of the numerous societies and churches, duly organized in the order, is truly to be pitied.—There are, probably, more churches than clergymen in the denomination.

I hope you will attend more "seriously" to the "charges." Some of them, you say, are false, and give us your "naked word" for it. I called upon you for evidence of this "assertion," "clear and conclusive." I regret, Sir, for your sake, that you were so destitute of the usual compliments of civility, as to refuse to point out to me wherein I was mistaken, when requested to do so in the most friendly manner. And because I fulfilled my pledge, and published my letter in behalf of the Universalists in Sheridan, (whom you treated in the most unchristian manner,) you have declared that I have set you up as a "target," and pretend to see "bitter words" in the most harmless interrogations, and feel pointed "arrows" in the most innocent remarks. Whether you have successfully contradicted the charges preferred against you, the "unimpeachable evidence" will show; being from men, whom your Br. Emery (Presbyterian clergyman of Carroll) says, "are men of lovely, moral characters." His testimony you will not "impugn." You deny that you ever said you "saw the principal Universalists drinking and carousing, cursing and swearing, praising the preachers and telling what d—d good preaching they had;" or, it is your "impression" you did not. When you abused and misrepresented your fellow Christians in Sheridan, and were reproved for it, you acknowledge that you got so much engaged, you said things you were sorry for; and you know that a person under the influence of heated passions, is not a suitable man, after he has cooled down, to inform those who were calm and collected, of what he "dropped amidst the heat and impetuousity of extemporaneous speaking." And you will discover that an accusation comes with rather an ill grace, that I have "pounced" upon you, and "ingeniously perverted the meaning of your isolated expressions," which I received from men of sound reason.

But to show you and the public, that I did not exaggerate or pervert your language, I select the following from among other affidavits, which will show that I never intended you any injury, and all I now ask, is, to have justice done to the abused and slandered.

Affidavit of Mr. Spencer.

"Chautauque county, ss.

Charles Spencer, of the town of Carroll, in said county, being duly sworn, saith that he attended a protracted meeting in said town, held last Fall, and heard the Rev. Zechariah Eddy state, in his sermon, that there was a great Universalist meeting held in Sheridan a short time ago—that about sixty waggons passed his house to attend said meeting—that after the meeting he saw the most prominent Universalists riding and racing their horses—that he had occasion to go up to the Post office, and saw them in the tavern, drinking their brandy, cursing, carousing and telling what good preaching they had. CHARLES SPENCER.

Sworn this 19th day of March, 1838, before me,
GORDON SWIFT, J. P."

Affidavit of Julius Alvord and George S. Griswould.

"Chautauque county, ss.

Julius Alvord and George S. Griswould, in the town of Carroll, of said county, being duly sworn, say that we heard the Rev. Zechariah Eddy preach one evening at a protracted meeting held in Carroll last Fall, and that in the course of his discourse, he referred to the Universalist Association held in Sheridan last August, and said that he called in at the tavern, and there he saw the leading Universalists drinking and carousing, praising the preachers, and telling what damned good preaching they had. JULIUS ALVORD,
GEORGE S. GRISWOULD.

Sworn and subscribed before me, this 29th March, 1838. GORDON SWIFT, J. P."

Here, Sir, is evidence you can not impeach.—You say the "vulgarity and profanity" of this language "shows through what sort of hands it passed in travelling over to Sheridan." But vulgar and profane as it is, it first proceeded out of your mouth—Matt. v: 18, 19.—"Those things which proceed out of the mouth they defile the man," etc. I asked you to inform the public, "who these leading Universalists were, that they might be held up before community as the proper jects of just censure and exemplary correction." You say you shall "deliberate" a long time, first. Just so long as you deliberate, can you consider yourself "upright and innocent from the great transgression?" Ps. xix: 12, 13. Until you explain this affair, many good people will still believe, as they did in Carroll, that you piously bore "false witness against your neighbor," and your "certain knowledge" will be viewed like that of the false prophets of Israel. Isa. xxix: 8–15.

What you have said about my preaching is irrelevant to the subject in question: But to "eloquently reprove" my brother for his "manifold sins," I must follow him in his numerous wanderings. I have the pleasure of knowing that my humble endeavors to improve the condition of society, as well as yours, have been duly appreciated and fully rewarded, my most sanguine expectations have been more than realized; and I am not aware that my doctrines have driven any to insanity, or that my preaching has injured the virtues, morality or happiness of any one who believes them. I know very well that the felicity of some who disbelieve my religious opinions, is greatly marred at present; and their morals appear before community in such an unfavorable light, that I expect soon to hear a cry, "What shall I do to be saved?" You ask me to "point to infidels, libertines, drunkards and blasphemers, who are not avowed Universalists." No disbeliever in divine Revelation is a Universalist.—You speak of other characters—some of each class were cradled and nurtured in Presbyterianism.—I will not point you very near home, but visit the penitentiary, and you will find hundreds of your faith in endless misery, where you will not find one Universalist. I saw several Presbyterian clergymen confined in Auburn Prison for their great wickedness, together with other preachers of eternal torments—you shall have the names, if you wish to know who your brother preachers are, who are thus receiving the "reward of their unrighteousness." I have mentioned these things not to reproach you, but that you may see the necessity of plucking the beam out of your own eye, before you undertake to dislodge the mote in your brother's; and because you are famous for attaching a great importance to every little thing you do, and arrogating to yourself and your party all the Christian virtues, and because you are constantly decrying the piety, virtues and morality of those who will not bow down to your speculative shrine, and who have moral courage enough to call in question the superior efficacy of the little anxious bench, to the primitive mode of receiving the "truth in the love of it." You will understand my meaning. It is dangerous for the inmate of a "glass house," to cast stones at others' windows, when he knows they "shoot arrows."

The second charge you also deny, (though you virtually allow, in the same paragraph, that you have said things even worse than are alleged against you.) Read the following, and you will see that you are again mistaken. It is a pity that you can not refer to your "notes." I hope you will try to keep calm after this.

Affidavit of Esq. Hall.

"Chautauque county, ss.

Azariah Hall of the town of Carroll, in said county, being duly sworn, saith that during the protracted meeting held in said town, last Fall, he heard the Rev. Zechariah Eddy state that the Universalists were all infidels, and that he did not believe a Universalist could be saved. AZARIAH HALL.

Sworn to this 19th day of March, 1838, before me,
GORDON SWIFT, J. P."

Concerning the third charge, you said, that you "stated no such thing"—viz. "that about thirty Universalists were converted," etc. Well, then, Br. Eddy, I do with pleasure recall the accusation. But, really, I am at a loss to account for the "death blow" you struck, and for the many sayings of your brethren concerning the blow, and their apparent joy while they enthusiastically affirmed that "Mr. Eddy said it was even true, that nearly all the Universalists in Carroll had become Presbyterians—that they were all down as a society—that it had been one of the strongest holds for infidelity, but now the principal Universalists were brought over to the faith [of infinite wo]—that about thirty or forty infidels and Universal-lists were converted at the great meeting." All these things are undoubtedly fresh in your memory, as they are treasured up in the minds of your friends.

You speak of "several young men," and you say they were never "given over to believe a lie," "but were public advocates of Universalism" (the truth!) But I suppose you want to be understood to say, that Universalism is a "lie," and the young men never believed it, but still were its public advocates! Then they must have been consummate hypocrites, or you have not spoken the truth. Well, here are your boasted converted Universalists! This is just as I expected it would be, and all the reports through the county are false. Let these things be remembered by the friends of truth. The subjoined letter will confirm these statements, and show the reason why I have not introduced more of the affidavits.

You do not know whether you were correctly informed about the fourth charge—you had not the "means of ascertaining." You could have written to Carroll—and your total neglect to do this, shows that you do not intend to live up to the command "do as you would be done unto"—for you requested me to furnish unimpeachable evidence of things I advanced. Because I referred to the miseries of the damned, according to your faith, you call it profanity. This kind of profanity has been your theme for years, and you have rolled the doctrine of endless misery under your tongue as though it was "a sweet morsel"! I learn from what you have said to certain individuals, that you are of the opinion that it was some one your older and more talented brethren that gave the challenge.

You pretend not to know why I addressed you in preference to your coadjutors; that is best known to myself. Not so, Sir. Others know why I addressed you. If any remain in doubt on the subject, they are informed that the false reports were traced directly to yourself. "The death blow," you say, "sounded through the county." I suppose it still rings in your ears, telling you of your "eminent success." Or does it whisper to you in the dark and solemn stillness of the night, the sad requiem of "departed and swiftly departing joys!"

Does not your conscience, though apparently "seared," tell you "there is a God that judgeth in the earth"? When you read this letter, you will see, as well as others, who has reason to "tremble" before his Maker, "who will by no means clear the guilty"—"he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done" not may escape it, according to your system of repentance, Col. iii: 25. I shall preserve the rest of the affidavits to meet you when you "pursue a more legal course," according to the wishes of your friends. But they must perceive that law will be against you, as truth and Gospel have been thus far.

In concluding your letter, like the "prodigal son," you came to yourself. If you return after making such good resolutions, you will be received with joy. I heartily concur in your prayer. I still remain of opinion, that if God can in mercy redeem you, we need not despair of the salvation of all sinners. I trust you will pardon the "plainness of speech," and realize that I have "come to you not with a rod, but in love," though I may have seemed to "rebuke sharply."

I am, Sir, yours fraternally, T. C. Eaton.
Dunkirk, March 29th, 1838.

P. S. Any assistance you may ask to set this subject in its proper light, if in my power, I will most cheerfully lend it, and not "deliberate long." Please send your communication directly to me, and there shall be no delay. T. C. E.

ADDITIONAL REMARKS.

Br. Grosh—The following letter will show the state of the cause of truth in Carroll, the assertion of Mr. Eddy to the contrary notwithstanding.—Will he give us "unimpeachable evidence" of what he has stated?

"Br. Eaton—Agreeably to your request, I send you the following affidavits touching the several points stated in your letter to Mr. Eddy. You are welcome to use them if the circumstances require it; but unless it should be necessary, the respective deponents prefer not to have their names introduced into the public prints. The several gentlemen who have testified above, to use the language of Rev. Mr. Emery (Presbyterian clergyman) "are men of lovely moral characters." Relative to the converts from Universalism to Partialism at the late protracted meeting in Carroll, Mr. Eddy must be under a mistake. I have lived in the town of Carroll nine or ten years—have been one of the Trustees of the Universalist society for several years, and can state positively that not a solitary member of our society became a convert to that meeting, nor any one that has ever associated with the society since I came into the town. And I further state that our society was never more prosperous than it is now.

N. A. Alexander."

[Accompanying the foregoing were some other documents, which we are obliged to omit for the want of room, and which we gladly forbear to insert, because we hope enough has been offered to teach Mr. Eddy a salutary lesson. Such men as he, and such means as he uses, are a curse to any cause, more especially to a bad one. That he may repent him of the wicked slanders and irony he has uttered, and learn from the frailty of himself and brethren to be meek and lowly of heart, that he may patiently tread the path of humility, brotherly kindness and charity, must be the prayer of every true Universalist. A. B. G.]

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CONFERENCE IN MICHIGAN.

At a Conference, holden pursuant to due notice, in the Universalist church, village of Ann Arbor, Michigan, March 14 and 15, 1838—the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted.—

Whereas, the friends to, and believers in, the doctrine of God's universal and impartial grace, in this new State, having recently become inhabitants thereof, are in a scattered condition, and consequently unacquainted with each other generally—and

Whereas, It becomes necessary, in order to promote what they individually most fervently desire, that is, the advancement of the principles and practice of pure and unadulterated Christianity, that they become acquainted with each other, to give them an opportunity of uniting their energies in the promotion of the desirable object—and

Whereas, It is the opinion of this meeting, that no measures within the compass of our knowledge, will be so well calculated to introduce a proper medium of acquaintance and accomplish the desired object, as the regularly holding of quarterly social Conferences in different sections in this region, and the establishment, as soon as may be, of a regular itineracy for the ministry of the word of life—and Whereas, It appears to us highly important that such measures as are put within our reach should be immediately and energetically adopted; inasmuch as the opposers of this truth, and the propagators of doctrines which we believe to be essentially inimical to the cause of pure religion, subversive of the principles of Christian morality and destructive of the peace, harmony and welfare of society, are using the most violent efforts to plant the standard of sectarianism in every village and hamlet in our new and thriving State—therefore,

Resolved, As the sense of this meeting, that it is proper to hold quarterly social Conferences. And we do earnestly recommend to, and enjoin it upon all our ministering brethren in this section of the Redeemer's heritage, those who have professedly renounced the world for the sake of Christ, and for the devoting of their time to the ministry of His glorious Gospel, to be scrupulously punctual in their attendance on all such meetings. And we do most fervently recommend, also, to all our brethren and sisters—"to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth"—who themselves have experienced the saving power of his Gospel, and consequently desire others to enjoy the same priceless blessing, and to be delivered from the bondage of slavish fear—to so arrange their temporal concerns, as to be able, at least once in three months, to assemble in joyful convocation, and thus "come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

Resolved, That in our opinion it would essentially subserve the cause, to include in each Conference one Sabbath—that is, to hold our Conferences hereafter on Saturday and Sunday. And it is consequently recommended to churches and societies who have regular engagements for preaching within their respective bodies, to permit their preachers thus to attend, and not exact the making up of the day after the expiration of their annual engagements, nor the reduction of the trifling stipend they engage to allow them: realizing that in their turn they may enjoy their proportion of the benefits of those meetings, if they desire.

Resolved, To recommend to the Central Association of Universalists in Michigan, at its annual session in June next, to appoint four Conferences for the ensuing year, in such places as in their estimation shall be most conducive to the great object, and that it be recommended, as one object of the Conferences, to adopt and prosecute measures for the establishment of a regular itineracy. And for this purpose—

Resolved, That it be recommended to the several societies in this State, and to the brethren who are not yet organized into society relations, but who are desirous of having preaching in their respective neighborhoods, to issue, immediately, subscription papers, made payable to the Trustees or the Treasurer of the society, or to some responsible individual in the respective neighborhoods where preaching is requested, for the purpose of supporting circuit preaching; and that such subscriptions be made payable quarterly, provided such itineracy can be established. And that each society and neighborhood, so doing, be particularly careful to send a delegate to the Association in June next, with an account of their success in raising funds, and with particular instructions to act in the premises; to the end that the Association may be informed authentically in regard to their wishes, and what remuneration a circuit preacher may depend upon for his toil—as preachers have physical wants in common with our race, and "the laborer is worthy of his hire."

A. H. Curtis, Moderator.
R. Thornton, Clerk.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LETTER.

Rev. W. H. Waggoner:

Dear Brother—Though personally a stranger, permit me to address you upon an affair connected with the upbuilding of our Master's cause. I address you, thinking you will be able to give me the necessary information, and remove the suspicion of dishonesty now attached to one professing to be a minister of the Gospel, or else to expose him to the world in his true color.

The individual concerning whom I wish for information, is the Rev. Mr. Swackhammer, a native, or at least a laborer in Herkimer county—a Lutheran clergyman. Mr. Swackhammer has been much troubled with Universalism of late, and as a final positive argument of the falsity of the doctrine, asserts "that for two years he was a preacher of the doctrine, and only ceased in his mad career, from the solemn reflection that he was leading numbers down to hell." The above statement was made by him in a public meeting, in Sand Lake, Renssalaer county, in this State—in the presence of numerous witnesses, at which time he went so far, as to enlighten his audience by giving them a synopsis of his former explanation of certain texts, which he believes to prove the doctrine of endless misery. One was the language of our Saviour with regard to the cities of Tyre and Sidon.

But I think enough has been said to convince you of the propriety of my addressing you in this public manner. As the statements were made in a public meeting, will you have the kindness to inform the unbelieving, with regard to their correctness, through the columns of the Magazine and Advocate—so that justice may be done to all concerned. Yours in the fellowship of the Gospel. WILLIAM WILCOX.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

ORTHODOXY AND INFIDELITY.

It is frequently said of Universalism, that it leads to infidelity, and as frequently have we showed, that this sin lay at the door of Partialism. Enough has been said on this subject, to make it stale to those who have read half of it. Nevertheless, we are still accused of entertaining sentiments akin to infidelity—this cry is evidently kept up, for the purpose of diverting the attention of inquiring minds from the gross absurdities of the popular creed; and to cast odium on a more rational one, the light of which, is to error, what the rays of the sun are to the morning dew. The constant clamor of our opposers may succeed for a while, but the flourish of arms, and the noise of drums is no precursor of victory. Partialism and infidelity appear to be sown on the same soil, and harvested at the same time. When one flourishes, the other does; when one sinks, the other sinks; we hazard nothing by saying, that one will not long survive the other; when Partialism dies, infidelity must starve.

That we are not mistaken in what we have always said concerning the legitimate tendency of the opposite faith, the following resolution, adopted at the recent birth-day celebration of Paine, in Rochester, will clearly prove.

"Resolved, That we as Liberalists, are not to be charged with ignorance in the formation of our opinions, as a large portion of our number throughout the community, have not only critically examined, but have long been professors and believers in orthodox Christianity—and waded out of its mystical labyrinths, by patient and persevering investigation—an unyielding desire and a courageous determination to arrive at unsophisticated truth."

Should all this have been said of Universalism, it would have been rung from one end of the continent to the other, and embalmed as sacred in memory, as Hayne's sermon, "the devil's doctrine." In the hurry of their anxiety to attribute to Universalism the causes of infidelity, the Partialists forget to give us our due. They are constantly asserting that numbers are converted from our ranks to theirs, but they never say "Universalism leads to orthodoxy." Now neighbors, why do you wish to abound in censure, when by your own admission, the balance of credit is in our favor?

G. S.

MISERABLE COMFORT.

The Editor of the Bangor Journal, Rev. Thomas Curtis, has an article in his paper full of miserable comfort to the afflicted family of the late Mr. Cilley, member of Congress. The article begins in this way—"WITHIN FIVE MINUTES OF HELL"!—and then follows this text—"Murderers shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone." Rev. xxi: 8. The rest is an application of this text to the case of the late member, according to the author's admirable views of hell, and the whole is calculated to murder afresh, the husband of the deeply afflicted widow. A more scandalous outrage on the feelings of humanity is scarcely conceivable. The article not only assigns to Mr. C. a dwelling in the infernal regions, but it gives us to understand, that while no cheering rays will ever penetrate that dark abyss, or hope linger around, yet Mr. Graves, the survivor and murderer, may repent of his crime, and in heaven be a companion of her, whom he has made a widow. What a heaven for her to anticipate; methinks a hell of mutual suffering would be preferable. It happens that Mrs. Cilley is a religious sister of the author of this article; we think the afflicting event which has happened to her, will test the efficacy of her faith. Br. Drew, of the Banner, complains of the author of this unseasonable article, for his injustice to the widow. We do not complain, nor censure; it is just what might be expected from one believing in the doctrine of endless misery, It is the undisguised fruit of that doctrine, and judging by it, the article is full of truth. If there is an endless hell, and a mere belief of it, the only safeguard, instead of virtue, benevolence and honesty, then Mr. C. has gone there; which, if it were true, dishonors God, and outrages justice. Let our opposers speak out the naked sentiment of their faith, as the author of this article has done; if honest, they will do it; then will the scales fall from the eyes of the blind, the dumb be made to speak, the oppressed set free, and the glad tidings of the Gospel spread from pole to pole.

G. S.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, APRIL 20, 1838.

MUSIC.

What an incomprehensible power is music! It holds communion with the loftier faculties of our nature and needeth not the medium of words. It wakens the memories of other years, and summons up all their various associations. It lights the pale face of the mourner, and enlivens the cold and desolate heart with a throb of gladness. It is twin-sister to poetry, and like it, sweeps the deep chords of the soul "with a mastery all its own." It has its different influences—its different modes of expression—yet its strange, mysterious power is felt in them all. In the wild summons to the fight—in the silver tones of the lute beneath the lattice, pealing up from triumphant battle-fields, or wailing in the deep coronach—breathing in wood and bower, or thrilling through festal halls—floating softly over the mirrored lake, or breaking the silence of midnight with glorious melody—whenever heard—however uttering its voice—it is felt!—in the inmost recesses of the spirit it is felt and acknowledged!

We are not speaking for all. There may be those for whom music has no charms, and over whom it has no influence. But we believe such to be few. We believe there are but few who will not pause to catch the strains of a bugle, or whose pulses will not beat quicker at "the roll of the stirring drums." They may be few also who have cultivated and understand the refinements of music. But we are not speaking of musical taste, but of that deep influence which the power of melody has upon the soul. And we say, that we think there are not many who do not feel this influence. It is a part of our nature that feels an emotion at the sound of harmony, a part too, we believe, belonging to our immortality—that will go with us as we "tread the stars"—and that will thrill and respond to music such as has never yet burst on mortal ears!

We have mysteries in our nature—solemn and sublime mysteries—mysteries which we can not fathom, yet which confirm to ourselves the truth of the doctrine of a life beyond the grave. The feeling which music excites is one of these. It appeals to something within us, and bears our souls up loftily and pure above time and circumstance. We doubt if even in the serried ranks of battle, the strains which peal to the heart, excite so much to revenge and slaughter as they lift the soul from the fear of death, and urge it heedless and intoxicated into the strife. And oh! when music is combined with that which is pure and holy, how purifying and how sanctifying are its effects! Gush after gush it pours into the fountains of the spirit, making it pleasant and glad. Washington Irving has given us a beautiful illustration of this in the tale of "the young Italian," who, haunted and tormented by the memory of a bloody crime, finds penitence, and consolation, and rest, during the performance of a sweet and solemn piece of sacred music. How many a sin-stricken one, may have had his fears hushed and his soul lifted to the mercy-seat, by the tones of music, speaking to him like angel voices of pardon and of peace! Truly it is an incomprehensible power! The glorious universe is full of harmony and the soul goes forth in a world filled with melody and song!

Reader, we are no musician, but we are fond of music. We could sit hour after hour and listen to a good performance of vocal or instrumental music, without being wearied. We love to hear the strains which burst from a full and efficient band—we love the tones of the piano—the breathings of the flute—the song of a choir, or the warbling of a pleasant voice. We have our choice, too, in music—our favorite songs. They may be old and unfashionable and what is called "worn out," yet do we love them. We love "oft in the stilly night"—it is a sweet, beautiful thing—and "Home, sweet Home," and some of Russell's fine ballads, and others which we would mention did we not fear that we should be taking up your time with things too common-place. Now we love these—they have spoken to our heart and it will understand them, and whenever they speak, there they will always find a response. Give us the tones of a bugle upon a balmy moonlight night, and you may steal hours unheeded from our sleep. We do believe, if we were desolate and alone, if grief in its intensity had closed up the fountain of tears—we do believe, that the clear, soft notes of the bugle, playing one of the airs above mentioned, would unseal that fountain and call forth gushing relief, until sorrow and anxiety were "turned to dreams of blessedness and peace."

Reader, is the grave a place of eternal sleep?—are our faculties given us to be annihilated in the moment of their lofty aspirations—of their expansion and their triumph? Is death an unending slumber? why then have we poetry giving us bright gleams of things better and purer than aught that is around us?—and why have we music lifting our very spirits up with a desire to leap forward and to float among all free and joyous things—amid music, and radiance, and song, forever? Why have we emotions tuned to influences which though bursting, and breaking, and gushing from things around us, bear our thoughts upward and onward through infinity? Why does the ocean chime up its anthems?—why do the winds go forth like melodies?—why do the streamlets sing, and the tall trees shout, and all nature send up a chorus?

We repeat it, there are mysteries in our existence—there are longings for the perfect and the pure—and music is one of the invisible mediums, by which our souls learn, as it were, that there is another and an immortal life.

E. H. C.

MARRIAGE.

A recent case of informal marriage in this city involved the parties in many troubles and sorrows, which were, however happily terminated. This has led me to the knowledge of other cases, and, in my opinion, renders it expedient to notice the subject in its various phases—not only informal, but even sham marriages.

It is frequently the case that young people will propose to go through the marriage ceremony with each other, and will actually go through it for sport. Let them understand a few things.

1st. The law of marriage does not require that the person officiating shall be either a magistrate or a clergyman—though the law for recording the marriage does. The parties may marry themselves before witnesses, all else being legal.

2nd. The parties married can not be witnesses in their own case, whether they were in jest or in earnest, i. e. after the marriage contract has been pronounced. Whether the marriage is or is not legal, depends wholly on the opinion of the person officating, and of the other persons present. If these witnesses will testify that it is their opinion that the intention of the parties met in the contract—i. e. that the parties did really agree to be husband and wife—the ceremony is binding, whatever the parties may afterwards declare. For the witnesses know the intention of the parties, only by their looks, words and actions at the time of making the contract.

3d. When a sham marriage is pronounced legal, or only possibly legal, there is no way of annulling it but by an act of the legislature—a tedious process, and one, withal, too public and humiliating to subject a modest female to, all for the sake of a joke, which, after all, has no very great share of fun in it—for it is only the shadow of the reality.

Such are the facts of the case, from which I would beg our young friends, and all interested, to draw the conclusion, that marriage is too honorable and sacred an institution to be used as a joke—a joke, too, that may be so very important in its consequences. Nor should any clergyman or magistrate, or any friend to the parties ever engage in performing either informal or sham marriages. Let all who want their assistance understand at once, that if they want the ceremony pronounced, it will be solemnly, seriously done—and let it be done, or left undone, accordingly. If they are only in jest, this earnest offer of aid will be enough—if in earnest, so be it—marry them in proper form, all else being legal.

One word more. Let no one presume on any legal disabilities on the side of either of the parties. Those disabilities will, it is true, prevent the marriage from being binding; but the parties, as well as the person officiating, are liable to a criminal prosecution. In short, the best way is to leave being married alone, until you are prepared to set about it in earnest. The knowledge here given was obtained at the expense of much suffering by sympathy, in the sufferings of others—it is given in the hope of preventing any recurrence of such sufferings, even if I should never know them so as to sympathise with them. Don't trifle with serious things.

A. B. G.

THE HAMILTONIAN SYSTEM.

As Mr. Hamilton, the son of the Founder of this system, is about leaving here for New-York, to employ himself in teaching languages in that vicinity, I have thought that a few remarks upon his system might be a benefit not only to him, but to any of our readers who might wish to avail themselves of his instructions.

The system consists in first teaching the scholar, by the voice, to read the French, German, Italian or Spanish languages, translating each word by its most literal, simple equivalent in the English. Then follows the Grammatical knowledge, after the pupil has learned to read and translate easily. And lastly, but still in connexion with Grammatical science, comes translating from the English into the foreign language, and conversations in the foreign language. The whole course consists of about fifty lessons of one hour and a half each—to which should be added by the pupil at least double that time in reviews and repetitions of each lesson. By taking, (on an average) but three lessons per week, this time can be given by almost any one in regular employment. And if given, every learner will be astonished at the rapidity of his progress in the first ten or twenty lessons of the course. Further than that, the class that I was in, can not speak with certainty; for about that time our business increased so much as to prevent proper attention to the subject, and consequently our progress was but slow, and the knowledge obtained, imperfectly impressed on the memory. This was our misfortune—not the fault of either teacher, system or pupils. Every one that I have spoken with, however, is certain that our progress would have continued as steadily as at first, could we have continued the same attention to our lessons. Mr. Hamilton did his duty, and generously added to what was our due beyond what we could have asked of him. Indeed, in all that belongs to the teacher—in his care, his manner, his ready and correct knowledge of every minute particular so far as we could judge, he is unequalled by any teacher I ever saw.

In conclusion—I would advise any one who undertakes to learn on the Hamiltonian system, not to despise any seeming trifles, nor to magnify any apparent difficulties. They will find the first to be frequently the most important of the two—and the latter will soon become trifles to the persevering and industrious. Only follow the teacher implicitly—obey his directions strictly—and when you come to the verbs, throw your whole soul into them as for a death grapple—repeat, write, rewrite, do any thing to master them completely, and in six months you may speak fluently the language you undertake to learn. In the fifty lessons you will have learned the language, and will need practice only to use it with facility. I think that a fair trial will satisfy any one not convinced by reasoning on the subject, that the Hamiltonian system is the most natural and practical, and will, therefore, the soonest lead into an easy, everyday use of any foreign language. A. B. G.

THE TWO OPINIONS, OR SALVATION AND DAMNATION.

Br. L. F. W. Andrews, of Macon, Georgia, has had a prospectus before the public, for some time, for (and has progressed considerably in) publishing the above work in monthly numbers. The work will contain "a comparative view of the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian and Catholic Creeds, showing the points of agreement and disagreement between them, and their united disagreement with Universalism. Proofs from Scripture, reason, and the Attributes of Deity, in favor of the final holiness and happiness of ALL MEN.—Objections to this doctrine from Scripture, carefully examined, in brief comments on every passage of Holy Writ usually brought forward in support of "endless misery." Popular objections against universal salvation, considered and refuted. Objections to the dogma of endless wrath, definitively set forth. Brief view of Universalists, touching other topics of Theology, such as original sin, total depravity, new birth, repentance, faith, good works, free agency, devil or satan, resurrection, etc., etc. Ordinances, "water baptism," and the "Lord's Supper." Church government—with a form of Constitution for societies of Universalists. Select hymns and prayers, with a form of funeral service. A comparative view of the effect of a belief of Partialism and Universalism on society at large.

CONDITIONS.—The work will be issued in twelve numbers, consisting of sixteen octavo pages each, with a printed cover of four pages to every number, and will be forwarded by mail to subscribers at $1,25 each volume. The matter of the cover will not be connected with that of the work itself, but will be of interest to every Southern Universalist.

☞ The publisher reserves to himself the right of issuing one number of the work every month, and oftener if convenient, and will so arrange it that the twelve numbers can be bound together, and will make a neat volume of about 200 pages, with a title page and index.

☞ Payment will be required on the reception of the first number, which will be issued probably on or before the first day of October next.

Nine copies will be forwarded to any one who will send, (free of charge,) ten dollars to

L. F. W. ANDREWS."

The ability of Br. Andrews to render the work useful and interesting, can not be doubted; and we feel great confidence in recommending the Two Opinions to general patronage. A. B. G.

GRADUAL DEVELOPMENT OF CHRISTIANITY.

We commend to our readers the article upon our last page, extracted from the Christian Examiner. It is, we presume, from the pen of Rev. A. P. Peabody.

The comparison of the doctrines of Christianity to the seed that falls in the ground and dies, is well sustained and carried out, and beautifully illustrates what we deem to be a great and important truth. E. H. C.

AN EXAMINATION OF TAYLOR'S DIEGESIS.

I am glad to learn, as I do by the Universalist Watchman, that Br. Loveland's able examination of Taylor's Diegesis is to be published in book form. It was our intention to have published it in numbers in this volume of the Magazine and Advocate, but the union of the Herald of Truth with this paper, and the fact that it had been republished in the Herald in its first form, prevented us from carrying our design into effect. If subscribers sufficient to defray the expense, can be procured, it will be published in duodecimo form, neatly bound and lettered. The work will contain about 275 pages, and will be afforded at 75 cents per copy. We will endeavor to give the prospectus in our next. In the meantime we can only say, that is a work well deserving patronage on account of its own merits, and especially because the arguments, if not the work of Taylor, are very generally circulated by skeptics—it should, therefore, be widely circulated. The language is mild and courteous, though firm and decided, and the arguments irrefutable.

Subscriptions received at this office. A. B. G.

A sermon from Br. O. Roberts is thankfully received—one by Br. McAdam is on hand, also. At present we are crowded with a few temporary matters, which, as they "will not keep," we must crowd in as fast as we can find room; after that, we have good things in store. We should like to hear again and again from Miss S. C. E., Mrs. Scott and Mrs. Broughton, as our poetry drawer is running low—however, prose articles will be welcome, also.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. BRITTON at Brownville—Br. DELONG at Erieville.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. SMITH, in Litchfield (Spencer's school-house,) and Br. MCADAM, in Clinton—Br. WOOLLEY at Madison—Br. SIAS at Perch River and at Pamelia Four Corners in the evening—Br. DELONG at Marshall.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in May, by Br. T. J. SMITH at Cedarville—Br. E. H. CHAPIN at Richfield Springs, and at Hallsville, at 5 P. M.—Br. MCADAM at Munnsville.

Br. MCADAM will lecture at Pratt's Hollow, as Br. Chamberlain may appoint, on Saturday evening, May 5th.

Br. T. J. SMITH will lecture at Pratt's Saturday, May 12th, at 5 P. M.

Br. WAGGONER, will preach a funeral sermon at Salisbury Corners, Saturday 21st inst., at 2 P. M., on the death of six of Mr. Cross's friends.

THE NEW-YORK CONVENTION meets in Oxford, Chenango county, on the last Wednesday in May next.—Brethren from the East will be able to get there by stage either from Catskill, Albany, Fort Plain, or Utica, as best pleases them. The shortest stage ride is probably from Fort Plain. A. B. G.

The Central Association in Michigan will hold its annual session in Ann Arbor, Washtenaw county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, next. It is hoped that every preacher in the State will punctually attend, and an affectionate invitation is given to all others to "come over and help us." Churches and societies will be careful to send delegates properly accredited, and carefully instructed in relation to business to be transacted. N. STACY, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

Rev O R, Lakeville, for I B, J H, C M C and T D—G R, Rochester, for J F, J W and A S—H C, Kingston, (U C) for self, E R M, R H, J E, J McK and J B—P M, Chardon, (O) for L G and R F—J McC, Hague, for self and W C—A B M, North Scituate (R I)—S M, Lowville, for W B—P M, Portageville, for W V and R P—M B Homer, for E S, D B, R C, D B, L H, J C, H H, E B, A S, S K and W W—J B W, Franklin Square, (O) for self and J C F—J F W, Genesco, for self, I E P and J N—G V B, Moriah, for self, L O, J H D, O B, J H G and G S—Rev L L S, Perrysberg, (O) for J E H, D N, J G, D L and D C W—J D. Parkman (O) for self and S S—T H, Lodi, (Ills)—H W D, Geneva—P M, Concord Centre, for H H, D S, L B, J F C, A L, C F and J B—Rev E R C, Elizabethtown, (Va) for E T, J E H and T P—E P Mansville—P T Yorkshire, for self, L M and A C—J W, Franklin Grove, (Ills) for H C—E S, Hopkinton, for self, J P, E R, S B and J G—P M, East Bloomfield, for B W W, W P, D P, A C, A B and S P—O T, Churchville, for A A, D W T, S R, B H, S S, E P D, S S Jr, and N F—P M, South Onondaga, for J H and J P H—J P, Maysville, for self, S P, S A, W S, C R N, A I B, I P and E B P—Rev J F, Denmark, for self, W P, S S, P V, J V and A P—N H L, Rome, for M T and S W—Rev D T Carlisle (O) for J W, H W, I E M and E P—D B, Harpersville, for J H, W M H, F S, B W, P M W, and D D—H H, Etna, for J H—R A Livonia, for E S O, L O, G S, A F, R P and J C C—A C, Fayettville, for D W and O S—P M, Countsville, (S C) for H S—Rev M L W, Bath, for I P B, A L and E B—N A D, Newfield—P M, South Bristol, for self and H P—P M, Clear Creek, for S G H and J W Jr—R B, Alden, for self, E P, J P and R J—Rev A W, Poolville, for self, A F and A R,

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE TESTAMENT.

This little book—this "Book of Books,"
Is dearer far to me,
Than all the diamonds in the earth,
Or pearls beneath the sea.

Its precepts more adorn the heart,
Than tiaras the head—
They shed a radiance 'round the name
And memory of the dead.

And in the "spirit land" they crown
The soul with lustre bright,
Compared to which, all earthly gems
Reflect but feeble light.

Then precious book, thee I admire,
And prize thee, more than all
The wealth, and wisdom, and renown
Of this terrestrial ball.

FIDELIS.

GRADUAL DEVELOPMENT OF CHRISTIANITY.

We might take, for the exponent of the past and a key to the future fortunes of the Christian church, Christ's own words, "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." We can trace a series of successive seed-times and harvest-seasons, with intervening periods of apparent desolation and death, while the seed is germinating and fructifying.

Christ himself was the first seed of his Gospel; his death the seed-time. His religion was embodied in him. It consisted of those maxims of holy conduct, that sublime faith, that perfect love, which were exemplified in his character. He thus held in his own hands the seed of the word; and there human wisdom would probably have left it. But what were the results while he retained it? Few and small. Twelve apostles and seventy other disciples were nearly all the converts made by his personal efforts; (for the five hundred brethren once mentioned were probably converted to his faith after his resurrection.) He "fell into the ground and died," and, in thus doing, he sowed the seed of the kingdom. When he was lost to sight, his sayings and doings became the subject of rehearsal and history. His death sealed up the volume of his Gospel, put a finished testimony in the mouths of his apostles, and enabled them to clothe his religion in a form more complete and definite. And then, instead of coming to him as the sole fountain head of his doctrine, men could have access to scores of faithful witnesses, who stood in Christ's stead, but who could not have thus stood, had he still lived. He thus, in dying, multiplied himself by sending abroad to every city and land, men, who should fully represent in preaching, and in living too, so far as human infirmity would permit, his own spotless character, and who should thus be his instruments in renewing human souls after his own image. The first fruits of the harvest thus prepared for, were reaped on the day of Pentecost, when, by the preaching of the cross, more souls were regenerated in one day, than had been during the whole of Christ's ministry. And from that time the Gospel had free course, and was glorified, numbering daily among its proselytes multitudes of such as should be saved.

But with this rich harvest of pure and pious souls commenced a second seed-time. The seed of the Gospel was now sown broad cast, and by sowers of every class and kind; "some," as St. Paul says, "preaching Christ of contention and strife, others, of good will."—"Yet, in every way Christ was preached;" into every form of words some little of his spirit was infused; in every professedly Christian discourse some knowledge of him was conveyed. But the truth embodied and diffused by the propagation of the faith was soon too vague and too much alloyed with error, to serve the purpose of individual regeneration. We must regard our religion therefore as then sown, not in Christian principles, but in Christian institutions. The latter were diligently founded; the former were almost universally forgotten. The pure seed of spiritual doctrine fell into the rough ground of formalism and sensualism, and died. To human appearance it was utterly extinct, Christians being hardly more spiritual in their habits of mind and life than the surrounding heathen. Yet, because it died, it brought forth much fruit. Pure Christianity, as it distilled from the Saviour's lips and breathed in his life, could not have been generally diffused in that unrefined and corrupt age; but Christian institutions could be. It was practicable and easy to spread far and wide the outward forms and symbols of the new faith; and by means of these was the name of Christ transmitted, and the bounds of his empire enlarged. It would have been impossible to have made pure Christianity the religion of the Roman empire, or to have communicated it to the ferocious hordes that overran the empire, or to have imbued with it the sensual and profligate nations of Asia. But Christian institutions, decked as they were with the spoils of paganism, were universally popular, inviting and fascinating; and they soon became the property of every nation in Europe and its confines.—These institutions were indeed embraced as inane and dead forms; yet proved themselves far otherwise. The spirit of their founder overshadowed them; his accents of love breathed through them; they wrought gradually, imperceptibly, yet surely, upon the genius of the people who embraced them, softening their manners, refining their feelings, purging their civil and international codes from much that was oppressive and sanguinary, elevating the social rank of woman, and little by little developing the germs of pure and sound morality and piety. The age, while this process was going on, is commonly termed dark; but it is dark only to a superficial reader of its history;—to one, who looks beneath the surface, it is the bright and hopeful interval between a propitious seed-time and a joyful harvest. The fields were all the while ripening. There was throughout Christendom a growing spirituality—a gradual transition of Christianity from a mere outward form to a life-giving principle. Of this harvest Wiclif, Huss, Jerome, and the rest of the van-guard of the Reformation may be regarded as the first fruits; Luther and his compeers as its ripened sheaves; the faithful of later times as its rich gleanings.

But the harvest of the Reformation was one of faith and truth, not of liberty and love. Its chief result was the fixing of a personal, vital, operative faith as the great essential of the Christian character. It left the throne of bigotry unshaken. It undermined the seat of one pope; but in synods and presbyteries it erected hundreds of hydra-headed popes, each no less arrogant, potent, and intolerant than he, whom they all anathematized.

With this harvest of faith, however, commenced the seed-time of religious liberty. There were some few, like Melancthon, who, at the very outset of the reformation, cherished and diffused just views of man's fallibility and his accountableness to God alone. And the number of the friends of freedom, though till recently small, has been continually increasing. They have diligently sowed the seed of independence and toleration; and some of them have been indiscreet and over-zealous sowers, letting their liberty degenerate into licentiousness. But the seed has, through their industry, fallen into the bosom of every church in Christendom, not excepting even the venerable mother church of Rome, which numbers among the assertors of the right of free inquiry and private judgment, not only many individuals of eminence and worth, but the whole body ecclesiastical of France. The seed has fallen into the ground and died; and this is the reason why the present age seems dark, and portents of ill omen cloud the firmament. The present is indeed a troubled epoch, because of the fermentation of the elements destined to cherish the germination of this precious seed, and to bring it to an abundant harvest. There is abroad in our land, and in every land, a wild self will, an impatience of restraint, a spurning at the bonds of antiquity and prescription, which often leads to deplorable results and sad forebodings, but which may yet be hailed as a token, that the individual mind is just beginning to recognise and seize its birth right of mental freedom. The first moment of possession is too frequently a moment of delirium; it too often drives the phrensied soul into lawlessness, skepticism or infidelity; the gift must needs be abused, before men can learn to use it. May we not rejoice that they have it to abuse, and are thus in a sure way of attaining to its just use? May we not rejoice that the earth is violently upheaving, since it teems with so glorious a harvest? This, we are well convinced is the case. Old ecclesiastical foundations are breaking up. Antiquated opinions are set aside. The sway of man over faith and conscience is subverted. Existing religious institutions, which have been used as prisons for the free-born mind, have their walls thrown down by the very war-cry of liberty. But we trust that old things are passing away, only to prepare for the descent of the "new Jerusalem from God out of heaven." The power of a titular priesthood is undermined; but it is to hasten the day, when every man shall be a king and a priest unto God The thrones are cast down; but it is only that "the Ancient of days may sit, and the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom may be given into his hands." Then will the harvest of liberty be fully reaped.

But the work will not then be done. Men will not at first move in their several orbits without clashing.—They will not understand the divine chemistry, whereby liberty and love are to be combined. Though no one will dare to interfere with his neighbor's faith, or to fulminate wrathful anathemas against dissenters, the unity of the spirit will not be complete, nor the bond of peace perfect. But love will then have its seed-time, and its benign and self-sacrificing sowers. Its seed will fall into the ground, and die. It may lie for ages, extinct except to faith's keen vision, beneath the cold, rough soil of an unsympathetic church. But it will germinate under the sun of God's love and the still small rain of his spirit.—It will work its way little by little into the institutions, lives, and hearts of Christians, until at length a golden harvest waves over a regenerated world. And that will be the last great harvest of nations, when the remnant both of Jews and Gentiles shall be gathered into the fold; for it is the lack of love alone that retards the conversion of the world. When this principle pervades and triumphs, nations will be born in a day. Nay, that "mighty angel flying in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people," is no other than the spirit of love.

Thus in the whole history of the church, we have four successive seed-times and corresponding harvest-seasons. First, the Saviour sowed his own body in the grave, and the harvest was a visible and rapidly increasing church. Then the seed of spiritual faith was sown all the world over, in the outward forms and institutions of Christianity; the harvest ripened not till the Reformation. Then the seed of religious liberty was sown; and "the fields are white already to harvest." Lastly, in the general seed-time of love, our near posterity will be the weeping sowers; their descendants of little faith will mourn over the teeming soil as desolate and barren; distant generations will shout the glad harvest home.—Christian Examiner.

MARRIAGES.

In Rome, on the 8th inst. by Rev. A. B. Giosh, Mr. W. B. Smith. of this city, to Miss Mary Ann Tefft, daughter of William Tefft, of the former place.

In this city, by the same, on the 11th inst., Mr. Llewellyn Zublin, to Miss Amelia B. Tallman, both of the Editor's family.

In Seneca, March 18th, by Rev. O. Ackley, Mr. Harvey Billington, to Miss Abagail Thomas, both of Gorham.

In the same place, by the same, on the 1st inst., Mr. Peter Fiero, to Miss Jane Halladay, both of Seneca.

In Middleville, February 22d, by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, Mr. Mason Morey, to Miss Alvira Fuller.

In Dickinson, February 17th, by Rev. John Simonds, Mr. David Parks, to Miss Lucy Ann Cook, all of Dickinson.

In Lebanon, January 15, by Rev. W. M. Delong, Mr. Merville C. Shapley, to Miss Janet Simmons, all of Lebanon.

DEATHS.

At Central Square, Oswego county, on March 23d, of measles, Henry H., youngest son of Huntington and Abigail Fitch, aged 18 months. Sermon on the 25th, by C. B. B.

In Ashford, March 6th, Orlando E. Marvin, in the 27th year of his age. He had feeble health from infancy, but the immediate cause of his death was inflammation of the lungs. He formerly belonged to the Methodists, but obeying the command to "search the Scriptures," he "grew in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord," until at his departure he rejoiced in the hope of universal salvation. A number of professing Christians differing from him in sentiment, being present, requested him to renounce Universalism, but he answered—"my mind is fixed, and can not be shaken." They said, of a truth he has the spirit of Christ. Funeral discourse by Rev. Mr. Halley, a Presbyterian. E. M.

In Caroline, February 18th, Sylvester Rounseville, in the 66th year of his age. About 35 years since, he removed from his native place (Freetown, Bristol county, Mass.,) to the place of his late residence. He always sustained the character of "an honest man, the noblest work of God." Possessing an independent mind, he refused his assent to human creeds, and acknowledged no rule of faith but the unvarnished language of Holy Writ. The pains of a protracted illness were endured without a murmur, and he resigned his spirit into the hand of the Being who gave it, in the full assurance of a happy immortality. Sermon by Rev. Mr. Morse, (Presbyterian.) from Eccl. vii: 2. W. R.

In Wilna, of consumption, January 24th, Mrs. Sarah Adams, widow of Asahel Adams, in the 77th year of her age. In life she was respected and beloved, and in her death she demonstrated the power of Universalism to banish the fear of death. Her funeral was attended by the writer. J. H. Whelpley.

In Richford, Tioga county, January 29th, Joseph Smith, aged about eighty years. Sermon from 2 Sam. xiv: 14, by W. R.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, APRIL 27, 1838. NUMBER 17.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER IX.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

THE DISPOSITION.

Situated as we are, in the midst of our fellow-beings, constantly mingling and holding intercourse with them, we are made dependent upon them, to no small extent, for the enjoyments of existence. But human nature, as developed in this life, is a strange medley of contradictions. Those faculties and propensities which the benevolent Author of our being conferred upon us for our benefit, frequently, from a neglect on our part of properly cultivating and controling them, become the sources of unhappiness. Thus the social propensity—the desire to mingle with our race, which all human kind possess to a high degree—becomes the source of enjoyment or of wretchedness, as we duly understand and properly cultivate its incentives, or neglect it, and allow it to be controlled solely by the unrestrained passions. This social principle is possessed, in a peculiar manner, by females. They are, therefore, deeply interested in its operations and influences; and it becomes a subject of no small importance to them, to know in what manner its highest enjoyments can be obtained.

In your intercourse with your fellow-beings, the pleasure to be derived depends entirely upon the disposition which you cherish towards them. If you respect, esteem, and love them, your satisfaction in their society will be of a high degree. But if you envy, hate, or in any way dislike them, their presence becomes the source of unhappiness; and even the thought of them, whenever it occurs, gives you disagreeable sensations. It is thus evident, that certain dispositions or feelings cherished towards others, are, in their influences, disagreeable and painful, while others of a different character, impart satisfaction and enjoyment. It is my object in this chapter, to notice briefly a few of the most prominent of these dispositions, of both classes.

Envy is a disposition that frequently usurps a place in the mind. Its influences are of a degrading and painful character. Envy never imparted a pleasurable emotion to the human bosom, and never can—it is as contrary to its nature, as for ice to give out heat. It is not only a sinful disposition, but one of the most foolish that the young can well entertain. Will envying the appearance, condition, or possessions of any individual, give you the desired object?—will it confer upon you wealth, or influence, or splendid dresses, or any qualification, either moral, mental, or bodily? Will it effect any change for the better in your circumstances, even the most trifling? Why, then, permit this painful and malignant disposition to enter your bosom? Why make your heart the den of a scorpion, whose every sting is inflicted upon your own happiness? Why voluntarily permit an enemy to enter your mind, and drive out those true friends, peace and contentment?

Do you inquire how to deter this feeling from taking possession of your heart, or how to cast it out when once therein? I answer, by reflection. Reflection is a light that will reveal the true nature of this hydra, and convince you of the inconsistency of cherishing it. Reflection will satisfy you that there is not so much to be envied in the world, as many would seem to believe. To ascertain the real influences upon their possessors, of those circumstances or possessions that are the most common cause of envy, we must apply to those who have experienced them. Ask those who have participated in all the enjoyments that power, wealth, and splendor can bestow, if they should be envied by those in more ordinary circumstances. Abdoulrahman III, was one of the most powerful and prosperous of the Spanish kings of the Arabian race. Victorious and wealthy—surrounded by splendor and magnificence—every one imagined that he must be the happiest of mortals. But listen to his own account of his enjoyments, after reigning fifty years: "From the time I ascended the throne, I marked every day that afforded me true pleasure, and those days amounted to fourteen!" To which he adds—"Mortals! consider what this world is, and how little we ought to rely upon its pleasures." Pope Adrian VI, who arose from a poor barge-builder, to the Papal throne, desired the following inscription to be placed upon his tomb:—"Here lies Adrian VI, who deemed no misfortune which happened to him in life, so great, as his being called to govern." From these and many additional instances that might be cited, you perceive how entirely inadequate is power, or popularity, or wealth, or splendor, to confer happiness. Why, then, should you envy those who possess them? Remember that gay dresses and splendid equipages, are but glittering coverings which conceal, in general, even more wretchedness than tattered garments. Be content, then, with your condition. An honest, virtuous, and benevolent heart, will confer upon you a greater amount of pure happiness, than all the wealth of the world! If your associates possess enlightened minds and agreeable manners—if they are respected and loved by community—envy them not, but do that which is much better: endeavor to equal them in their good qualifications, and you will soon share with them in the general respect.

Jealousy, is another disposition which you should be careful to avoid. Jealousy is justly termed "the green-eyed monster." It is a bitter foe to human happiness—it coils in the bosom like the serpent, and chokes the fountain of true enjoyment. If you would be blessed with peace, never permit jealousy to enter your mind. It will not only make you unhappy, but will cause you to do and say many things improper and ridiculous. Never be jealous that others are receiving more attention and respect than yourself. If they are deserving of it, you should be willing that they should receive what they are justly entitled to; but if they are not worthy such attentions, you may be assured they can not long command them. And in the meantime, study to make yourself agreeable, by an exhibition of the genuine excellences of the female mind and disposition, and you will have no cause of jealousy towards others. If your affections are placed upon an individual worthy of them, he will be careful to give you no cause for jealousy. But if his conduct is of that improper character as to afford reasonable cause for jealousy, it is a certain indication that he is not worthy your confidence or love, and you can not too soon break off all intercourse with him. There is, hence, no justification for harboring emotions of jealousy. They are painful, unbecoming, derogatory to your character, and should be spurned from every female heart.

Young ladies should also avoid indulging hatred, anger, revenge, and all emotions of a like character. These are the baser passions of the human heart—exceedingly reprehensible in man, but in woman disgusting and horrible. What will more entirely eclipse the loveliness of the countenance, than a scowl of hatred, or a storm of anger! And not only so, but how completely wretched do they cause those to become who indulge them! Every improper disposition cherished towards another, infuses a poison into your peace and happiness—so that by indulging them, you but injure yourself.

The most effectual method of destroying evil dispositions, is by cultivating good ones. Would you be respected, and esteemed, and loved?—would you render yourself agreeable and pleasing?—would you be received into the circle of your associates, with the approving smile of friendship and approbation? There is but one way to accomplish this, and that is, by adding to a virtuous character, a kind, friendly, and benevolent disposition. How much these add to the attractions of a beautiful form and features! and how engaging do they cause the most plain and ordinary to appear, who exhibit them in their conduct! If you desire to be unesteemed, disliked, avoided—if you desire to be filled with anxiety and wretchedness—then you should be ill-tempered, morose, unkind, and uncharitable. But if you would secure the friendship and good will of others—if you would open in your own bosom a fountain of unfailing satisfaction—exhibit towards those with whom you associate, kindness, condescension, gentleness, forbearance, and evenness of temper, and you can not fail of accomplishing your object. What can be more captivating in a young lady, than a constant exhibition of kind emotions towards all around her—than a disposition to oblige, to make herself useful to her friends and all connected with her, and to display a placid sweetness of demeanor, that no circumstance can ruffle or disturb! And how enchantingly lovely is a young woman overflowing with pity and benevolence for the poor and unfortunate! A lady who has a cold, unfeeling heart—who can look unmoved upon sorrow, and want, and distress, while she is surrounded by comfort and plenty—is an anomaly! With such a disposition, of what avail are her fair complexion, and faultless features, and symmetrical form? Every lovely attribute, when covering a heart of stone, becomes repulsive and abhorrent to the generous and noble mind. She is a "scentless flower, which shall blossom without esteem, and fall without regret!" But the female whose heart is susceptible of emotions of pity and generosity—who is eager to assuage misfortunes and relieve distress—adds a crowning excellency to her attractions, that can not fail to win admiration and esteem. If young ladies would promote their own prosperity and happiness, they must look well to the dispositions they cherish. Let them eradicate all that is evil, and cultivate whatever is virtuous and good—let them exhibit "affability of manners, gentleness of demeanor, attention to the courtesies of life, compassion towards all who suffer, whether high or low, a kind construction of all the words and actions of their fellow-creatures, and patient forbearance, or generous forgiveness towards those who have grieved or injured them," and they will thus lay a safe and sure foundation for peace and happiness.

CHAPTER X.

CONVERSATION.

It is a prevalent supposition that ladies possess the faculty of "ready utterance," in a higher degree, as a general rule, than the other sex. This position is strengthened, when we consider the fluency and ease with which females, when unembarrassed, communicate their thoughts. But this fluency of speech, when unguarded and unrestrained, becomes, not unfrequently, the fruitful source of evil. The character and prospects of ladies, depend much upon the matter and the manner of their conversation. To be enabled to select proper and useful subjects for conversation, and to express themselves in an appropriate and pleasant manner, are accomplishments which every young female should strive to acquire, and the possession of which, will tend greatly to her advantage in society.

It is true, nature is diversified in her gifts in this respect, as well as in others. To some she gives a greater aptitude or capability of expressing their ideas in a fluent and graceful manner—while others find it difficult to speak in a mode satisfactory to themselves, or pleasing to others. But as appropriateness in conversation, depends not more upon the manner of speaking, than upon the character of the thoughts expressed, nature frequently equalizes her endowments, by giving unto those who are "slow and lame of speech," clear, strong, and expanded minds—so that the deficiency in their utterance, is more than counterbalanced by the value of the sentiments they express. However, the faculty of conversation is capable of great improvement. By proper application and attention, the most deficient in this respect, can learn, not only the proper subjects of conversation, but also to speak in an appropriate and agreeable manner.

That there are evils growing out of an ignorance upon this subject, admits of not a doubt. How much unhappiness has been caused by improper language. Who has not experienced the evils flowing from even one "unruly tongue" in the neighborhood? How many misunderstandings, difficulties, feuds, animosities—how much contention, and discord, and warring—have been caused by "the little member," when it is "full of deadly poison!" Not only has society experienced these evils, but they have extended themselves to kingdoms. Nations have been involved in long and bloody wars, originating solely in the utterance of a harsh expression, or an unguarded sentence.

My suggestions upon this subject must necessarily be of a general character, relating more particularly to public intercourse, than to conversation with intimate friends and relatives in the private family circle. Although in the latter case, the spirit, and in most instances the letter, of the remarks that follow, should be strictly observed.

In conversation, guard against raising your voice to a high key. Young ladies frequently overlook this precaution. In the hilarity of their spirits, they are liable to indulge in a volume of voice, which, were they alone, would startle them. The improprieties of this practice, must be evident. It is highly indelicate. There is a certain modesty and reserve which young ladies can no more overstep with propriety, in their language and voice, than in their personal manners. The practice of loud speaking, is not only indelicate, but it disturbs others. What can be more disagreeable than for a female voice to be raised to the alto key, and stun the rest of the company into silence. All eyes are rivetted upon its owner, and in many a discreet mind, she becomes an object of censure and dislike. Neither should loud conversation in the public street, be indulged in—a habit which some young ladies think quite allowable and appropriate. But it is an offence against delicacy and propriety. Young women of commendable modesty, will be cautious how they attract the gaze of the throng in the public streets, by their loud speech, or rude behavior. You can not be too circumspect in your demeanor in public. An indiscretion, either in word or action exhibited there, is noticed by many, who will set it down much to your disadvantage.

Equally to be avoided is an affected, lisping, or drawling manner of speaking. By some, this is considered exceedingly polished and lady-like. But in this they greatly err. The real lady studies to speak naturally, and that is ever gracefully. An affected tone or pronunciation, evinces a weak mind—so weak, indeed, as to resort to this outward mincing, to establish pretensions to gentility, instead of exhibiting those emotions of kindness and urbanity, which are the unfailing indications of genuine politeness. You greatly mistake, if you imagine your claims to the character of a lady, can be established by affectation. This, so far from gaining you the esteem and respect of the listeners, will make you appear insipid and simple—devoid of taste and good sense. Many young ladies, by vain affectation in their language and manners, have often created disgust, where they might otherwise have gained respect. I repeat, in your conversation, speak in your natural tone of voice, and with a pronunciation clear, distinct, and correct. Lexicographers, as well as people of different countries and communities, vary in regard to the rules of pronunciation. Johnson and Walker, are both deficient in many respects. Webster is more chaste and natural, and in this country, is rapidly becoming the general standard of pronunciation.

Be upon your guard against engrossing too much of the conversation in company. When you reflect how often the most guarded speak in a manner which they afterwards regret—how often they converse on subjects, and relate circumstances, and circulate reports that are improper—you will perceive the dangers which surround the unguarded and talkative; and you will also perceive the necessity of allowing the judgment to hold with firm grasp, the reigns of the tongue, that nothing of an injudicious character may be uttered. In company, if you can not speak to the purpose—if your tongue is liable to run away with your sense—the less you say, the better. But if you can converse in a judicious and sensible manner, you still should avoid speaking too much, because others may have a desire to express their sentiments, as well as yourself. Few people have an inclination to remain silent by the hour, to listen to your words, however proper they may be; but all desire to bear a part in the general flow of social conversation. I would not recommend an entire reserve, a total silence—this would be as much an extreme as volubility—though not so dangerous. Every young woman should exercise her judgment in this respect, and take such part in the general conversation, as circumstances and propriety dictate. However, "it were far better to leave a circle wishing, from what you have actually said, that you had said more, than out of patience with you for having talked so much."

Young ladies should avoid conversing even in whispers, in assemblies convened for the worship of God, or for any public lecture. This practice is highly reprehensible. It disturbs both the speaker and the audience—especially those in your immediate vicinity. There is no greater manifestation of a lack of politeness, than this. When I behold young people, on such occasions, inattentive to the subjects that should engross their entire attention, and engaged in frequent whisperings, I instantly set them down as youth extremely ill bred, and entirely destitute of the most ordinary rules of decorum!

Never allow yourself to speak evil of another, without the most ample evidence of their guilt. Mankind, in their best estate, are liable to err. There is enough, therefore, to be said of the real defects of ourselves as well as others, without attributing evil conduct to people, of which they are not guilty. You should be slow to believe reports detrimental to the good name of your neighbor, and still slower in spreading them abroad to the world. I urge you not to countenance or cover up vice—this would be very improper. But I would have you very cautious about believing or circulating statements detrimental to the reputation of another, until you are fully and perfectly satisfied that they are guilty of the misdemeanor alleged against them.—Neither withhold praise wherever it is due. It is a mark of a selfish and vain spirit, never to allow that any but yourself or your particular friends, possess any talent, acquirement, or worth. But it is an indication of a generous and noble mind, to give credit wherever it is due—to acknowledge the valuable qualities displayed even by an enemy.

Do not allow yourself to indulge in ridiculing any, in regard to their dress or appearance—especially the poor and the aged. This would evince an emptiness of mind, and a coldness of heart, deserving of deep reproof. The young lady who indulges in this practice, is unworthy of affection or respect. Having no heart to feel—no sense of propriety to direct—whoever becomes connected with her, will most certainly and keenly feel the evils flowing from these deficiencies. In company, you should avoid making any one the subject of much raillery, or the butt of witticisms, or endeavoring to turn the laugh upon them. Those who indulge in these practices, often unthinkingly gain enemies, when their only object was to cause merriment. And although it can hardly be necessary, yet I would caution young ladies against expressing themselves in coarse language, or interlarding their conversation with degrading epithets, or illustrating their views with low comparisons. I need not say that all these practices are opposed to female delicacy and propriety.

In conversation, always endeavor to be agreeable, pleasant, and sensible. These are no small additions to the attractions of a young lady. In company it is not inappropriate to engage occasionally in grave and serious conversation, yet, generally, the topics should be of a cheerful character, as the object of assembling in company, is to confer mutual enjoyment and satisfaction. But in allowing the conversation to be cheerful, care should be taken not to permit it to degenerate into the frivolous or ridiculous. The amusing and instructive should both be blended together, so as equally to interest and improve those who converse and those who listen. It is time wasted to engage in conversation that has not a tendency to enlighten and improve.

To have your conversation interesting to others, it is necessary that you possess a well cultivated and well stored mind. Without this pre-requisite, there is danger that it will be insipid and irksome to the discriminating. In despite of all precaution, the true qualities of the mind will develope themselves in a free interchange of thought. While the weakness and imbecility, the selfishness and vanity, of the ignorant and untrained mind, will become clearly visible—on the other hand, the discipline and cultivation, the intrinsic excellences and valuable acquirements of the enlightened understanding, will, without effort, brightly shine forth, and add beauty and interest to the possessor. This should be an additional inducement to influence young women to turn much of their attention to mental cultivation.

You will beware of egotism, as much as possible. Let self, with its importance, its accomplishments, and all its wonderful achievements, be forgotten in the desire either to please, interest, or instruct those with whom you converse, or in a disposition to learn from their superior wisdom or experience, wherein you was before deficient.

Avoid the appearance of pedantry. Your talents and acquirements should not be devoted to display alone, but to the instruction and edification of those with whom you associate. Whenever, therefore, you converse with those whose attainments are limited, instead of making a pompous display of your knowledge, and speaking in a strain above their comprehension, interspersed with hackneyed expressions, or quotations from a foreign language, or with scraps of poetry, you should accommodate yourself to their capacities, and speak in a plain, simple, instructive manner, which they can understand and appreciate. It is one of the characteristics of a discriminating and enlightened mind, to know how to accommodate itself to the condition, employment, and capacities of those with whom it converses, so that it can impart and receive information, by an exchange of thought with the most ignorant.

Always give the strictest adherence to truth. How dark is the stain cast upon the character of the young lady, who is known to deviate from the straight line of truth. Veracity is one of the brightest jewels of the female character. Never allow it to be sullied under any pretence whatever. But by a strict adherence to truth in all cases, erect a strong pillar for the upholding of a spotless reputation.

Some young ladies, who reside in our cities and villages, when visiting their friends in the country, often exhibit a great lack of discretion and propriety. While speaking lightly, and perhaps contemptuously, of the plain appearance, dress, or habits of the people of the country, the constant themes of their conversation, are the fashions, amusements, and the superior refinement of a city life. Every thing in city or village is extolled, while all in the country is cried out against, as outlandish and vulgar. At social parties, and often at church, their whole time is spent in pointing out, and making remarks upon, the alleged boorish appearance and manners of the people. It is truly surprising that young ladies who indulge in these practices, do not perceive their impropriety—do not perceive that this conduct shows an entire lack of good breeding, of genuine politeness and gentility—do not perceive how evident they make it appear, that those very country people whom they ridicule as so far removed from fashion, are immensely above them in every valuable and useful qualification, in every trait of real urbanity and politeness.* Such young ladies should be aware that in this manner they make themselves perfectly ridiculous, and that in the eyes of the discriminating, they are the ones who are deficient in the most valuable qualifications of ladies. In visiting the country, you should go as learners, and not as instructors—for there are many valuable lessons, not only in industry, economy and taste, but also in the rules of propriety and good manners, that you can learn in the country, and profitably put into practice when you return. And you should avoid pressing upon your country friends, your peculiar views of fashion and manners, which too often originate in the degrading corruptions of the town—and, in general, allude to them no farther than to answer inquiries relating to them. Fashions deeply bordering on indelicacy, are sometimes tolerated by the vitiated taste of the city; but those who should adopt them where the purer and more modest taste of the country prevails, would be justly subjected to ridicule and scorn.

*See definition of politeness, in "A Voice to Youth," chapter viii.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CONFESSION OF FAITH.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

There are some facts in reference to the Presbyterian Confession of Faith, which appear to be at variance with consistency and candor. It is well known that our Presbyterian friends hold protracted meetings; and it is equally well known, that they proclaim a free salvation to the people, declaring that all may be saved if they will. And yet their Confession of Faith says, "By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death. These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definite that it can not be either increased or diminished." Con. Faith, pp. 16, 17. And the salvation of the elect is "without any foresight of faith or good works." Now, where is the fairness in affirming that all men may be saved, if they will, when God has decreed that only a certain number, definite and unchangeable, shall be saved; a number neither to be increased nor diminished? Can a man not belonging to that number, if he so wills, add himself to it, and thus make the number to be saved greater than God decreed? Impossible! It then follows that one of two things must be true; either, first, the leaders of Presbyterian protracted meetings must believe one thing and tell the people another; or else, second, they are ignorant of the Confession of Faith; which is inexcusable.

They may perhaps deny believing the Confession of Faith; but the dilemma, even on this denial, is as great as ever. For, first, this Confession of Faith is the standard-creed of the General Assembly.—Second, it is the creed by which they try all their heretics, and by which they suspended Rev. A. Barnes, of Philadelphia.—Third, one of the greatest secret reasons why the Synods of Utica, Geneva and Genesee were cut off from the mother-church, was, that in many particulars they had departed from this very creed. Fourth, the Convention formed by the exscinded Synods, at its session in Auburn last August, did pass a resolution to adhere to this very Confession of Faith, and to denounce a departure from it, heresy. Now let them deny this Confession of Faith.—They then stand in the unenviable light of sustaining and supporting a creed as true, which they believe to be false.

In reference to these things, there are but two honorable courses to pursue.—First, if they believe this creed, say so, and cease telling the people that all may be saved if they will.—Second, if they do not believe this creed, say so, and cease upholding that which they deem unscriptural.

It is well known that a portion of the Presbyterians are very much opposed to the Catholics; that they look with abhorrence upon the notion that the Pope has the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and that the priest should attempt to forgive sins. Are they aware that their creed essentially inculcates these very opinions? Let us see. "The Lord Jesus, as king and head of his church, hath therein appointed a government in the hand of church-officers, distinct from the civil magistrate. To these officers the keys of the kingdom of heaven are committed, by virtue whereof they have power respectively to retain and remit sins, to shut the kingdom against the impenitent, both by the word and censures; and to open it unto penitent sinners, by the ministry of the Gospel, and by absolution from censures, as occasion shall require." Con. Faith, pp. 129, 130. Now, did the Pope or his priests ever claim more than the Presbyterians here claim? They claim power to open heaven to the saint and shut it to the sinner; and also of retaining and remitting sins. Moreover, in some cases, they remit sins for money. Let an Universalist become so recreant to his cause, as to keep his faith silent and join a Presbyterian church, and pay his money to her institutions, and they find no difficulty in setting his sins aside, and letting him into heaven with the saints. What is this but remitting sins for money? If then, Catholicism is so bad, how comes it that so much of it is incorporated into this creed? And how comes it, that some of the most violent opposers of the Roman Catholics are among the warmest supporters of the Confession of Faith?

With such manifest errors and absurdities existing in it, can Presbyterian Protestantism wonder that dissention is creeping into its ranks, like the cholera, and that upon all its institutions is written, "thou art weighed and found wanting—therefore thy glory is departing, and thy end is nigh"?

Auburn, February, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SLANDERER.

BY MISS U. M. FELTON.

If there is a being in the wide universe who justly deserves our contempt and disapprobation, it is the slanderer. A person whose low and debased mind can find pleasure in undermining the character of another, without any cause whatever, and frequently on the most casual or accidental acquaintance, is unworthy of the name of man. His bosom is void of all sensibility, and he is dead to every finer and better feeling of mankind. He sees no good or amiable quality in the person he wishes to injure, but is ready to impute every action to the worst possible motive. His heart is the seat of envy, jealousy, distrust and apprehension. He is ready to believe every report however unfounded, and if sufficient proof can be given of its falsity, will give it no credit, but still lavishes his invidious remarks against the object of his hatred. If the person on whom his vile sarcasms are continually falling, happens to possess qualities which he does not possess—if he is endowed by his Creator with intelligence—if his mind soars above the trifling things of earth, and rests for a while on the beauties of that celestial kingdom whose glories are imperishable, and where no deceit or malice can ever enter, he is ridiculed for his piety, and branded with every name ignominious and contemptible.

But if this disposition is degrading in man, how much more so in woman! She who can stoop to the low and vulgar practice of slandering her own sex, possesses an unenviable disposition—a disposition which ought to be avoided as the bane of society—and which is far more to be dreaded than famine, pestilence, or the sword! Well hath the poet said,

"He that steals my purse, steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he, that filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that, which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."

The slanderer is the most despicable object in the universe. His tongue is poison, his breath is destruction! Wherever his influence is felt, it causes a moral pestilence. It pays no attention to sex, rank or condition—and although the object may have nothing but his character to depend upon for his livelihood, of this it is regardless, for it buries without discrimination the fatal dagger in the hearts of all. What, let me ask, what can be the object of the slanderer? Is it to build his own character on the destruction of another, that he so industriously applies himself?—does he not know that the foundation is rotten, and therefore the superstructure must fail?—that the same gallows which Haman erected for Mordecai awaited himself?—and that the punishment will descend redoubled on his own guilty head? We were born frail and erring creatures—we all have our failings and imperfections, and it would be far more commendable in us, if we would endeavor to cast the beam out of our own eyes before we attempt to discover the mote in our brother's.

Hamilton, April, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE HUDSON RIVER CONFERENCE met at the Eastern Union meeting-house in Nassau, on Wednesday and Thursday, March 21st and 22d, and organized by making choice of Br. A. BAILEY, Moderator, and Br. W. WILCOX, Clerk. Eight sermons were preached by Brs. Manley, Hathaway, Cook and Wilcox. They were listened to with great attention, and we have reason to believe they will result in much good. Our friends in all the region around are awakening to a newness of life, and have concluded to avail themselves of the stated ministry of the Gospel.

The Universalist society in Stephentown, which has for some time slept in the dust of the earth, is coming forth to the resurrection of life.—The prospect now is, that one or more meeting-houses will be erected in this region as soon as business shall have regained its wonted activity. May the Lord prosper the work and hasten it in due time! W. WILCOX.

Feelings are stars, which are guides only when the sky is clear; but reason is the needle, which aids us even when the former are obscured.

An ancient writer, speaking of such as are enemies to innocent amusement, says "had the people the government of the world, the would deprive the year of spring, and life of youth."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE GLORY AND JOY OF THE PREACHER.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

St. Paul concludes the second chapter of his first instructive and affectionate Epistle to the Thessalonian brethren, with this very feeling declaration—"For ye are our glory and joy." In the preceding part of this epistle, the apostle apprizes them of the great degree of consolation which he derived while absent from them, from the remembrance of their works of faith and labors of love, and that patience of hope in the Lord Jesus Christ, which characterized their spiritual progress. He then reminds them of the fact, that the Gospel came not unto them in word only, but also in power, and in much assurance, and predicated their conviction of this truth, in some measure, upon the knowledge which they possessed of the character of the apostles, who had labored among them for their improvement and moral enjoyment. And after greatly commending their rational zeal, and the readiness with which they received and obeyed the truth, and informing them of the beneficial and happy effect which their faith and corresponding conduct had produced in Macedonia, Achaia, and in other places—he then appeals to their personal knowledge relative to the manner in which he and his coworkers had entered in among them, and the effect which it had produced—refers them to the gentle, mild and charitable course which they had pursued among them, and to the cruel and unreasonable opposition which had been excited to arrest the progress of truth and righteousness—speaks of being then separated from them for a season, in presence, not in heart, and of his indefatigable endeavors to enjoy their society again as soon as circumstances would permit. He then informs them that his absence from them was a matter of absolute necessity, and was prolonged only by the hindrances which the adversary threw in his way, and concludes with the language above cited—"For ye are our glory and joy."

Every preacher of the restitution, is placed in a condition very similar to that in which the great apostle of the Gentiles found himself. He is engaged in promulgating an unpopular doctrine—one which comes in direct contact with the strongest prejudices of community generally. He is persecuted, despised, and set at nought—is slandered, misrepresented, and opposed in every possible manner. He can expect to gain but few friends in whose affection and fidelity he can safely confide; and therefore, when he succeeds in finding a society of faithful and tried believers, who can appreciate his labors of love, and who are prepared to breast the storm of sectarian opposition and unreasonable persecution, with a firm and abiding resolution, he may well say from the centre of his soul, "ye are my glory and joy." His affection for them will be as permanent as the divine principle of love, and as lasting as the faculties of the mind. He will delight to remember them in all his travels, toils, misfortunes and cares, and no earthly consideration can draw away his thoughts and feelings from them. And nothing will so augment his joy and consolation, as the well grounded conviction of their intelligence, virtue and faithfulness—except it be the happy assurance, that he shall henceforth meet them in a glorious immortality, where imperfection, temptation and persecution, will no more disturb the progress of love, peace and felicity. This being the case, what torturing emotions must prey upon his mind, if he perceives among them the indulgence of a spirit of indifference—of unfaithfulness—of carelessness—of infidelity—a disposition to neglect the appointed means of instruction and devotion—to dispense with the benefits of the public sanctuary, and to turn again to the weak and beggarly elements of the world? His very soul must be chilled and pained to its inmost core—he must endure vital agonies. And yet it is to be feared, that in too many instances, such tortures are endured, when I am confident they would not be, if the members of religious societies more generally were apprised of the interest which their pastors feel in their prosperity, and increasing faithfulness, and virtuous punctuality.

But it may be said, that every preacher of the restitution is not a PAUL. True, but they all possess a similar physical and moral constitution, and hence, are similarly affected by the appearances and conduct of their hearers, or those with whom they labor in word and doctrine; presuming always, that they are worthy the ministerial character, and none others should be employed in promulgating the Gospel of the grace of God. It is admitted that we are all imperfect beings, and therefore there is the greater necessity of our faithfulness in mutual endeavors to encourage, assist and benefit each other. Paul in this way, proved a great blessing to the Thessalonians; and we have seen that the Thessalonians in turn, proved a great blessing to the apostles. Neither party would have proved a blessing to the other, without attention and faithfulness in their respective endeavors to extend and exemplify the holy principles of the Gospel of peace, and to promote each other's spiritual interest and happiness.

It may be said again, that every believer is not a THESSALONIAN. True, but every believer is endowed with similar faculties and capacities to embrace and adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, and to strengthen the hearts and hands of the Herald of divine grace and truth, and is morally bound to do so, by the same obligations that bound the Thessalonians. Hence, as the circumstances, nature and condition of the modern preacher are similar to those of the primitive apostle—the nature, capacities and obligations of modern believers, are similar to those of the ancient disciples—and the principles of Gospel truth the same in essence, and importance, and utility, that they were in the commencement of the Christian era, there can be no rational excuse for those delinquencies which sometimes prevail in religious societies, to the disgrace and injury of the truth of Heaven.

Let every society of Abrahamic believers, then, unitedly and heartily strive to encourage, incite and assist their preacher in the laborious and responsible duties of his office, that he may prove an ornament to his profession, a light in the world, and a useful instrument in the providence of God, of promoting and extending that truth and holiness without which there is no salvation—in a word, let them imitate in faithfulness, liberality, love and zeal, the primitive Thessalonians, who received the approbation and high commendation of the illustrious apostle. Let every preacher of the restitution, also, strive incessantly to increase the knowledge, virtue, union, peace and fraternal affection of the people of his charge, by a faithful, unvarnished, plain and fearless declaration, illustration and defence of the truth, and by a constant exemplification of the sentiments which he is engaged in proclaiming—in a word let him perpetually endeavor to imitate the worthy examples of the undaunted, persevering and indefatigable Paul the apostle; and then will believers love, believe and cherish their pastors as their best friends and dearest associates; and pastors will feel towards their flocks as Paul felt towards the Thessalonians, and will be prepared to say—"Being affectionately desirous of you, we are willing to impart unto you, not the Gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye are dear unto us." O for such a state of things in the favored ranks of Zion! Then would every faithful herald of glad tidings be prepared in heart and soul to say to the people of his charge—come, let us obey, and praise, and glorify our God together. "For ye are my glory and joy."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A QUERY.—NO. 2.

BY REV. SAMUEL GOFF.

Although I have been engaged but a short time in "the ministry of reconciliation," yet I have labored sufficiently long in the vineyard of my Master, to witness something of the spirit of opposition which is manifested towards the doctrine of the final salvation of all men. There are those in this enlightened republic, who sometimes attend meeting, where the cheering truth of the final emancipation of the world from the thraldom of sin and iniquity is promulgated, for the very express purpose of making disturbance, and interrupting the peaceable worship of the sanctuary. Yes, and among this class of persons will be found not a few who profess to be Christians—the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus.

Such is the self-righteous and Pharisaic spirit entertained by some, that they manifest as haughty, overbearing, persecuting, and revengeful a disposition, as did the popes and dignitaries of the Romish church, during the reign of the inquisition. All that is wanting is the power that the spirit of persecution formerly possessed, for them to rise en masse and publicly denounce as heretics, (if nothing worse) all such as believe in the one living and true God, "who is the Saviour of all men."

In a former number, I was somewhat more particular in describing the nature and operation of this spirit, and queried with those who exercised it, respecting their views of the future state—if they expected to be possessed of such a spirit in the other world—and if so, in what they supposed the joys of the future state to consist. In this article, I wish to inquire whence this spirit originates, and what is the course of its operation. For myself, I can not see what there is in the doctrine of universal happiness, that should expose those who believe and advocate it to the scorn, the contempt and abuse of those who believe in a different sentiment. Why should it excite a spirit of bitterness or persecution in the breast of any true Christian, for us to believe and preach that God has so ordered his designs, and so arranged the plan of his government in the moral world, as finally to subdue the carnal mind, crush the monster sin, destroy the devil and his works, and bring all his wandering children home to himself, to dwell in his house where there are many mansions—surround the table of his love, and feast upon the rich provisions of his bounty and kindness forever?—What is there in this sentiment so derogatory to the spirit of the Gospel, that we must be denied the Christian name, and be denounced as heretics and infidels? Are they afraid that we shall represent the character of God better than it really is? But can this be?—can we too highly extol and celebrate the perfections of the Fountain of all Goodness? Can the stream rise higher than the fountain? But suppose it were possible for finite and erring man, to paint too highly the beauties of divine goodness, and the glories of our Father's character, will he be displeased and punish us for telling his children that he is better than he is? If not, then why should my brother be displeased and exhibit a persecuting spirit, when I tell him that I believe our common Parent is more lovely, kind and benevolent than he supposes? Suppose I am wrong in my conceptions of the divine character and the plan of his moral government, ought he not to pity and forgive rather than censure and persecute me? Methinks I hear a "still small voice saying to my brother—'My Son, you should have compassion on the ignorant and those that are out of the way.'" Whence then is this spirit?—and what is the cause of its operation? Will my Partialist brother answer?

Van Buren, N. Y., 1837.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1838.

LUKE X: 17-31.

There is nothing in this paragraph to occasion any difficulty to the mere interpreter, the circumstances, the occasion and the meaning of our Divine Teacher, are easily to be apprehended. But there is a difficulty connected with this passage, and one which it is at once more difficult and more important to surmount than any difficulty of exegesis or interpretation. There is a difficulty in getting the lesson of Heaven's Teacher—the sentiments of Jesus, incorporated with our daily habits of thought and feeling; in gaining for these an empire and a sway, such as we feel they deserve, over our motives and principles of action. It is not, therefore, the inquirer after scriptural information that we have now to address, so much as him who is chiefly in earnest to conform himself to the dictates and the requisitions of Heavenly Wisdom. Such a practical disciple of Jesus, will at once perceive that the sentiments of his Master in regard to the objects most worthy of pursuit, differ very widely from those which are current in the world around him. From all his recorded conversations and discourses, as well as from his remarks now under consideration, it is evident that Jesus, in respect to the great pursuits and objects of life, entertained sentiments which are altogether of an unworldly nature. He who aspires after the character of a son of God—whose ambition it is to be like, in some degree, and aye more and more, to his well-beloved Son, will at once acknowledge, that he has to unlearn many of the world's opinions and habits—that he has to be transformed from the world, ere he can proceed in his desired process of conformity to the chief of the sons of God and of man. In this process of transformation—in the toils of this overcoming of the world—in the pains and throes of this new-birth—in the exertions necessary for putting on this new man, consists the difficulty to which we have referred.

It does not seem likely that we should take much interest in the case of this young ruler, as Luke calls him, unless, like him, we are very much in earnest about our welfare, present and future, and have been endeavoring to keep the commandments.—If we are sincerely in earnest about our salvation, and have been making corresponding sacrifices and exertions, we may presume that were Jesus now on earth, we would be distinguished with a favor like that wherewith the young ruler was received; "Jesus looking upon him, loved him." On this and other accounts, we presume that the question asked by this young ruler was not, like the most of those which the rulers put to Jesus, of an insidious, entrapping nature. No, it was the question of one who aimed at superior excellence, and wished to merit the favor of God.

There was one commendable quality exhibited by this young man—a quality which we trust exists in the bosoms of the majority of the readers of this paper—a desire to go on improving, to go on unto perfection. He was not satisfied with what he had done, he wished to do still more. The loveliness and the rewards of religion and virtue, had captivated his affections, and the reasonableness of a devotion of himself to the service of Him from whom he derived every thing which he possessed, had made him resolve to be satisfied with nothing less than the utmost which he could do in the service of such a Benefactor, such a Father. The good seed had been sown in his heart, and it had sprung up fair and promising, and put forth lovely and sweet blossoms betokening a luxuriant harvest. Alas! that in him, and so many since, thorns should grow up and choke these promising plants, should prevent these beautiful blossoms from ripening into fruit.

In the corresponding passage of Matthew's narrative, (xix: 16-30,) it is said, that when the young seeker of his way to Zion had stated that he had observed all the commandments from his youth up, he was not satisfied that this was enough, he felt willing to do more, and accordingly inquired of the good Teacher what he yet lacked. Jesus gave him credit for his good intentions, and said, "As thou wishest to be perfect, go sell thy substance, and give it to the poor, and thou wilt have a treasure in heaven." With all his amiability, all his compliances to the letter of the law, all his desires and resolutions after perfection, all his wishes to be a man after God's own heart, he could not bear this severe test, he could not make this seemingly monstrous sacrifice, he could not wholly banish the dominion of Mammon, and resign himself unreservedly to the love and service of God. How many among us would go to Jesus, were he resident among us, with the same earnestness and sincerity as did this young Jew? Upon how many of us would he look with fondness?—how many would he love? In how many of us would his penetrating eye discover desires and resolutions after progress, advancement, perfection? "Would he find such in me?"—were no unsuitable, no unprofitable question for all of us, reader and writer, to put to ourselves. If we have not even the wish and the firm resolve to amend, we are not even so far on the way to the kingdom of heaven as was the young ruler, and he, tried by an unerring test, was found not altogether but only almost a Christian. Do we not go so far as that, even?

To enter into life—to go into the kingdom of heaven, (by which forms of expression we understand enjoying to the full all the happiness of which our nature is capable,) we must, according to the wise, the unalterable law of Heaven, give our affections to God supremely. We can not enjoy all the happiness of which we are capable, while our affections are set on "things below," or while they are divided between two claimants. There is but one road to true happiness—but one source from which it can be obtained: and "no man can serve two masters." Divine love must reign supremely in the heart—must regulate the whole conversation and conduct, ere we arrive at "our being's end and aim"—happiness.—From our own experience, from the observations of the proceedings of our fellow-men, from the representations of Jesus and others in the sacred Scriptures, there appears to be no antagonist of equal power to contest with God the empire of the soul, with Mammon—covetousness—the cares of this life, and the deceitfulness of riches. We may overcome every other form of opposition to God, sooner than this. We may stand convicted of any vice, while covetousness reigns in the heart supremely. Indeed, as has been remarked by Mr. Harris, "the sin may be much more potent in him (the religious professor) than in many of the avowed ungodly around him. In them it has to divide the heart with other sinful propensities; but in him, perhaps, it reigns alone. They can range and wander at will over a larger field of sinful indulgences, but he is restricted to this single gratification. As a Christian professor, he must abstain from intemperance, licentiousness and profanity; but worldliness is a sphere in which he may indulge to a certain extent without suspicion, for the indulgence comes not within human jurisdiction." But while this worldliness is indulged, God is not loved with the whole heart, and not until the supreme goodness has engaged every affection of the heart, can it enjoy true felicity, can it be filled with satisfaction and peace—with a peace which the world can neither give nor take away. Brethren, if we sow sparingly, sparingly shall we reap; if bountifully, we shall reap also bountifully. Let us sow not to the flesh but to the spirit. In our hearts let God have an undivided sway. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CAUSE OF UNIVERSALISM.

Br. Grosh—As I have a few spare moments at command, I hasten to give you some account of the Gospel of the final restitution, in some of the places through which I have travelled since you received my last communication.

In Portageville, Allegany county, our friends seem to be "wide awake" and prosperous, under the well accepted labors of Br. W. E. Manley, who labors with them one-fourth of the time.—Br. Manley also preaches at Gainesville, Genesee county, one-fourth of the time, and, I understand one-fourth of the time at Warsaw, the town where he resides. The cause of truth seems to be prosperous in these places also. Much of the impulse given to the cause of Universalism in Warsaw, resulted from the discussion which took place last Summer, between Br. Sanderson and Elder Whitcher. Much good certainly, was the result of this discussion.

The Society at Abbott's Corners, Erie county, enjoys the labors of our faithful Br. J. Lewis one-half of the time. The cause seems to be gradually gaining ground here. We trust the meeting recently held in this place, will give the cause of truth a new and a vigorous impulse. Br. Lewis labors in various sections of this part of the country. He has travelled and preached constantly the Winter past. He preaches in Boston one-half of the time, and occasionally lectures at Lodi, Waverly and Collins. His health is rather delicate, and has been for some years, and if it was not for his commendable zeal for the welfare of Zion, I presume he would not consider himself able to "hold out" long. May God bless and support him.

The society in Buffalo, is at present truly flourishing and prosperous, under the pastoral charge of Br. D. Pickering. A very general spirit of inquiry seems to be abroad here, in reference to the cause of truth as it is in Christ Jesus. Br. P. has been delivering a course of lectures here in support of divine revelation, which has elicited considerable interest among many who have not before given much attention to this important subject. May God bless and prosper both pastor and people!

The church and society at Ellicottville, Cattaraugus county, we should judge were prospering, under the charge of our zealous Br. Todd. A Universalist Conference was holden at this place on Saturday and Sunday, (March 24th and 25th.) The travelling was quite bad, yet the congregations were respectable. Brs. Morton, Todd, and Brown, present. The eucharist was administered on the occasion. On the whole, the meeting was a pleasant and a joyful one. Our friends here were unfortunate in losing their meeting-house by fire two years ago, just before its completion. It is expected, however, that another will be erected next season. Our friends in this region of county are faithful and true—their zeal is worthy of all acceptation, and of all imitation.

The cause in Springville, Centreville and Hume, seems to be on the gain, under the labors of our faithful pioneering Br. J. Babcock.

When I am more at leisure, you may perhaps hear from me again about the prosperity of Zion in other parts. Truly yours, N. Brown.

Nunda, March 29th, 1838.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, APRIL 27, 1838.

CORNELIUS HENRY FRANCISCO.

I fervently desire to bury forever all the errors of the dead, in the grave with them. But the reputation of others and the welfare of society, require me to expose freely and candidly, however compassionately, this man's evil deeds—and I will do it.

By referring to the Magazine and Advocate, vol. iii, page 133, column 3; and vol. iv, page 269, column 3; etc., it will be seen that the individual above named, has been a cause of much yet unretracted slander against Universalism and Universalists. A tract, even, has been published and widely circulated, calling in question Br. Skinner's honesty and sincerity as a preacher of universal grace, on this man's authority. As a tool to originate and support the stories, the second Presbyterian church in this city, gave him letters of commendation, and supported his character in various ways, long after they were repeatedly certified of his iniquities by respectable men—and though they must have been satisfied, long ago, by undeniable testimony, that he was guilty of bigamy, general lewdness, intemperance, etc., yet thsy never warned the public against him, or publicly withdrew from him their repeated testimony in favor of his moral and religious character! In thus aiding and abetting his numerous acts of bearing false witness, seduction of female innocence, adultery, bigamy, and finally murder, the Second Presbyterian church, in this city, have wilfully, and deliberately, and knowingly been guilty before God and man—and we shall hold all of them who have thus aided him in his villanies, by lending their tacit and direct testimony in his favor, as sharers in his guilt! To show the extent of that guilt, and thus to free the innocent, is my present object. I shall state facts, only—facts which can be proved, so far as witnessed by others than myself, and in all other cases, to which I can honestly and conscientiously affirm before a civil magistrate, whenever called on to do so.

By the politeness of some brethren, I have now before me a pamphlet of upwards of 90 pages, entitled—"Trial, with the Life and Confession of Cornelius Henry Francisco, convicted of the murder of his wife, Maria Francisco, at the Court of Oyer and Terminer, held at Erie [Penn'a.]: November Sessions, A. D. 1837. O. Spafford, Publisher—H. L. Harvey, Printer." Its correctness is certified to by Francisco himself, March 2d, 1838—and the newspapers state, that he again certified to its correctness on the gallows. It purports to have been "revised and corrected by Sylvester W. Randall"—his counsel at the trial.

The following brief abstract of his brief biography, is here given, that our friends in the several places named, may inform us truly of his religious sentiments previous to 1829—they will perceive why, as I proceed. He was born in Gorham, Ontario county, N. Y.—was the youngest but one of eleven children—lived with Mr. Washburn till his eighth year—ran off—stopped at West Avon Square, Livingston county, where he was indentured to a Mr. Beacher, cabinet maker—had a difficulty with him in 1836, [must mean 1826,] when he went to Rochester, and worked at boat building with Mr. Doolittle, for several months—then came to Utica, and after a time married Miss Matilda Ladd, in January, 1829. He declares that she was "a young woman of very respectable character and connexions"—a testimony the more valuable, as, not content with destroying her life in the most revolting and base manner, he also endeavored to destroy her reputation; and many of his Presbyterian friends circulated the most abominable calumnies respecting this excellent, amiable, and virtuous woman! Impelled by what he admits to be groundless jealousy, he soon after deserted his wife, went to Niagara Falls, (where he meditated suicide, but was dissuaded by his companion, a Mr. Crawford,) Buffalo, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Steubenville, Cincinnati, (where he worked some time on steamboats, and attempted suicide by laudanum, but was saved, and afterwards enlisted in the army.) Jefferson Barracks, Missouri, (where he was released from the army,) St. Louis, Cincinnati, Dayton, (where he worked several months.) and returned to Utica in December, 1830. His narrative is very loosely worded, and badly printed, which may account for so many events and so much time being crowded into a duration of less than two years; but it will be seen that his word is not to be relied on. Probably his habit of lying—telling stories in so many different ways—tended to confuse his mind, and to disable him from remembering any thing accurately. Such cases are numerous.

I now come to the most important portion of his biography. I have added my corrections of his statements [in brackets], to save room. Every one of my corrections is strictly correct, as far as my memory and knowledge serve me—where I was doubtful, I have prefixed the phrase "I think."

He says—"I had not remained in Utica many weeks before the terrible idea of suicide again got possession of my mind, and I once more yielded to its temptations. I had during all my former years, since I had been capable of reflecting upon religious subjects, been a flowing [probably a misprint for "flaming"], and dogmatical Universalist, [he assured me in the watch-house, before several witnesses, that he had been a Methodist—that "getting the power" led to frequent depressions of spirits, and induced him once to meditate and twice to attempt committing suicide—that though not a full believer, yet occasional attendance on our meetings, for a few months previous, had freed his mind from those depressing feelings]—and that doctrine now again came in to nerve me on to the second attempt on my life. [In the watch-house he stated that he had taken freely of bark and wine, or cider, (I forget which,) which had produced a sadness of spirits; and that he took, I think, a pint of brandy, which "nerved" him on to attempt suicide. Again he stated, that a brother was attempting to defraud him of his property, left by his father, and that led him to the attempt. In short, then, as now, his word could scarcely be relied on.] I settled up my affairs, gave my money to Matilda, and possessed myself with two loaded pistols, [he got the pistols the day before the attempt—of the rest I know nothing,] sent for Mr. Skinner, a Universalist minister, [he also desired Mr. Aikin, a Presbyterian minister, and Mr. Doolittle, his employer, to be sent for. The latter, fearing for his life, which Francisco attempted the day before, did not come—whether Mr. Aikin was sent for, I know not—] and disclosed to him my whole project of suicide. Mr. Ladd [his wife's father] went for another Universalist minister by the name of Grosh, a partner of Skinner's, and one or two other persons, and they all endeavored to dissuade me from the rash idea, but in vain. [This sentence is very untrue. Mr. Ladd called for Mr. Skinner, who went with him and myself only, and at the same time. No other person was called, or present, till after the attempt was made, to the best of my knowledge.] I now drew my pistols from my box coat pockets, [he had no coat, at all, on—the pistols were several times produced, and always from his pantaloons pockets,] cocked, [they were not cocked until some time after they had been drawn out the last time,] and placing each of the muzzles to the side of my head, [he placed one, only, to his head—the other to his breast,] snapped them, [he snapped only one,] but they missed fire. [The flint being new, crushed against the frizon, without opening the pan.] The men turned as pale as death when they saw me draw the pistols from my pockets, [not so—he drew them at our request, and we rejoiced at the hope of being able to obtain them from him, and had a long conversation with him for that purpose, but in vain,] but sat motionless, [we were standing near to him when he first drew them,] till I snapped [one of] them, [at that time we were standing at the fire, facing him, I half smiling to think how he was trying to scare us with a pretence of shooting himself—for I did not believe he would attempt it,] when they sprang and caught me, wrested the pistol from my hands, [it was a fearful struggle—the one pistol was yet cocked, and his finger pressing on the trigger, while we were every now and then looking into its muzzle during the struggle! Had it went off at either such time, one of us must have perished.] and conveyed me to the watch-house, [this was done by those who came rushing in just as we succeeded in wresting the pistols from him,] where I was kept till the next morning," etc.—and where I had the conversation with him before named.

Such is the whole memorable affair, as enstamped on my memory. He has had the grace not to repeat the falsehood of the Tract, viz., that Mr. Skinner informed him that "there might be an eternal hell, after all;" and that he (Mr. S.) did not preach it, because "it would not do to preach his doubts," etc. Neither does he even intimate that any thing which occurred during this attempt, led to his conversion, as the stories then circulated affirmed; for he affirms—"After this I worked very steadily in Utica for some time, and lived happily with my wife." Infidelity to the marriage vow, on his part, led to a family disagreement and a separation from his wife. In order to give her a chance to get a divorce, (how generous!) he publicly associated with prostitutes. "Thus, (says he,) some months passed away, when one evening I attended a Presbyterian protracted meeting. [Probably there should be no period here.] When I heard the errors of my principles of Universalism pointed out in a light I had never heard them before, I became concerned in mind, and was soon after, as I believed, converted to the principles of Christianity." This is one reason of his conversion. The stories circulated here by the Presbyterians, gave the other, already named, as the reason. To his wife, before the conversion, he said that he would become converted, to get a good character—that he could sing, pray, and exhort with the best of them, etc. To myself and others, he repeatedly declared, after his conversion, that he had never told the Presbyterians that he had been a Universalist, or that Mr. Skinner had made the declaration ascribed to him—that though Universalism had many good things in it, yet he never could see through it to believe it. In short, as I said before, his word could not always be relied on—he told a story so many different ways, that he probably was often given over to believe his own falsehoods. At least, this is the most charitable construction I can put upon much of his conduct.

He says of himself, again—"Having made a profession of religion, and united with the Presbyterian church, I earnestly endeavored that my daily walk and conversation should not disgrace the sacred profession I had made. For a year I believe my conduct was such as would have done no discredit to any professing Christian." The first sentence may be true—he may, possibly have endeavored—but the last sentence is false—he did not conduct worthily for any thing like a year. His attempt at suicide was in the Winter or Spring of 1831—his conversion to Dr. Lansing's church took place in the Winter of 1832. Francisco, in the Confession, page 82, says—"In the month of June, 1822, [a misprint for 1832,] I settled up all my affairs at Utica." After relating his parting with his wife, he says, p. 83, "Having bid my wife farewell, and got a letter and some very good advice from the Presbyterian church, I left Utica, proceeded to Ogdensburg, Kingston and Montreal.—At this time [from June till October] the cholera was raging in Montreal, and I got into the habit of using brandy as a preventative, until over the flowing bowl I bid farewell to my religious impressions, and launched forth upon the dangerous sea of dissipation. I yielded myself up to the influence of the bottle, and lewdness, and absence [probably another misprint] with women." This was all within less than a year after his conversion, if I am not mistaken. But he is not a good witness even against himself. By turning to the Magazine and Advocate, vol. 3, p. 399, cols. 1 and 2, it will be found that in December, 1832—in less than a year after his conversion—we published him as being guilty of many vices and crimes, and referred to several respectable witnesses by name, in this city—some of them not Universalists—for proof of our assertions. In this city, it needs not such references, or any offer of proof—it is undeniable and well known that he was guilty of repeated debaucheries and intemperance before he obtained his letter of commendation from the Second Presbyterian church—that he was a frequent visitor of a house of ill-fame—seeing its inmates home from meeting, and remaining with them till in the morning, under pretence of "praying with them in private."

After he left here, he came back on a visit, and it was well known that he was then guilty of having two wives, that he had been seen drunk in the streets of Buffalo, exhibiting Dr. Lansing's certificate of his standing in the church, etc., etc., and yet fellowship was not withdrawn from him. In fact, after this, some of the members of the Second church bolstered him up, by their certificates in the Albany Evening Journal, in reply to certificates from respectable citizens of this place, published by Br. Williamson in refutation of the story against Mr. Skinner, before alluded to. These certificates fully exposed the man—Dr. Meacham certifying that Francisco was diseased by his debauchery—that he offered to bribe the Doctor to kill his wife, who then was in her death sickness of a broken heart—and several others certifying that he never had been a Universalist, and that he then was drunken and infamous—yet these members of the second church testified——what? that these stories were false?—that F. sustained a good character? No—they were not hardy enough for that; but they declared that Francisco told the story in question, and that they believed him. I am not certain, (for I give this from memory,) but believe they certified that he was a member of the Second Presbyterian church. Whether they so certified, or not, I believe he was then (in 1833 or '34) a member, and had their letter of recommendation yet in his possession! At all events, they never publicly recalled it, nor warned the public against him. To all appearance, under their full sanction he went on and married one if not two wives, while his first was yet living—made several attempts to commit suicide—seduced another female, and lived with her her as his wife, in Rochester—deserted her basely—and finally married a fourth wife in Erie, Pa., while some of his other wives were yet living—and all this, after he had renounced Universalism, (without ever having belonged to any Universalist church or society, or even having believed it!) and after he had become and was a member in good standing in the Second Presbyterian church in the city of Utica, and a staunch believer in the "salutary and restraining" doctrine of endless hell torments for——the victims of his lusts and wrath! Nor is this all. He repeatedly meditated and attempted suicide, and finally dragged his fourth wife (so called) into a united attempt, which failing on his part, left him guilty of her murder, according to the laws under which he was tried. After this he makes repeated attempts at suicide—prates about the pleasure and glory of dying for his "innocent and romantic Maria"—and exhorts his readers to embrace what he calls "the doctrines of the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ," on the same page in which he complacently tells how he was "determined to die"—and all this he could do, and yet Presbyterianism be free from all blame on his account; but his attempt at suicide in 1831, when (as he now pretends) he was a Universalist, must be taken as proof positive and clear, that Universalism leads to suicide and is false!!! Oh, shame, where is thy blush?

Are my remarks severe? Are they not, also, merited? Even now, this very pamphlet, full of crimes confessedly committed while Francisco was a Partialist, is used by our opposers to put down Universalism! Silly folks that they are, not to see that the barbed point is towards their own bosoms!

In conclusion, candor requires me to declare, that I consider the man as having been subject to paroxysms of insanity—brought on, probably, by his excesses and debauchery, or by the goadings of an evil conscience, or both—and that in these fits he attempted suicide, and committed the murder. Such is my firm conviction from the testimony on his trial, and from what I have seen and heard of the man. But as the Presbyterians in this city and elsewhere, who upheld and yet uphold him as a proper witness against Universalism and Universalists, certainly, are responsible for all the aid and influence they have given him, they may estimate their share of guilt in his falsehoods, drunkenness, adulteries, bigamy, suicide and murder for themselves. This is not the only case, though one of the worst cases, in which some Partialists in this city have winked at the wickedness of their members, and bolstered them up longer than honest men should uphold workers of iniquity—but this is enough—more than I wished to expose of their faults and follies—and I therefore gladly close my labors.

My comments may go for what they are worth, for they are hastily written; but if any respectable man in this city can be got to deny my statements, I am prepared to prove them true. If I am mistaken in any particular here stated, I stand ready, also, to correct it as fully and publicly as any friend to truth can desire me to do. A. B. G.

FRUITS OF THE REVIVAL.

The great protracted meeting, rapidly dying away, was commenced by the Baptists in the Bethel church, in West Utica, by Elder John Fishpool—"dear Brother Fishpool" as he was called—who afterwards was engaged as the regular pastor of that church, and who continued a very active agent in the protracted meeting, until his sun of glory set in a mist, and he was among the missing some time about the beginning of this month. The following, from the Baptist Register of the 20th inst., will throw a little light on the subject.

JOHN FISHPOOL.—We have the deep mortification to state that this individual, whose name appeared in the Register as a minister who participated in the late revival meetings in this city, has given occasion for great reproach, by base and licentious conduct, alleged against him by persons of unblemished character, and about the truth of which there is no doubt. We have felt called upon, by a sense of duty, as we have contributed to give a favorable publicity to his name, to correct, as far as possible, the mistake in which his rare imposition had involved us and a great portion of the Christian community. He left here for the city of New-York a fortnight ago or more."

The crimes of which plain "John Fishpool," ("dear Br. Fishpool" no longer!) is accused, are fornication, (if not adultery,) and attempts at, if not actual sodomy!!! These crimes of his were as well known some weeks ago, as they are now; and finding it impossible longer to conceal the iniquities of the pastor of the Baptist church in West Utica, and the beginner of their great revival, from the public, they now come out and very briefly, modestly and delicately notice him in a corner of their paper!

The same cloaking up of other fruits of their revivals, has heretofore been manifested by the Presbyterians and Baptists of this city—and even now, they say nothing of the cases of insanity, and deaths, and attempts at suicide they have caused, nor of the other iniquities and imprudences their converts and friends have been guilty of. To elicit some, which the public—especially parents and guardians—should know, the following queries are proposed to them for answers. It may be as well to state that I believe they must be answered in the affirmative, if answered truly—but am not certain.

1. Did not this "John Fishpool" board and lodge in the new Female Academy, at the corner of Pearl and Genesee-streets in this city, and for which a splendid new building is about to be erected this season?

2. Did he not have free access to the pupils, for "private prayer" with them in their rooms?

3. Was he not allowed to associate freely and privately with them, as a "spiritual guide and teacher?"

4. Were not the pupils generally dragged into the revival, until the Trustees or Managers of the institution were obliged to interfere, on account of the pupils being kept up very late at nights, in supposedly "religious exercises," conducted by this "John Fishpool?"

5. Did not many of the pupils continue, after this, their attendance on the protracted meeting, and on the "midnight devotions" of this "John Fishpool?"

6. When they found out that the character of "John Fishpool" was becoming rather more public than they wished it to be, did not some of the leading revivalists advise him to leave the place, instead of aiding to arrest and punish him for his beastly violations of the laws of God and man?

7. Is there not at least one more prominent actor in the late revival, against whom they have been warned repeatedly, and whom they still countenance and support?

8. Did not the leading Baptists allow "John Fishpool" to preach a farewell sermon, after they knew him to be guilty of some or of all the crimes alleged against him?

Lastly—Are they yet anxious to test the merits of Universalism and of their own faith, by an examination of the moral characters of their preachers and members, and of ours; especially as Mr. Fishpool himself declared that the Universalists of this city, of his acquaintance, were "immoral to a proverb."

The questions relating to the Female Seminary should be plainly answered, as it is presumed that those who place their daughters there, are not favorable to a revival of the ancient religion which prevailed at Sodom at the time of its destruction!!! Answers to the other questions will show how far the late revival has tended to make its actors abhor and discountenance all iniquity, and to make them willing that the wicked shall be punished, and the innocent freed from unjust slander.—Perhaps more anon. A. B. G.

REMOVAL.

After the 1st of May, our Office and Bookstore will be kept at No. 41 Genesee-street, East side, between Broad-street and the Rail Road Depot—in one of the new four story buildings lately erected on the ruins of the Burnt District.

We are thus minute in directions, that friends who may desire to call on us may the more readily find us—not that our location is difficult to find. Will our friends remember No. 41 Genesee-street, East side, near the Rail Road? G. and H.

THE RECORD.

REMOVALS.—Br. J. Potter's engagement with the society in Lockport will close about the first of May, when he will remove to Cooperstown, and itinerate in Otsego county and the vicinity. Letters, etc., to be addressed to him at Cooperstown. Br. J. H. Willis, of Stafford, Conn., has removed to Petersham, Mass. Br. E. E. Guild has engaged to preach in Worcester, Otsego county, and wishes to be addressed at that place hereafter. Br. James W. Baily has removed from Phillipston, Mass., to Hinsdale, N. H.

NEW PAPERS.—The Southern Evangelist, lately printed in Charlestown, S. C., by Brs. Gregory and Hall, has been united with a new paper, published by Br. Andrews at Macon, Georgia. It is called the Evangelical Universalist—edited by Brs. Gregory, Andrews, and P. Bronson—weekly, small quarto, at three dollars per annum—well printed and edited.

The Gospel Witness and Old Colony Reporter, a new news and religious paper is the title of a newspaper changed partly into a Universalist paper published weekly, in Hingham, Mass., at two dollars per annum, in folio form—Edited by Br. A. A. Folsom. Chandler, of the United States Gazette, says it is an Allgemeine Zeitung—truly is it—Allgemeine (universal) in contents, and in doctrine.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in May, by Br. T. J. SMITH at Cedarville—Br. E. H. CHAPIN at Richfield Springs, and at Hallsville, at 5 P. M.—Br. MCADAM at Munnsville—Br. GROSH in New-Hartford—Br. C. B. BROWN at the Court House in Pulaski.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in May, by Br. T. J. SMITH at Knoxville—Br. C. B. BROWN at Onondaga South Hollow.

Br. E. H. CHAPIN will lecture on the evenings of May 9th, in Cooperstown, 10th, at Burlington Flats or vicinity, at such place as Br. Parks may appoint, 11th, in Bridgewater.

THE NEW-YORK CONVENTION meets in Oxford, Chenango county, on the last Wednesday in May next.

The Central Association in Michigan will hold its annual session in Ann Arbor, Washtenaw county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, next. It is hoped that every preacher in the State will punctually attend, and an affectionate invitation is given to all others to "come over and help us." Churches and societies will be careful to send delegates properly accredited, and carefully instructed in relation to business to be transacted. N. STACY, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Perrinton, for J E C, J A and W T—O W P, Franklinville, for self T G, N R and A C—P M, Goff's Mills, for self, R H, G H and Z B—P M, Portageville, for G W—H A Chapinville, for self S G, W H and G C—Rev T C E, Dunkirk—P M, Salisbury, for S T and W C S—J S A, Throopsville, for H B D, P W, J A, and W F—H J P, Marshall, (Mich) for self, V S A, P C, J B C, A W B, A B and T R—H B, Bonton—P M, Sommerville, for A T and L M.—P M Natural Bridge, for J W and J I—W S. Lyons, for self, B C Jr, B D, J P and W J N—Rev O W, Fowler, for self, D F, C S, B H and G G—F R, North Penfield, for self, B C, J R, J Y, N K, A S and E P—J R R, White Hall—P M, West Burlington, for J R, C H and J W—P M, North Lansing—A W D, Brockville, (U C) for self and R W—J P, Michigan City, (Ia) for self and S W—I N, Northville, (Mich) J D, Harbor Creek, (Pa) for self, J N, S McC and A P—H B C, Batavia, for self and S A—P M, Fennu, for A B, L R V, P R and N P—S H, Boonville, for D H S and W J—J V F, Bloomfield, (Ills) for self, G G T, C F and E R.

POETRY.

From the Knickerbocker.

THE HUMMING-BIRD.

Insect bird of the glowing plume,
Fairy king of the world of bloom,
That drinkest honey and rich perfume
From thy vassals in bed and bower,—
Say, did the rim of the rainbow fling
Those regal hues on thy glowing wing,
That gleam as thou hangest quivering
O'er the cup of you dew-brimmed flower?

Rays from all gems of the rock and mine
Seem confused in that crest of thine,
As, a moment perched on yon trellised vine,
Thou stayest thy rapid flight;
Safe support as the proudest tree
Would to the foot of the eagle be,
Doth you slender tendril yield to thee,
Nor bends with its burden light.

Thou art gone!—thy form I do not see,
But I hear thy soothing minstrelsy,
Sweeter than ever the toiling bee
Out-poured from her "mellow horn."
Perchance thou piercest the jasmine's cell,
Or drawest, as from a golden well,
From the amber depths of the lily's bell,
Bright tears of the dewy morn.

While kissing the blossoms of gold and blue,
Dost thou not pilfer each glorious hue,
And deeply thy tiny plumes imbue
With the colors from nature won?
But no.—for Flora when gayest drest,
Hath not a tint in her varied vest
Like those which flash from thy jewelled breast,
In the blaze of the Summer sun.

Lo! thy scented feast is forever spread;
When Northern flowrets are pale and dead,
Thou to a sunnier clime art fled,
Where their beauty forgets to fade.
When roses sleep on the bending stem,
And the diamond dews all their leaves begem,
Thou veilest thy head, and dost dream of them
Till riseth night's curtain of shade.

Thou hast power from each blossoming thing,
Drops of the richest balm to wring,
And thy life, if brief, is a joyous spring,—
A bright lapse 'neath a shadeless sky.
Not so with man—when he thinks to dip
In the rose of pleasure his glowing lip,
A viper stings as he stoops to sip,
And he turns away to sigh!

EXTRACT.

Indulge me, my friends, with one supposition more on this subject, and I have done.

Here is a man, whose ruling passion is honor. If he were allowed to fashion his own reputation, he would be distinguished for an excessive sensibility which feels a stain as it would a wound. Influenced by the contemplation of imaginary characters, he endeavors to form himself after the model of heroes he has admired in history, or characters that he has contemplated in the lustre of romance. But as soon as this man enters into the world of actual existences, he finds that he has been preparing himself for a different sphere. He finds that the every day virtues of sober and industrious citizens meet with a better reception than all the refinements of superior spirits, with the light of which he hoped to encircle his character. He begins to suspect that he has fashioned his feelings for a state of society which it is the amusement of romancers only to portray, and of enthusiasts to imagine, and that he has lost much of the happiness which he might have found in this mixed world, merely by seeking for beings which do not yet exist, and cherishing expectations, which the ordinary race of his companions will delight to disappoint. He will wish in vain, that he had been cast from his youth among the roughnesses and disappointments of life, that he might have acquired a disposition adapted to the world in which he is to bustle; and if God should once more allow this child of refinement to choose the character he would sustain in life, you would find him seeking for happiness in the customary track of human virtues.

You will recollect, my friends, that in the beginning of this discourse we hoped to establish two conclusions. First, that God alone disposes of our lot in life; and secondly, that his arrangements are made with the kindest intentions towards every individual. These conclusions are most interesting and important, and most consolatory.

Let us bow at the feet of the Omniscient Being who orders our circumstances in life, and say, O God! I am ashamed of my pride, my discontent, and my vain expectations. I have been disappointed in life, but it was thou who didst disappoint me and I murmur not. I have been fortunate, but it was thy blessing which gave this unexpected success to my projects, and I am humble. If my plans had always succeeded, they would have interfered with the wise arrangements of thy providence, and merely for my partial good, disconcerted the profound and extensive operations of thy wisdom and beneficence. When I look back upon my life, I see that thou hast trained me up in the sure and progressive order of thy providence, to the character and the hopes, which I now possess. When I have thought myself abandoned, thou hast been watching me with paternal care; when I supposed myself most miserable, I have found myself nearer to the acquisition of the only permanent good. The very circumstances of my life, which I thought the most inauspicious, I find the most favorable, and the very trials, which I thought would terminate in my misery or death, I now find had the most benevolent tendency, the most cheerful conclusion. My expectations have been often defeated, and my views altered, but I still find myself crowned with loving kindness, and surrounded with opportunities for virtue and happiness. In all the events of life, then, I will bless thee. Though the fig-tree should not blossom, and there should be no fruit in the budding vine of my hopes, yet will I bless the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation. I have trusted thee for this life, and with sentiments like these, in continual exercise, may I not trust thee, O God, for eternity?—Buckminster.

SCRAPS FROM THE GERMAN OF JEAN PAUL.

Self-knowledge is said to be the way to virtue; it would be more correct to say, that virtue is the way to self-knowledge. A pure mind, like a diamond, is clouded by the slightest defilement, and does not see till after its purification how many specks and stains still disfigure its holes and corners. And the purest are tormented by foul thoughts, which cling to them like spiders to the walls of a palace, and which must be crushed at once, or they would overrun the whole building. Alas! our completest victories over ourselves are all but defeats!

Nothing is so odious in an acquaintance, as the discovery of a new defect in him.

Passion is a keen observer, but a wretched reasoner. It is like the telescope, whose field is clearer the more contracted it is.

One of our most common and most hurtful mistakes is to suppose that we are the only person who sees this or that.

A man never feels exactly at his ease in the presence of a perfectly reasonable woman.

Poets are always best at depicting passions they do not feel; and the flowers of poetry, like those of nature, are most fully developed in an artificial atmosphere.

Excessive sensibility, like paralysis, produces at the same time great sensitiveness and great helplessness.

When man has nothing left to love, he falls in love with his very sorrow over the departed.

The spirit rises amid gloom, as does the barometer, which foretells the coming brightness, even while clouds are yet around it.

A speedy cure of the mind's ailment is, as with the body's, the sure forerunner of a relapse.

Why is it so much harder for us to submit to the future than to the past?

The sting of fate must be met as we meet a bee's; for unless we remain quiet, the sting remains behind and festers.

What a wretched world is this, which three or four good or great men can reform or shake to its foundation!

Man regards as an eternity—first the present hour—then his youth—then his life—then his century—then the duration of the earth—then that of heaven—and finally—time.

Society is improving as much as the stage. In the latter, we now insist on correct costumes and faithful imitations; and so in the world—we are no longer satisfied with coarse bigotry or hypocrisy, but must have the true outside of virtue, even where the inside is wanting.—Mirror.

MARRIAGES.

In Ellisburg, March 27th, by Rev. H. Kinsley, Mr. William T. Searls, of the firm of J. H. and W. T. Searls, to Miss Laurilla L. Williams, eldest daughter of Pardon Williams.

At Dixon's Ferry, Ills., February 9th, by Mr. P. Carr, Esq., Mr. Harvey Goddard, of Troy Grove, to Miss Reform Cooper, of Franklin Grove.

In Laurens, April 5th, by Rev. L. Hyatt, Mr. Alfred D. Brown, of Otego, to Miss Margaret Fowkton, of the former place.

In Geddes, March 15th, by Rev. S. Barnes, Mr. Daniel La Dow, of Niles, to Miss Frances West, of the former place.

In Buffalo, on the 5th inst., by Rev. Mr. Hosmer, Rev David Pickering, pastor of the Universalist church, to Mrs. Angeline Green, widow of the late Doct. Green, all of that city.

DEATHS.

In Wilna, on March 14th, of consumption, Mrs. Amelia Shattuck, consort of Abel Shattuck, aged 48 years. In her life she was an example of the domestic and social virtues. She bore a painful illness of nine years, with Christian fortitude, and died triumphing in the faith of a world's salvation. She has left a husband, two children, and a numerous circle of friends to mourn an irreparable loss. Her funeral was attended by the writer. J. H. Whelpley.

Same place, March 28th, of old age, Mr. Moses Pearson, in the 90th year of his age. He lived for many years, and died, a worthy member of the Presbyterian church. May his surviving children remember that though they have no father on earth, they have a father in heaven. His funeral was attended by the writer. J. H. Whelpley.

Same place, March 29th, very suddenly, of inflammation on the brain, Mrs. Laura Ingalls, consort of James Ingalls, in the 43d year of her age. She was a worthy member of the society of Universalists in this town, and has left a husband and ten children to mourn her departure. At her funeral an overwhelming congregation assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to departed worth. Sermon by the writer.
J. H. Whelpley.

In Berkshire, Tioga county, September 6th, 1837, Mr. Seth Akins, aged 75 years—a soldier of the Revolution, and a steadfast Universalist. But a short time previous to his departure, he said that his faith in universal grace grew "stronger and stronger." Sermon by the writer, from Job xiv: 10. W. R.

In Boston, on March 2d, Miss Elizabeth C. Sanderson, only daughter of Jacob Sanderson, and sister of Rev. G. Sanderson, of Rochester, N. Y., aged 23 years. The subject of this notice, although possessed of a remarkably strong constitution, was a victim of consumption. Ardent in her attachment to her friends, frank in her manners, generous almost to a fault, she had secured the affection of a numerous circle of acquaintances, and as she made up much of its life, and animation, so must her absence be severely felt. Her principal anxiety in health, was to have all around her happy, and never was she known to withhold what she could contribute towards it. It is melancholy to see so many who occupy so much room in the hearts of others, falling a prey to the unsparing ravages of consumption. Hard as it was for her to sever the many ties which bound her to society, and society to her, yet she did it, in a manner worthy the character of a most experienced Christian. The goodness, grace, and salvation of God, were more and more her theme till death. Expecting to meet not only her relatives and friends, but the whole human family, in a world where sorrow, suffering and death can not reach, she died as one asleep. Her fortitude and patience in sickness affords an eloquent and affecting lesson to her young friends. May they and the bereaved family be sustained by Him whose throne is goodness, and whose occupant is love.—Trumpet.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

PRINTED BY A. B. GROSH.
Knickerbocker Hall, South side of Catharine-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MAY 4, 1838. NUMBER 18.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER XI.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

SELF-GOVERNMENT.

The importance of self-government, to young ladies, is so perfectly evident, that it is unnecessary to enter upon a labored argument to prove a point so clear. Having endowed us with all the powers and faculties necessary for our enjoyment and usefulness, our Creator enjoins it upon us to bring these capabilities into a proper activity, and to allow the mental and moral powers to exercise that guidance and control, for which they are so peculiarly adapted. Self-government, therefore, is a necessary duty, devolving upon us from our constitution and condition. A faithful discharge of this duty, is one of the most effectual means of securing the highest earthly prosperity and enjoyment; but its neglect will as effectually involve you in the deepest wretchedness. Know thyself, and control thyself, are two injunctions fruitful in blessings. If self-government is necessary for young men, how much more important is its exercise to young women!—how absolutely essential to their character and general safety! Without its controlling influence, you may imagine yourself free, but you are in imminent danger of a miserable vassalage, a degrading bondage to every evil principle, every debasing passion. Without it, although you may, for a season, remain respectable, yet you have no assurance that ruin and wretchedness will not speedily overtake you. Indeed, without a firm and decided self-government, it is impossible for you long to retain a good character, and a common proportion of happiness.

The basis of strict self-government, rests upon a knowledge of your own nature, the character of your wants, and the proper manner of supplying them, and an enlightened understanding of the moral and religious instructions of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. A greater or less amount of ignorance upon these points, will, in a proportionate degree, involve you in a debasing thraldom to the animal propensities, and dim the lustre of your higher nature. But become enlightened upon these points, and to the same extent will you be enabled to restrain and control the various passions which pertain to your bodily constitution.

A perfect self-government is no trivial achievement. "He that is master of his own spirit, is a hero indeed." But it is much easier to obtain this victory in youth, than in more advanced life. If you commence young a habitual self-control, the passions are easily brought under proper restraint, and you can govern them through life without difficulty. But delay until they have obtained an ascendancy over your higher nature, and you can not succeed in reducing them to the control of the mental and moral faculties, without an arduous and afflicting struggle. There need be no ignorance respecting the manner of exercising and enforcing self-control; for nature has afforded you every needed requisite. The propensities prompt to a certain action, and urge its commission. The mental faculties enable you to discover the real nature of the act, and point to the consequences which will flow from it—and the moral powers will indicate its character, whether right or wrong, good or evil. Now, self-government consists in abiding by, and enforcing, the decisions of the mental and moral powers. But by giving way to the promptings of the propensities, in violation to the dictates of the higher faculties, you destroy self-control, and unfailingly become involved in wretchedness.

From these reflections, you perceive that self-government should first be exercised upon the thoughts. Indeed, I may safely say, this is its entire field of operations. Few, if any, actions, good or bad, are performed, that are not the subject of a mental process—so that the action partakes of the character of the thought. To have the actions right, then, the thoughts must be pure—and to obtain this purity, the thoughts must be under the guidance of the mental and moral powers, and above the swaying influence of the passions. Many seem to imagine it unnecessary to exercise any control over the thoughts, but allow them the entire range of the imagination. "Why restrain the thoughts?" says one—"thoughts are harmless." Virtuous thoughts are harmless; but all thoughts are not of this character. Those of a vicious nature, will sometimes obtrude upon the mind, and when allowed to remain there unchecked, they become the primary elements of sinful actions. But if you exercise a proper self-government, and with firmness expel immediately such thoughts, when they enter the mental abode, they will then have no opportunity to obtain a foot-hold, or to exert their poisoning and destructive influences.

In previous chapters, I have noticed several subjects that might legitimately come under the head of self-government. As it is unnecessary to repeat them, it only remains for me to call your attention, briefly, to a few additional points, in regard to which it is necessary to exercise self-control.

Petulance is a failing strictly to be guarded against. This is an unhappy state of mind, to which young ladies sometimes give way. To become irritated at every little circumstance which is not perfectly agreeable—to permit the flash of anger to overspread the countenance at every trifling offence—will destroy the influence of the loveliest personal attractions, and cause her who exhibits this irrascible temper, to become disagreeable to herself and offensive to others. These outbreakings of petulance, throw you entirely off your guard, and while the fit is on, render you almost as destitute of the guidance of reason, as the monomaniac. Yet you are as accountable for your conduct in these paroxysms, as in your calmest moments, because it is no excuse for a reprehensible action, that it was performed under the influence of anger. Many are the words and the actions of which you are guilty in moments of petulance, that you deeply regret when cool reflection ensues; and in this manner you subject yourself to ridicule and disrespect. A disposition of this character, clouds your prospects of a respectable and eligible connection. Who can desire to be united for life, to one who gives every indication of speedily becoming a scold and a vixen?

There is undoubtedly much difference in natural temperament, in regard to this disposition. Some are quickly excited by circumstances that would have but little influence upon others. But no one has been endowed with a disposition that is ungovernable. By a due cultivation of the intellectual and moral powers, and by a proper exercise of them in self-government, the most irritable disposition can be held in subjection. Whenever you discover your temper rising in such manner as to threaten an outbreaking, bring it at once under the control of the higher sentiments—exert reflection for one moment, on the disagreeable effect and result of such a disposition, and you will be greatly aided in self-control. If you feel that your irritation is like to exceed command, exercise sufficient presence of mind to leave immediately the presence of the offending party, if possible, and the effervescence of your anger will be the more harmless, and will the sooner subside. It has been recommended, that when persons are becoming angry, they should speak in a subdued and gentle tone of voice, which would be more likely to keep the passions in a calmer state. "A soft answer turneth away wrath," says the wise man—and not only so, but will cause your own anger to subside. Caius Gracchus, the Roman, was a man of strong passions, which often led him into a loud and boisterous manner of speaking. To remedy this evil, he caused his servant, Licinius, always to attend him with a pitch-pipe, or instrument to regulate the voice, with directions that whenever his master raised his voice above a certain pitch, he should sound a soft note on his pipe. This ingenious expedient had the desired effect of keeping Caius within the bounds of moderation. If the fair reader, when emotions of anger are kindling in her breast, would think of the pitch-pipe of Caius Gracchus, it might greatly assist her in allaying its outbreakings.

Self-government is necessary to avoid violating the confidence reposed in you. In your intercourse with your associates, many circumstances will be communicated to you with injunctions of secresy. There are some who, it would seem, are entirely incapable of keeping a secret any length of time. The moment they obtain it, although, perhaps, profuse in protestations of inviolability, they are as restless with their charge, as though they were pressing coals of fire. They give themselves no peace, day nor night, until the privacy is divulged in a delightful gossip with some other secret-hunter, who receives it with like promises of silence, only to be again broken in like manner. Others receive confidential communications, with an honest mental resolve that they will not divulge them. But in an unguarded moment, the secret is revealed to some intimate friend, from whom it flies to another, and another, until it finally becomes entirely public. This imbecility is wholly owing to a lack of self-government. There is much prudence to be observed in receiving communications of a confidential character. You should never pledge your word to keep a secret, until you ascertain something of its nature—or should never make such pledge, without a reservation against concealing any fact that duty would require you to divulge. If reports are repeated to you, calculated to injure the character or peace of an innocent individual, however strong may be the injunctions to secresy, you should unhesitatingly reveal them to the person to whom they relate, that wrong may be prevented or remedied. But when a friend reposes confidence in you, and communicates information which no clear duty calls upon you to divulge, you should lock the secret in your breast, and never, without permission, reveal it to the most intimate companion. Under these circumstances, you should strictly conform to the golden rule, and keep the secrets of another, as you would have another keep yours. And by exercising that self-control which all can command, you can succeed in this determination, to a most perfect degree. While upon this subject, permit me to remark, that it is exceedingly improper to importune or endeavor, in any way, to wring from others, secrets which they desire not to divulge. Politeness and propriety direct, whenever an evident disinclination is manifested to reveal any thing of a confidential nature, that you should forbear further solicitations, and remain silent in respect to it.

Strive to be contented with your condition. "A contented mind is a continual feast," says the old maxim truly. Contentment is an unceasing fountain of enjoyment. Without it, all conditions, however elevated or prosperous, are alike barren of happiness. In this manner—under the influence of contentment—the peasant in his cottage, is often vastly more happy than the monarch in his gorgeous palace.

"Hail, blest estate of lowliness!
Happy enjoyments of such minds
As, rich in pure contentedness,
Can, like the reeds in roughest winds,
By yielding, make that blow but small,
By which proud oaks and cedars fall."

It is important that young ladies should strive to be contented with their condition. The influences of a disposition of an opposite character, will not only make them unhappy, but will be liable to lead them into efforts to change their circumstances, that may be indiscreet, yea, positively dangerous. Wisdom and prudence dictate that they should qualify themselves for a faithful and useful discharge of duties, which, from any change of circumstances, may devolve upon them; but, in the meantime, to remain contented with their present circumstances, until opportunity shall offer for a prudent change. A trifling exercise of self-government, in this respect, can not but be highly beneficial.

Never allow yourself to dislike those who would counsel you. Young people are liable to indulge in this feeling. Whenever parents or friends would dissuade them from those things that would exert a deleterious influence upon their prosperity and happiness, they sometimes look upon them as needlessly opposing their enjoyments, and hence allow a feeling of dislike to arise against them. But this is highly improper. "Love those who advise you, not those who praise you," says Boileau. Think not those unkind who would caution you respecting your conduct. They harbor no evil design against you—their only object in counselling you, is your benefit. Had they no regard for your welfare, had they no interest in your peace and prosperity, they would remain silent. But being alive to your happiness—cherishing a deep solicitude that you should be respected and honored—they watch over you with careful scrutiny, and would direct you in those paths which, while free from danger, will lead you into permanent peace and enjoyment. In this light should you look upon their admonitions. You should allow their exertions in your behalf, to awaken sentiments of esteem and gratitude, rather than dislike. And with a knowledge of their kind intentions, you should permit their advice to have a deep and abiding influence upon you.

Finally, study your own nature and disposition; learn your respective duties toward God, your fellow-beings, and yourself—cherish the resolution to discharge them faithfully—and the work of self-government will not be difficult or irksome.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;
FOR SUNDAY, MAY 6, 1838.

JOHN XI: 1-57.

There are several considerations which conspire to render the study of this passage highly interesting. It contains a narrative of the greatest miracle which our Saviour ever performed—it is detailed most graphically and circumstantially—it presents some beautiful exhibitions of character; and above all, perhaps, it is interesting to dwell upon this miracle, because it sealed the fate of Jesus, inasmuch as it produced the assembling of that counsel or Sanhedrin at which it was determined—solemnly, resolutely determined—that he should and must die. On account of this connexion between the resurrection of Lazarus and the death of Jesus, we take a peculiarly deep and solemn interest in the contemplation of this narrative.

This miracle is unnoticed by the other evangelists, probably because Lazarus was yet alive while they wrote, and their mention of this transaction might only have directed against him an additional quantity of odium and persecution.

How delightful to observe the proofs of human sympathy and friendship between Jesus and the family of Lazarus! While we dwell upon the contemplation, we feel an augmentation of our hope, that, at some future day, we shall be blessed with his favor, intimacy and friendship.—Who does not envy the happy lot of that family in being the friends of Jesus! Bethany, the place of their residence, was about two miles out of Jerusalem, and it seems probable (Luke xxi: 37, 38,) that, when Jesus was attending the festivals at Jerusalem, he walked out of the city in the evenings, and took up his abode with this beloved family. Encompassed with enemies, and jealously watched in the city, he could, however, repose in security and peace in this little village and simple family. And how delightful must these evenings have been—especially, when from his eye and his tongue there flowed indubitable proofs that "Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus"!

Observe with what confidence this friendship was counted upon by the sisters in their message to Jesus. Not only did they manifest a belief of the ability of Jesus to heal their brother, but they also showed that they had no doubts of his willingness to leave his employments and his retreat, and come to him whom he loved. Jesus had retired from Judea most probably to secure himself against the malignant and ceaseless persecution of the Jews, properly so called—yet notwithstanding, the sisters think that he will risk his safety in the immediate neighborhood of Jerusalem, whenever he hears that his friend Lazarus is sick. There is a beautiful delicacy in the message:—"He whom thou lovest is sick." The sisters obtrude not their wishes—they leave Jesus to interpret them himself, or they are confident that when he hears of their brother's sickness, his friendship for him will make him as willing and urgent to come as they were to have him.

The conduct and bearing of the two sisters under their affliction, accords well with the sketches of their characters which we have by another evangelist. (Luke, chap. x.) Martha is more lively, more active; Mary more tender, more reflective. Mary is so overcome by her feelings of grief that she is unable to move, when a messenger, who had seen Jesus, comes to the house with the tidings of his being near. Martha's grief less disabled her from acting as she was wont; she immediately ventures forth to meet the much longed for friend of the deceased. It would be highly uncharitable in the case of Martha, or in the case of such of our neighbors as resemble her in character—more disposed to activity than to indulge their feelings—it would be uncharitable to such, to say that they do not feel the loss of their friends as they ought. Another's grief may be as real as mine, although he does not express it with so many demonstrations of an afflicted spirit. The heart alone knoweth its own bitterness. From the minuteness of detail given by John, we think he must have been an eye-witness of the emotions of these two sisters, and their grief must have made a deep impression on his tender feelings.

In the brief notices of the twelve disciples, in the commencement of this chapter, we see how very little they understood of the character, mission and duties of the Master under whom they had so long been receiving tuition and discipline. The primary consideration with Jesus, was to seize every opportunity of proving his divine mission, in the hope of thereby turning many to righteousness, (John ix: 4, 5,)—the first consideration with his disciples seems to the last to have been, not a participation in the spirit, views, labors and dangers of Jesus, but a preservation of themselves and their Master from the malice of their enemies until the time of their triumph and power should arrive. In the 8th verse, we see that the disciples endeavored to dissuade Jesus from again venturing within the precincts of Judea; and when they discover him determined to go thither, we find Thomas, in the 16th verse, speaking out the latent feelings of, probably, all of them—"Must we also, go, and expose ourselves to destruction with him?" According to the common version the sentiment of Thomas was a much more magnanimous one; but the above which is the version of Wakefield, is equally warranted by the original, and is, moreover, much more correspondent to the known narrow, temporal views of the disciples, and to their pusillanimous conduct when their Master was betrayed into the hands of the Jewish authorities. Then they debated the same question as now, and the result was base desertion—"they forsook him and fled." The generality of Expositors say, that the disciples did not understand our Saviour's tender and delicate mode of announcing Lazarus' death, recorded in verse 11; but we think they comprehended his meaning well enough, and by their childish answer betrayed their unwillingness to return to Judea. Any evasion to escape the danger!

After surveying the characters of the afflicted family, and of the disciples, let us contemplate the character of Jesus as developed in the circumstances of this story. And here we behold not only tender friendship, and self-sacrificing love, but also prudence, supreme devotion to duty, magnanimity, and dignity. After Jesus had received the message of Lazarus' sickness, he remained two days in the place where he then was. It appears that Lazarus died on the day on which the messenger came to Jesus, for being four days dead when he arrived, it is generally reckoned that one day was consumed by the messenger on the journey, two by Jesus in delay, and one on his journey to Bethany. The purpose of this delay in Jesus was, that the miracle which he was about to perform might be more undoubted, more impressive, more notorious. Had Lazarus been dead only one day, cavillers would have an abundant number to believe them, when they insinuated that there was a collusion between Jesus and his friend "to deceive the people." Not indifferent was Jesus to the sufferings of Lazarus, nor to the sorrow and grief of his sisters. Fain would he have hastened to their relief, for he "loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus." But he had a great work to perform, and in the prosecution of this work, he sacrificed his sympathy for the family and friends whom he loved. From this we may derive a lesson, which may be useful to us if we will only copy it in our conduct. It is always agreeable and pleasant to act in accordance with the promptings of kindness, compassion and benevolence; but it is not always prudent, nor always right. Higher obligations may have a previous claim upon us—the obligations of justice, fidelity to engagements, devotedness to some high and noble pursuit. Prudence also may impose restraints upon the ready hand of charity, suggesting to the tender-hearted, that the evil consequences of their well-meant interference, will far overbalance the relief which they feel inclined to confer. Any one of these considerations, may give to the conduct of the most kind and compassionate an appearance of coldness and severity. Let us wait for the development of palliative and explanatory circumstances. And, when we ourselves are restrained from charitable and compassionate actions, let us be fully satisfied in our own minds, that we are guided by views of which we need not be ashamed before an intelligent world—by considerations, for entertaining which we should feel no "compunctious visitings" of conscience when we place ourselves as in the immediate presence of our Father and Judge. The sympathy and friendship of Jesus were abundantly attested by his struggles with his feelings, and by his weeping on the way to the tomb of Lazarus.

It was, and still is, customary for females in the East, to resort to the graves of deceased relatives, and weep there. If this, and having the house full of friends for seven days as was usual among the Jews, seem strange to us, we must recollect that grief, like all the passions, is more violent among Asiatics than among the inhabitants of more temperate climates. We must recollect, also, that all the furniture, utensils, etc., in a house where any one had died, were accounted unclean or unfit for use for seven days, so that the family of the deceased were almost condemned to inaction. Friends and neighbors, during these seven days, brought in all their victuals, (as there was nothing in the house which could be lawfully used,) and generally, also, bread and wine.—Jewish sepulchres were frequently formed by making an excavation in a rock, closed at the entrance with a stone. The bodies were placed in niches cut in the sides of these places.

Upon some of the multitude who beheld this miracle, it had the effect which Jesus desired.—(vs. 15 and 42.) Some believed that he was the Sent of God; while upon others, this miracle had only the effect of making them more hostile to one whom they feared, but would not have to reign over them. They longed for a king who should deliver them from the Romans, but such a king as Jesus, they thought would only render their condition worse. Hence, in a great measure, their antipathy and hostility. The supreme authorities now think it time to interfere; and the death of the most blameless, the most perfect on earth, is, with wickedness unexampled, resolved upon. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LOVE OF APPROBATION.

Perhaps there is not an original element in the constitution of our mental nature, which is more powerful or more frequently called into action, than this appetite, sentiment, or feeling—the Desire of Applause—the Love of Approbation. It is the motive of an immense proportion of human actions; and many of our plans and actions, with which it does not seem to have much connection, may be found, by minute inspection, to owe much of their character to this, perhaps, unacknowledged but powerful element in our desires.

If it is by a right use of our several faculties that we can secure, our own happiness, or make our services truly useful to our brethren, that is, subservient to their best interests and true felicity, then it concerns every man much that a proper direction be given to this powerful sentiment and motive of action, and as man is so very apt to err, that he should be guarded against all improper and injurious directions which may be given to this impulse to action. As this propensity is in an activity which may almost be denominated ceaseless, it must be incessantly productive of weal or wo—ever bringing to the bosom of every man joy or sorrow, satisfaction or dissatisfaction, peace or perturbation. If this faculty of our nature be misdirected or perverted, it will be productive of vice and misery; if properly directed, it will ever be bringing forth the fruits of utility, pleasantness, and self-approbation.

The love of applause—the passion for glory has led men into so many ridiculous and mischievous excesses;—among the followers of fashion, the competitors for a praise which really was infamy, there have been so many fools, and among the followers of fame, the votaries of military and even civic renown, there have been so many savage oppressors and destroyers of mankind, that it is easy for a pulpit or moral declaimer, to denounce the passion for applause altogether, and without qualification. This course we have found to be a common one, but we think it one highly injudicious. "Every creature of God is good"—every part of the constitution of the universe is good, and may be made the means of improvement and felicity, while, at the same time, by perversion, the very same portions of the constitution of nature, may become the prolific sources of degradation and misery. We think it therefore an unwise, an unprofitable, and an indefensible mode of procedure, to paint in the liveliest colors those excesses to which any of our powers, propensities, or dispositions lead us, and then, in unmeasured terms, rail against these and human nature together. We should be cautious in thus judging and thus accusing, lest we be found to accuse even the Author of Nature. True philosophy doth not follow this course, as we see in the case of the best writers on Phrenology and the Moral Constitution of Man. Among these we find no denunciations of man's nature, no unqualified condemnation of any of his propensities to action. The use is demonstrated and recommended, while the abuse only is rebuked or deplored. A number of instances occur to the writer's mind, at this moment, in which the greatest Philosopher or Expounder of man's nature and duties, even the Teacher who came from God, adopted the same course. He pointed, in numerous instances, the way by which man could secure the true, unadulterated gratification of several of his passions and propensities, by only changing the objects to which they were directed, and from which gratification was sought. In the exordium or opening of the sermon on the Mount, and in the course of the same discourse, the reader will find examples of the manner of instruction which we admire in Jesus, in the Phrenologists, and in some few of the professed expounders of our mental and moral constitutions.

Endeavoring to avoid the error of the pious (?) villifiers of human nature—of wordy and reckless declaimers—and to follow the example of those whose method of dealing with human nature we have been eulogising, we admit the pernicious abuse of this desire of approbation in a large proportion of its manifestations, but at the same time rejoice that there is a lofty, ennobling, happifying use to which it may be turned, to the love and practice of which, we fervently wish that the hearts of ourselves and our brethren were devotedly applied. We do not say that no wish should exist for the approval of man; but we are well assured that it were well for every man, were his anxiety for the praise of men equally insignificant and unapparent, when compared with his solicitude to secure that praise of which God alone is the dispenser, as is the feeble ray of remote stars, whose fires are invisible in the radiance and the splendor of this world's luminary. It were well for man did he keep his eye uniformly and inflexibly upon the Supreme Judge and Rewarder, not permitting one plan, one action of his life, to be meditated or executed with a view to any approbation from inferior dispensers of praise. It were well for man did he "set God always before him"—did he feel as if ever in the presence of the Omnipresent—and, as if the approbation of One in heaven, were more worthy seeking after, than the applause of all upon the earth. Those whose experience enables them to testify upon this subject, unite in assuring us, that while they could and did realize the presence and the eye of Him who witnesseth our inmost thoughts, and while deeds were done, upon which no other eye than His could look, there was felt in their bosoms a loftiness or dignity of character, and a serenity and satisfaction of spirit, which no other course of conduct had ever produced.

O that the number of those were increased, who could speak to us upon the rewards which are given to those who seek the "light of God's countenance"—who could speak in the convincing tones and language which experience teacheth—who could speak from the heart to the heart. May there yet be found many such among the readers of this paper. In private, and in the domestic circle, many noble and beneficent deeds would be planned and done, which otherwise would be neglected; and as in the bosoms of those who look to the eye of God, would be the abode of a peacefulness, a dignity, a serenity unknown to those who seek the notice of the eye of man; so almost in their very countenances, could we read abundant testimony of the superiority of looking upwards rather than around. The persevering endeavor to secure the approbation of the Supreme Excellence, will eventually insure the approbation of all inferior excellences; for as Jesus said, upon another occasion, "All these shall be superadded unto you." Some one of the votaries of truth, is reported to have said, "I will follow truth, and let fame follow me if she chooses." A similar sentiment might appropriately and usefully be adopted by the disciple of Jesus: I will do whatever I think to be well-pleasing unto God, let men be pleased or praise if they choose. If not, it can detract little or nothing from the approving voice of conscience and of Heaven; if they do add their applause, it is valuable only as it confirms the voice within.

My brethren, we have all tried that course of action which is prompted by the desire of the notice and praise of men, and we have had but little happiness or satisfaction therefrom; let us now try a change of masters, a change of plan, being fully persuaded that a sincere and ardent desire to do as our Father in Heaven would have us, will make us live better, feel happier, and die with less discomposure. It may be somewhat difficult to do—thus to do habitually; but it is more than worth the trouble. A. N. S. S.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE NATIVE WOOD.

I love the shady grove, the deep forest, the entangled wild-wood! I love to hie away to sylvan scenes, and pour out my soul to the venerable woods! I love to roam over the enchanted forest, in the balmy hours of Spring—to regale my imagination with the charmed wild—to feast my soul upon their rich and holy influences. "There we may commune with the past, present and future. There we may be exempt from the gaze of men—the din of politics, and the noise of folly. There we may recall departed joys—and there we may live through the long, long past," and tranquillize the perturbed heart. Ay, there is a peculiar charm—a rapture irresisitible in the language of the trees; and there, to repose under the wide-spreading branches of some favorite one of this vegetable family, how sweet, how impressive! To listen to the sweet songsters of the grove—to drink in their melodious notes—to hear the rustling of the leaves, the whispers of the gentle zephyr, the murmuring of the rivulet, diffuses a benign calm over the isolated bosom—a tranquillity which no other scene can inspire. They breathe forth thoughts of intellectual purity and immortal blessedness. We dream of happiness and pleasure—immortality and eternal life. They fill the mind with ideas which no other situation can excite—no other place suggest. There is a magic influence in the quiet beauty and stillness of the wood. Beautifully meet for the pure prayer art thou, lovely haunt of meditation, of contemplation, of reflection!—who does not love thee, admire thee.

To him whose spirit is broken—whose prospects are blighted—whose hopes are blasted—whose friends are estranged—whose relatives alienated—whose soul is rent by calamity—shattered by misfortune—to him I would say, flee thou to the wood! There unbosom thy sorrows—and rest assured, there you will find relief! Then the events of the misty past will flit across the mind, like the scenes of a phantasmagoria—there you will behold much to adore—much to reverence—to love. And there, thou infidel, skeptic, partialist, evil, vicious, unholy, intemperate—retire. Go learn from the book of nature, in the uncultivated forest, the simple instructive lesson spread before thee. There you may converse with nature's God—there you will be inspired with delicious sensations of the goodness, justice, mercy, immutability and engaging loveliness of our heavenly Father, Protector, Benefactor and Friend! Try and see. Asa.

South Venice, N. Y., April, 1838.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 22.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., April 6th, 1833.

Sir—On my return from Pittsburg, I found today your epistle of the 21st ult. on my table, received here on the 5th inst. You begin with the cuttle-fish, the best type in nature of your present politics. When pursued by a fish of prey, this cunning little fellow hides himself in his own black ichor, and, by darkening the water, escapes the eye of his pursuer. You, however, can not so easily conceal yourself at this crisis, having solicited so much attention to your Greek erudition. The eyes of all our readers are now upon you to see how you will get out of the unenviable posture in which you were placed in my last review.

2. They saw you the mighty champion of Universalism, who had undertaken a discussion of all the Greek and Hebrew words that come within speaking distance of the future state—who had undertaken to show that neither olem nor aei, nor any word derived from them, could signify endless duration—who had undertaken to adduce some word that does necessarily import endless, which had it been employed by the Holy Spirit in reference to punishment, would certainly have made it absolutely endless: I say, they saw you by one fell swoop pull down your own edifice, the work of so many letters, affirming that aidios does mean absolute eternity; and then, to save yourself from the reprobation of all men, your own party included, when you were told that this word was another form of aei, you pretend that by some respectable critics it was derived from hades. This outrage upon language and etymology compelled me to adopt measures which I had hoped to have avoided. In order to fix the eyes of your friends more immovably upon you, I unequivocally put both your veracity and your literary pretensions on the same pillory that they might see your resources—that you might be roused to defend yourself from considerations that would stir up every man of sensibility to his best efforts. For one entire month you have stood there, an object of solicitude—all eyes gazing upon you to see how you would descend. Although I think you have as hard a face and as stout a heart as any person I have met with, still I must confess I felt some curiosity myself to see how you would escape from that proud eminence on which you were stationed. Your apparent carelessness and complaisant tameness now displayed, fully intimate your own convictions of the strength of the battlements that environ you, while your dexterity in manœuvring shows how deeply and successfully you have studied the arts of evasion.

3. Your friends now see how much confidence is due to your criticisms and assertions. You said that "there are some respectable critics who suppose it to be derived from ades (hades) which is derived from a, negative, and idien, to see; and hence among other definitions, they give hidden, invisible, unseen, unknown." These are your words, par. 2, letter xix. I asked you, letter xx, par. 12, "why you did not give the name of some lexicographer who had so derived and explained aidios." I called for chapter and verse. I also said, "I am sure, Sir, you can not name one." Thus did I put myself in your power, that every one might see what is the literary and moral worth of your arguments. Now what is your defence? Who are the lexicographers? Where are the "respectable critics"? Where the page, chapter, and verse on which they have thus derived and explained aidios? You have not given one. You have named an obscure Universalist and an atheist, and yet you have not quoted their words. Now, Sir, are these your respectable critics! I have their criticism lying before me, and I positively affirm it is not as you represent it. It is just as true as your assertion that Scarlett and Kneeland are of similar import—that neither of them derives aidios from hades!! They go no farther than to say, "it may have the same etymology as ades." They do not say it has!!! And if they did, they are no better authority than yourself. These are your respectable critics! There is not a Dictionary nor a scholar under the broad heavens that does derive AIDIOS from ADES, Mr. Skinner himself being deponent in the case! I do not wonder that you "have no disposition for a controversy about this word." And yet your veracity and literary pretensions are suspended upon it in the presence of the whole community!

4. But you now concede! (what a timous concession!) that aidios is derived in part from aei, and proceed to derive the tail of it from dios, divine!! This is a splendid demonstration of Solomon's proverb, that "the way of transgressors is hard." This is still more fatal to your literature than your asking me for a rule for quoting words in the nominative case. My rule is all the Dictionaries and Grammars in the wide world! But you have turned critic upon dios, and quote Jones' definition of dios. But, Sir, does Mr. Jones—does any critic—any Dictionary derive aidios from aei and dios, or from dios, divine? No, Sir! No learned man could do such a thing. Dios, Sir, is the root of no word in the Greek language. It is an adjective derived from Zeus, dios, Jupiter. As Jove comes from Jupiter, so dios itself comes from Zeus. A school-boy might derive dios from the obsolete DIO, which sometimes signifies to run swiftly; and hence aidios would be forever running!!! This might be in boyhood a pardonable blunder, infinitely more plausible than your derivation. Your pretending to find a root for the adjective termination of aidios, is like finding a root for orum in the word puerorum, the genitive plural of puer; or for finding a meaning for ternus in the word sempiternus, the mere adjective form of semper, always. So is ios, or causa euphoniæ dios in the word aidios. If you understand all this, you will learn that there is but one idea, one root in aidios, and that is the simple adjective form of it. But, Sir, your readers can not generally understand these and your other assertions about words. But there is one thing I intend they shall understand; and that is, that you can produce no authority for these assertions; and that they are unsound in philosophy, untaught in language, and untrue in fact: that you are positively coining at your own mint, without any license on earth, words to suit your own purpose. Have you, Sir, been so long practised in works of this kind as to cast off all fear of detection and exposure?

5. The new batch of words which you introduce to mend your position, are as ex post facto since your late intimation about going on to the fourth proposition, as they are irrelevant to the subject in debate. You might as well summon a thousand as ten such words from the Greek Dictionaries. Like the braggart who boasts of his thousands when he can not show a pistareen, you talk of ten words when you can not show one in proof of your third proposition that does not sustain the affirmative of the second. Aei indeed signifies endless whether in aioon or aidios; for whatever force it has in the one it has in the other: yet because of oon, being, in the former, (for it is a real compound,) aioon is positively more indicative of absolute eternity than aidios.

6. Your escape from the second fatal leap on "casting off forever," paragraph 14, is equally halt and blind. You prove that punishment can not be endless because God says he will not contend endlessly, or without end; showing that aei, endlessly, means without end when you please.—The wit of your 14th paragraph is disposed of by a single remark—that God is not said to cast off forever; and not to cast off forever the same persons. You assume that the objects are the same, and that the difference is in forever; but this, like all your assumptions, is one-sided; for some he will cast off forever, and others he will not cast off forever; as we shall abundantly show under your fourth proposition.

7. There are some things so exceedingly puerile in your present communication as to preclude the merit of exposition. Such are your remarks upon immortality, paragraph 5, and on implication, paragraph 6, on perpetuity, paragraph 7, and on aperantos, paragraph 8. This last word, derived from a, negative, and peras, boundary, signifies, in respect of place, without limit; and is therefore but figuratively used for duration.—Pera, peras, and peran, are used by the best Greek writers almost exclusively with regard to place. Let any one who doubts, examine Stokius on these words. Your assertions upon Greek words, you must now perceive, can have no credit with your friends or the community, and therefore you had better try things awhile, as you say you are now "desirous to rise from words to things." If you had taken my advice at the beginning, you would never have been in such a miserable plight as that in which you now stand. But the school of experience is the cheapest school that certain gentlemen can find.

8. Pardon me for omitting to notice some of the beauties of your interpretations: such as that on Jude 6, which represents the everlasting chains of darkness which confine the fallen angels, to be "the divine counsels," such as those which confine the elect angels, the choicest spirits in the universe. "Everlasting chains of darkness" and "everlasting love," are thus beautifully identified so far as the divine counsels are concerned.

9. I say, pardon me for passing by all these beauties, and for not answering such wise questions as that you ask on 2 Cor. iv: 17, about something that exceeds eternal—"a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory"—as if this Hebrew superlative, "a far more exceeding," applied to "eternal" as an epithet of an epithet: for to expose these beauties, and to answer these questions, would only be a new exposure of the same errors and blunders already noted: for let me assure you that while eternal here applies to weight, the phrase "a far more exceeding" can not syntactically apply to aionion. No person that understands the structure of the sentence could possibly ask such a question.

10. I regret the pedantic appearance which you have compelled me to assume. Our readers are all witnesses that it has been forced upon me. They can not forget that from the beginning I alleged that there was no necessity for such a logomachy; that any English scholar could decide this matter as well as the most learned. Your party, Sir, like yourself, are constantly dabbling in Greek and Hebrew, as if they were adepts in those languages, or as if they could furnish better arguments from dead languages than from a living tongue, or from the common translation. This I have now shown to be unequivocal pedantry, and that it is the want, rather than the possession, of a thorough acquaintance with those languages that impels you to this foolish course.

11. Modern Universalism is quite quadrupedantic. Its four classic legs are philology, theology, philosophy, and prophecy. The philological leg has, to say the least, been broken, and the creature limps. The theological is already severely wounded. This limb is chiefly occupied with the perfections of Deity, called benevolence and mercy. The philosophical stands upon the position, that all punishment is remedial, curative, and salutary for the subject—that it must cease from the very nature of the case—for it is of right and of necessity designed for the reformation of the transgressor. The prophetic leg moves through all that is foretold of the future destinies of mankind in the declarations, promises, and threatenings of the Bible. It is remarkable that you have "ten words" for the toes of your philological foot, and that you have also ten arguments for the theological extremity.

12. Your ten logical arguments have been reviewed, and now it becomes our duty to examine how far my exposition of them has been disposed of. This will not be a very serious affair. After your elegant allusion to the mountain in labor, and my immense distance from your "hailing" point, and my "false assumption," etc., etc., in paragraph 18 you proceed to rebuild what I then called your philosophy, or your philosophic theology.* Your defence now is—that temporal suffering, or limited punishment, differs from eternal as means differ from the end. To use your own figure, "the one is a painful journey to a happy and glorious termination—the other an interminable journey of pain and wo, never ceasing, ever increasing, without the least possible good to any being in the universe." This is all easily said, and this is your defence. The two points in this part of the debate are here unequivocally assumed. The first, that all limited punishments end in perfect holiness and happiness, because so designed; the second that eternal punishment must be without the least possible good to any being in the universe. Neither of these assumptions can be proved true by any living man, and therefore you wisely never attempt it; but after a reinforcement of five assertions, you hobble off on the a priori toes of your prophetic leg. What a shrewd and logical and sagacious opponent I have found in you, Sir, the Goliah of Universalianism! Your scheme is now fully developed. I understand it perfectly. You put the philological leg foremost, then the theological, then the philosophic and finally you stand upon the propketic. You prove your philology by your theology, and then you prove your theology by your philosophy, and then your philosophy is to be proved by your Scriptural declarations, and these are again to be proved by your philology. This is your everlasting circle. Like the fabled Sisyphus, grandfather of Ulyssus, you have to roll this immense stone up hill forever. The lad who said the heavens rested upon the earth, and the earth rested upon the back of a large tortoise, and the tortoise rested upon nothing, was certainly the beau ideal of your dialectics! Your plan being now fully developed, I can anticipate you to the end of the chapter.

13. My exposition of your ten arguments is met by the single assertion that all punishment is for the reformation of the subject of it, and that all temporal sufferings are means to the end holiness and happiness. The elements of this assumption shall be arranged and labelled in due season.—But I wish our readers to survey your defence of your ten speculative theological arguments. Your whole defence is from paragraph 18 to 22 inclusive.

14. The 18th contains your five naked assertions. Your 19th assumes that the angels rejoice in heaven on seeing God take vengeance on his enemies and those of his people, because these judgments end in their reformation; for which you have not one word to offer from Genesis to the final Amen. Your 20th justifies all the nameless and countless miseries of the unoffending brutal creation, on the ground that still they cling to life as a choice of evils! Glorious vindication of Eternal Providence! Yours is the theology of Mr. Compromise, who proposed settling his accounts with the Deity on striking a balance between his good and evil actions! Your 21st concedes that from your a priori reasonings on the divine perfections, you could not have anticipated the present mixed system, and affirms that still less could you have anticipated an eternally mixed system. You never seem to have read these words—"He that is unjust in the least is also unjust in the much," and so of every perfection of the Deity. He that causes one unnecessary pang, and he that causes a million differ not in kind, but in degrees; as he that steals a farthing, and he that steals ten thousand talents, are dishonest only in different ratios. Not having observed this principle, you think that it is all just, merciful, and benevolent to punish a defaulter for ten thousand moons or years, (for you believe in indefinite post mortem punishment)—but unjust, unmerciful, etc. to punish him forever! And to perfect your system of contradictions, you will have it, that, without any anticipation of sin, God planned a system of suffering in the brutal creation by furnishing lions, tigers, vultures, eagles, etc. etc. with instruments of torture. Read again, benevolent Sir, your paragraphs 20 and 21, and ponder upon the character which you have drawn for the Creator, as arranging a suffering creation without any justifiable cause.

15. Your last effort is an a priori preface to your lifting your fourth limb—your direct Scriptural proof. This a priori or hypothetical philosophy is generally consummate nonsense. It is peculiarly so in theological inquiries. A person would as soon make a cable of sand as prove even the being of God from a priori reasonings. From what cause could any one descend to the being, the nature, or the character of God! The very proposition, Sir, to approach the Scriptures by a priori reasonings, is begging the whole question. It is sending the Bible a begging to the school of Plato or Aristotle, or infinitely more humiliating, to the school of every sectarian scrap-Doctor.

16. Wise men, like Bacon, Newton, Locke, and all the authors of true science, reason a posteriori, not a priori, in eliciting truth, fact and law. I am a pupil in their school, and therefore look from and through nature up to its Author—you, a pupil in the school of Aristotle look from the Author down to nature. You start from hypothesis—I from fact. You begin with what ought to be—I with what is. I reason from the things that are, to those that shall be—you, from the things that ought to be (as you think,) to the things that must hereafter be. How different, then, must be our conclusions. You have put this label upon your own philosophy by your own fingers. Reconsider, Sir, your four last paragraphs.

17. Your a priori system of the universe, or your beau ideal of a godlike universe, is, that it must ultimately be without sin and sorrow. If I had drunk as deeply as you at the Castalian fount, I would have built an a priori system better than yours; for I would have had a universe in which sin and suffering had never been known. Not a leaf would have ever withered; no wasting breath would have ever blown; not a murmur nor a sigh would have ever been heard; but everlasting verdure, bloom, and beauty—unfading youth, undecaying vigor, eternal peace, serenity, and love; unspeakable joy and bliss would, without palling or satiety, have pervaded all. But you assume the best of all possible things to be a universe that after many thousand years will come to such a perfection as to reform itself and be ultimately and eternally (aei) happy.

18. I must omit your fine allusion to Burns and your pious strictures upon it, and request our readers to examine your reply to my paragraphs 19, 20 and 21, and see how handsomely you have dodged the whole matter, and evaded a discussion upon the very pith of your ten arguments. My 20th and 21st paragraphs you practically acknowledge to be unanswerable. Your failure there is complete, and shows the foundation on which you rest.

19. Your philosophy now rises full-orbed. It is that punishment cures sin - that punishment is the means and holiness the end. Christ has then died in vain; the devil is getting better; the Jews are more holy now than they were 2000 years ago; Penitentiaries, if they have punishment severe enough and long enough, can not fail to sanctify all the murderers and miscreants within their walls; for Nature's laws are universal. A few years in your post mortem purgatory will save more than the sacrifice of Christ. If the Creator then, would occasionally rain fire and brimstone on all the cities, as on Sodom and Gomorrah, instead of giving them rain from heaven and fruitful seasons—instead of filling their hearts with food and gladness, he would have acted more wisely than by showing forth his goodness and love; for, according to your reason, the wrath of God, rather than his love, leadeth men to reformation; for "all punishments are chastisements," and "all chastisements are punishments;" and all men and demons are partakers of these reforming institutions, etc. etc.

20. This single cluster from your vine I present as a pledge of what may be the vintage when your philosophy is ripe, and the time for gathering the grapes has fully arrived.

Sympathetically and controversially yours.

A. CAMPBELL.

* I now see you rely more upon a new leg purely philosophic and therefore for distinction I will henceforth regard your ten arguments before me as theological.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 4, 1838.

REMOVAL.

The Book Store and Office of the Magazine and Advocate is in No. 41 Genesee-street, (east side,) between the former stand and the Rail Road.

CHRIST OUR EXEMPLAR.

Christ is our great exemplar. The Christian must place his eye upon his Master, and endeavor to follow in his steps.

Now, although this may be an oft-repeated precept, yet, we fear it is one which is not sufficiently regarded—therefore, like all other great truths, it should be frequently presented and urged.

The worldling is not so feeble in his imitations, or at least in his endeavors to imitate, as the Christian.—There are many, probably, who set before themselves great individuals, as exemplars. They look upon and follow those who fill a large place in the survey of the past—whose names are honored, and whose deeds are recorded in the annals of nations—and who have left a long train of glory in the track which they pursued.

Here is one who would stand high in the ranks of the intellectual. He fixes upon some illustrious one, and makes him his exemplar. How closely he strives to follow him! No matter through what path he treads!—no matter what risks he runs! He imitates, perhaps, the bad as well as the good qualities of his self-chosen teacher—but still his aim is, renown and lofty honors, and these obtained, he exults, although he may be degraded and blackened by vice, and possibly by crime

Another would follow in the course of one whose name is mighty among heroes, and there is no scene of rapine from which he will shrink—no field of slaughter which will deter him in his progress. His is an unlaudable object of imitation, yet, once set up, mark how faithfully he follows it! Ay, even though blood and flame move on before him, and desolation and death follow!

And look at the slave of Mammon! He has placed before himself, an example of perseverance and success in the pursuit of wealth. Now with what zeal will he endeavor to imitate his exemplar! If it be necessary, and if he can, he will use all the methods which the other adopted. Let the orphan's tears fall in his path—let the widow's prayers echo on his ears—he will press on, regardless of all, for the shining prize lies beyond He will dig in the bowels of the earth, he will fathom the depths of the sea, for money. He will cringe and grovel, and defraud, to obtain it. His soul is enlisted in the object—his pattern used these means to gain wealth, and why should not he?—if he follows in the same track will not he be wealthy also?

These illustrations shew, that "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." They set up their objects and their examples, and act consistently in reference to them. But the Christian, whose object is the attainment of moral excellence, whose exemplar is Christ, how far, oh! how far does he fall short! Turn him from his professed pursuit, set him upon one of the tracks pursued by the worldling, and would there, think you, be no alteration in his energy and perseverance? I know that Christians are not all alike—that some strive harder and pursue closer than others—yet does not the best feel that he falls short, ay, far short?

We see how faithfully exemplars may be followed, so that not only that which is good, but that which is evil is imitated. And shall not the Christian follow closely in the path of his exemplar? Why, we should proportion our industry and our energy to the worth of the object wished for. Who has the worthiest object, the best exemplar, the Christian or the worlding? Instead, then, of being the slackest in his course, the Christian should be the most eager, the most persevering, the most forward!

They are in the pursuit of objects, many of which, at least, are frail and fleeting—the Christian's aim is "the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus"!—Their objects when attained, may yield them sorrow, and remorse, and care—his will be continually the source of happiness and peace. There is danger in every step they take, and in every effort they make, but Christ can not be followed too closely—there is no fear of deviating into wrong paths or of pursuing evil, if we tread in the way in which the meek one of Nazareth trod.—The closer we imitate him, the brighter and the brighter will be our path, "even unto the perfect day."

I do not, of course, intend to condemn intellectual pursuits or laudable endeavors after a competency.—The latter may be necessary for our temporal welfare, and certainly the former should occupy a portion of our attention. The improvement and expansion of the intellect is one of our labors in the Christian course. In my illustration of the aspirant in the mental arena, I intended to shew the closeness with which an example would be followed, when fame was the object. It was the end, or, at least, some of the means, which rendered such a course reprehensible—not the employment. The Christian may press on with ardor in the intellectual course, but the end in view will be loftier and purer than mere fame. He may press on in the intellectual course, but he may do so without ceasing to pursue the path of the Gospel.

Why will we not, then, follow our exemplar? The nearer we do so, the happier shall we be. Of all the mighty, and the good, and the laurel-crowned who have occupied stations in the world, there is none like him. "He is the chiefest among ten thousand and the one altogether lovely," and, in regard to him, we should both imitate the world and not imitate it. We should imitate it in unwavering perseverance, unremitted industry, and unshrinking zeal, in endeavoring to copy after our exemplar, and in following the path which he marked out—but we should not imitate it in doing evil that good may come, in sacrificing principle, or in swerving from duty. But the last remark is unnecessary, for if we follow Christ, we can not do that which is wrong at the same time that we obey him.

In following our Exemplar, we may have much to pass through that will try our souls. But let us follow on. At all times and in every circumstance we shall find that he has left us a lesson. In the wilderness and in the garden, in the judgment-hall and on the cross, he teaches us. He went about doing good. He healed the sick. He taught the ignorant. He wept at the grave of Lazarus. Wherever he moved, wherever he tarried, he was the same gentle, holy being.

There is our Exemplar, Christian, crowned with no bay of intellectual triumph—no conqueror's wreath—but bearing the power of an infinitely loftier victory than theirs—the evidences of a mission from God to men.

And thou who hast not taken Christ for thy Exemplar, will not these reasons move you, also? Hast thou no object of pursuit on which thine eye is fixed, and for which thy heart glows, in the journey of life? If thou hast, there is yet a higher object, and I would affectionately beseech thee to turn and follow after it. If thou hast not, thou canst have—an object, too, that is worthy of all thy thoughts, and all thy powers. Seek and pursue then, the pleasant path of the Gospel—walk in the way of life and possess happiness and peace!

Brother, whoever thou art that readest this, Christian or not, follow the example, consult the life and be guided by the precepts of Christ the Master! E. H. C.

DECLINE OF UNIVERSALISM.

A number of articles on this subject, appeared in the early part of this volume—as many as we could well find room for—and a number are yet on hand. In order that we may bid it farewell for the present as impartially as possible, I will notice a few of those yet on hand, so far as they differ in their details from those already published.

A nameless writer, who dates at Fredonia, after noticing the early remarks on the subject contained in this paper, says—

"There is certainly a coldness and indifference to the subject of religion, manifested by professing Universalists, which gives occasion to our opponents to accuse us of impiety, irreligion, infidelity, etc.; but I would leave it to any reflecting mind to say, whether hearing the faults of Partialists both in doctrine and practice, continually portrayed from the pulpit, in the most glowing colors, and frequently in such a way as to cause almost open laughter, is likely to produce that spirit which is necessary for the prosperity of the cause? Will they not rather go away satisfied with themselves, and, like the Pharisee of old, thank God that they are not like other men; that they do not believe in all the absurdities of Partialism; that they are not hypocrites; that they do not profess to be better than their neighbors? etc., etc. If, instead of encouraging such thoughts, the preacher should endeavor to excite his hearers to charity, humility, kindness, etc., and, instead of leading them to examine and pick out faults in their neighbors' characters, should persuade them with as much zeal to keep a strict guard on their own conduct, the effect would probably be to remove one of the greatest causes of "decline."

"I would not be thought censorious, but it must be acknowledged by our friends, that three-fourths of the sermons preached in Western New-York, (and probably in other parts,) are of the kind, and produce the result described above. That such preaching will never have the effect of exciting Universalists to assemble for social religious worship, to read sermons, or to become very engaged in support of the cause in any other way, must be evident to every reflecting mind. Besides, it entirely drives our opponents from our meetings, and thereby prevents them from becoming acquainted with our sentiments and belief. And they certainly can not be blamed for staying away, because no man can be expected to go very often where he hears nothing but what he calls abuse of himself.

"Br. Sanderson's suggestion of social meetings without preaching, when preaching can not be had, is certainly worthy of being acted on. But when our friends are sufficiently engaged to pursue such a course, the evil complained of, will have vanished entirely, and the "decline" will have given place to increase and prosperity, in every quarter where it is adopted.

"The time has been when Universalists were obliged to dispute, and argue, and compare doctrines, and, in many cases, use great severity to meet the overbearing, conceited, self-righteous conduct of our opposers; but we believe that time is mostly past. Our denomination has become a numerous body of Christians, not to be contemned. Let us, therefore, convince our opposers by the purity of our lives, as well as by the excellence of our faith, and the strength of our arguments, that we do not deserve the opprobrious epithets they sometimes heap upon us."

I supposed that nearly all our preachers had abandoned the regular use of the style and manner above reprobated, and were more engaged in building up than in pulling down—in applying their own principles to the various duties of life, than in picking flaws in the characters of their neighbors—in improving the cleared and cultivated soil, rather than leaving it waste to weeds and briars, by persisting in hewing a way into the forest yet before them. I still hope our brother is mistaken. But Br. Wisner, whose heart seems always alive to serious subjects and devotional feelings, writes as follows:—

"I feel that God has opened my eyes to see where the evil lies, and recollect that an old maxim says, "like priest, like people." I therefore conclude, that we ministers, as a body, are to blame. I would not say we have not showed zeal enough—Heaven forbid!—but we have not faithfully preached Christ Jesus, and him crucified. We have been preaching about Christ Jesus. Unlike the angel who led the prophet gradually into the holy waters, from ancle deep to a mighty river that no man could pass, we have taken them to the deepest part of the river first, and plunged them in headlong.

"It is evident to my mind, that the Gospel plan of salvation, and the means to bring about that purpose, are beautifully represented in the 27th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. The angel appeared to Paul, saying, "Fear not, Paul, thou must be brought before Cesar, and lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee."—Verse 24. The angel could not have communicated this as a fact, if it had not been immutably fixed in the counsels of Heaven, and the end held fast in that munificent hand which holds the destiny of all mankind. Yet notwithstanding all this, when the perilous moment arrived, and the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship, Paul cried out, "Except these abide in the ship, ye can not be saved."—Verse 31. Here we observe a temporal salvation made fast in the beginning, yet effected by their agency, and therefore presented to them as conditional. Now I feel, Br., as though God would never bless our denomination, until we ministers present salvation to a perishing world, on the conditions of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and repentance towards God. I am satisfied that we preach faith enough, and write enough about it, but we insist very little on its being made practical in the heart and life, by being connected with repentance. The world suffers in consequence of it—ministers suffer—Editors suffer—yes, it is too true, that men have taken the Magazine until they owe some ten or fifteen dollars for it—have read it attentively—and now, unless they are compelled by law, they will never pay for it! They can talk doctrine as fast as the serpent could talk with mother Eve; but do they practice it? No—they have never found repentance—they have heard enough about faith to save a world; but they have never felt it, or they would repent enough to save themselves from sin."

What follows, is mainly connected with a reference to the then approaching Conference at Pavilion, with an apology for inability to attend it. Br. Wisner is undoubtedly correct in enforcing the importance of connecting faith and repentance, or reformation. Every point of belief held by Universalists, generally, is eminently practical—can be reduced to practice—and when preached, should most faithfully be applied to the circumstances, events, and duties of the hearer, who should be earnestly urged not only to believe it, but to act it—to feel it—to feed on it in a spiritual sense—to live it. That even many of our preachers and editors have been remiss in this important duty, I can not admit—much less that, as a body, they have neglected it. That some may have neglected it—and that the rest have not been as earnest in it as they might have been, may be admitted—is probably true.

A correspondent in Chenango county, after admitting that in some places there is a decline of the good cause—and that in other places there is not near as much doing as should be done, remarks as follows:—

"What are the true reasons of this decline—this falling away? Is it in consequence of the preachers being slack in the discharge of their ministerial duties? I think this can not be charged to them. They have spared no pains on their part, in endeavoring to promote the cause of truth in the world. They have endured many privations—many of them have left their homes, and travelled thousands of miles, facing the pelting of the storms, and many other inconveniences, for the purpose of diffusing the light of the Gospel over our dark and benighted land—and hundreds have rejoiced in being led from darkness to light, and from the power of satan unto God. Many of the Universalist preachers are in a state of poverty, in consequence of devoting their time to the ministry, and some of them have advanced hundreds of dollars from their own pockets, to defray travelling expences, besides devoting their time for the benefit of their fellow-beings, for which they have received no adequate compensation, and probably never will. Some of our preachers are so pressed by the want of wherewith to sustain themselves and families, that they feel under the necessity of leaving the ministry and turning their attention to some occupation whereby they can obtain the comforts of life for themselves and families. This is truly a deplorable state of things.

"Brethren and sisters, do we feel that we have been as faithful in the support of our cause, as our ministering brethren have? I fear that our consciences will say to us that we have not done our duty in sustaining and strengthening their hands, while they spread the glad tidings of a world's salvation. And while we are thus neglecting to put forth the helping hand, can we expect that Heaven will smile upon us—can we hope that our cause will prosper, and that our children will be blest with that divine and soul-cheering faith, if we remain inactive and idle? We have reason to fear, that they will not enjoy such a blessing; but that moral darkness, ignorance and superstition will be their portion in this life.

[Here follows a reference to protracted meetings every where in operation, and the lamentable effects resulting from them.]

"Brethren and sisters, can we sit still with all these facts before us, can we look on and feel at ease, and make no effort to sustain the cause of liberal Christianity; or shall we grasp the world with an iron fist, and make that our God! The light of the Gospel can not be spread abroad without the use of means. There must be preachers, and they must be sustained, and it is our indispensable duty to contribute liberally for their support, and to aid them in the great work of reformation, by the organizing of societies, and by regular attendance at our meetings; by encouraging our children to attend, and likewise our neighbors. And we should be particularly careful to walk according to the precepts of the Gospel; and if we find any amongst us, that do not walk agreeably to those precepts, who profess to be Universalists, we should go to them in the spirit of Christ, and labor with them, and endeavor to persuade them to become virtuous and walk like Christians; and if they refuse, say to them, we can not fellowship you as Universalists. In this way the waste places of our Zion would soon be built up—Heaven would smile upon us, the wilderness would rejoice and blossom as the rose, the Sun of Righteousness would rise upon us with healing in his beams, and joy, peace and consolation rest upon us and our children, and upon the rising generation, forever."

Lastly, I give the following from Br. Chase, whose opportunities for observation are superior to my own, in this section of the State, and who, it will be seen, expressly excludes the section in which he resides, from all censure. I would I could say that the region round about Utica, did not merit any censure for a decline of zeal in the good cause! But I can not say so, when there are so many dead, and languishing, and idle societies around us. Br. Chase says—

"Br. Grosh—Some statements have appeared in the Magazine and Advocate, relative to the decline of Universalism in Western New-York, which, though perhaps true in relation to some portions of the territory specified, are calculated to convey erroneous impressions in regard to the whole. I would, therefore, with due respect to my beloved brethren who have made the statements referred to, beg leave to state, that the cause of Universalism in that part of Western New-York east of the Genesee river, and west of Cayuga bridge, was never in a more flourishing condition. This is emphatically the case with the towns of Manchester, Newark, Victor, Bristol, East and North Bloomfield, Lakeville, Springwater, Conesus, Penfield, and several other towns and villages that I might mention.

"I make this statement partly to correct false impressions that have grown out of the statements referred to above, and partly to relieve the feelings of some of our good and zealous friends, who have manifested a wish to be exonerated from the charge of apathy and indifference in relation to so glorious a cause. It is presumable that our brethren who have made the statements to which I have alluded, intended that they should apply only to that portion of Western New-York west of the Genesee river. Indeed, one of these brethren has informed me that this was the case."

In conclusion, for probably more than enough has been said on this subject for the present, it appears that there is an apathy among our friends in some sections—a want of zeal and united energy—that the causes of this lack are various, in the opinions of our friends, some asserting that our preachers are not sufficiently practical and feeling in their discourses, and others, that the laity do not sufficiently appreciate the labors of their preachers and the importance of religious feeling and knowledge. Let each one see what and how much of fault or remissness exists in himself, and proceed to atone for it immediately, then aid his neighbor and preacher to do the same. Let frankness, friendship, union, and perseverance be the motto of us all—"a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether," will be the effect, and every hindrance to our religious prosperity must be levelled to, and buried in the dust forever.

A. B. G.

MUTUAL INTELLIGENCE.

I am persuaded that, by the aid of a third person to whom information should be imparted, many societies who want preaching a part of the time, might have their wishes gratified; and many preachers who wish for new locations, or employment for a portion of their time, might also be accommodated. I have made several efforts to establish some plan or system, by which the wants of both parties might be supplied, but, from some cause or other, have not succeeded to any extent. I now know several preachers who wish occasional appointments in this vicinity, or employment for the whole or a part of the time, each, in various sections—and in a few cases I have received vague and indefinite information of societies that wish for more preaching than they now enjoy—or who desire to obtain a preacher.—If preachers will give me definite information of their wishes in every particular necessary for the information of any society that might wish to procure their services—or if any society will inform me of their situation, when they want preaching, for what portion of the time and the support they are prepared to give a preacher, I think it very probable that I can use the information thus given to the advantage of both parties. At least I will try to do it. But, as any one can readily perceive, I can do nothing to any purpose unless both parties give me such information, and unless each particular of that information is as full and explicit as circumstances will admit.

A. B. G.

CONVENTION AND ASSOCIATION MEETINGS.

In addition to the notices to be found in the place devoted to religious notices, I have thought that some of our readers in other States, might be benefited by the following list of notices of the times and places of meeting of Associations and Conventions not noticed there.

May.—The Pennsylvania Convention is to meet at Easton, Northampton county, May 15th and 16th. The Union Association, same State, not known. Southern Association of Connecticut, New-Haven, May 24th and 25th. Hartford county Association, same State, place unknown, May 9th and 10th. Union Association, Massachusetts, in Warren, May 30th. Merrimac River Association, N. H., in Hopkinton, May 30th and 31st.

June.—Massachusetts Convention meets in Salem, on the 6th. New-Hampshire Convention, place unknown, on the 20th and 21st. Maine Convention, Sangerville, 27th and 28th. The Windham Association, Vt, first Wednesday and Thursday. Northern Association, Vt., second Wednesday and Thursday. Champlain Association, Vt., fourth Wednesday and Thursday. Places unknown, when not named. A. B. G.

TRANSFER OF THE PRINTING OFFICE.

I have this day sold the printing materials with which this paper is printed, to my brother, C. C. P. Grosh, for several years the foreman in that department. Consequently, the work entrusted to his care will be done as well and as faithfully as heretofore—only that it will be confided directly to him, instead of to me. May I ask for him, from my brethren who desire to publish books or pamphlets, their patronage? I can say with confidence that every pains will be taken to print their labors on reasonable terms, and in a neat and correct manner.

A. B. Grosh.

Utica, May 1, 1838.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. T. J. Smith at Knoxville—Br. C. B. Brown at Onondaga South Hollow—Br. Sias at Tug Hill at half past 10, A. M., and near Br. Dingman's, on the West road at 5 P. M.—Br. Goodrich at Fayetteville, (Guilford,) at 5 P. M.—Br. W. H. Griswold at New-Ohio—Br. Britton at Denmark—Br. French at Brownville.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. Brown at Mexico, and at the school-house near Br. A. J. Dauby's at 5 P. M.—Br. W. H. Griswold at Smithville Flats.

Br. Sias will preach on the evenings of May 14th, at Felt's Mills—15th, in Black River village—16th, at Great Bend—17th, on Martin St. as Br. Clark may appoint—18th, in Rodman, at Truman's Corners.

The New-York State Convention of Universalists will meet in Oxford village, Chenango county, on the last Wednesday and following Thursday (30th and 31st) of May, inst. Delegates who can not attend, are requested to be careful to select substitutes who will. The following is a list of lay and clerical delegates from the several Associations.

Associations.	Lay Delegates.	Clerical Delegates.
Allegany,	J. D. Shuart, L. Vinton,	J. Babcock, P. P. Fowler.
Black River,	Isaac Mendall, Bezaleel Thayer,	P. Morse, J. H. Whelpley.
Cayuga,	Hon. W. Berry, Warden Babcock,	G. W. Montgomery, H. Boughton.
Central,	Charles Smith, Billy Titus,	A. B. Grosh, T. J. Smith.
Chautauque,	L. Harrington, J. I. Eacker,	L. Paine, T. C. Eaton.
Chenango,	E. G. Per Lee, E. W. Corbin,	A. G. Clark, E. E. Guild.
Hudson River,	B. A. Tillinghast, Dr. J. Braman,	T. J. Whitcomb, L. C. Browne.
Mohawk River,	T. Biddlecom, Sanford Coe,	J. A. Aspinwall, W. H. Waggoner.
New-York,	H. H. Brown, P. Price,	T. J. Sawyer, S. J. Hillyer.
Niagara,	Charles Lee, Z. Murdock,	L. Knapp, W. Andrews.
Ontario,	Ebenezer Cook, H. W. Dobbin,	O. Ackley, K. Townsend.
Otsego,	Cyrenus Clark, D. S. Hull,	O. Whiston, M. B. Smith.
St. Lawrence,	L. Buck, J. H. Hazleton,	F. Langworthy, O. Wilcox.
Steuben,	Dr. A. Baker, James Alley.	M. L. Wisner, A. Upson.

Occasional Sermon by Br. G. W. Montgomery.

Associations.—The Central Association will meet in Lebanon, Madison county, on the first Wednesday and Thursday (6th and 7th) of June.

The Niagara Association will meet in Lewiston, on the same days.

The Mohawk Association will meet in Eatonville, Herkimer county, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (13 and 14th) of June.

The Black River Association will meet in Ellis village, (Ellisburg,) Jefferson county, on the third Wednesday and Thursday (20th and 21st) of June.

P. Morse, Standing Clerk.

The Genesee Association will meet in Morganville, Genesee county, on the same days.

The Otsego Association will meet in Cedarville, Herkimer county, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday (27th and 28th) of June.

The St. Lawrence Association will meet in Malone, Franklin county, on the same days.

The Allegany Association will meet in Centreville, Allegany county, on the same days.

Each society belonging to any of the above Associations is earnestly requested to choose its delegates in proper season—to have their statistical letters made out—and to see that they are duly and properly represented in the Council to which each is attached.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

J W, Watertown, for C W—T B, Canastota, for J C, J W P, C S and S O—S E, Mt. Gilead, (O) for self, C R, J McL, W P and B McM—R P, Canajoharie, for A S, C S and S G—A T, Southville, for self and W D—P M, Johnson's Creek, for D W—P M, East Claridon, for M McI—W G E, Circleville, (O) for self, J C H, J S and J R H—S W, Lexington, (O) for N H and J C—P M, Sullivan, for C M A—P M, Madison, (O) for self, A T, A S and H C—J P, New Mexico, (W T).

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

WHERE ARE THEY?

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

"Where are they? where are they?" The charmer's sweet notes,
From the bowers of Parnassus in melody float,
While the diamonds of genius on her queenly brow set,
Outshine the bright gems in night's blue coronet.

"Where are they, whose touch woke the sweet sounding lyres,
That raised in our bosoms devotion's soft fires?"
With the light wing of zephyr those accents float on,
And murmuring echo repeats the sad moan.

Oh! many a heart in affliction's dark dell,
Hath leaped and rejoiced at the lyre's plaintive swell;
When the songs of salvation, and faith's cheering words,
Were skilfully, breath'd to the harp's thrilling chords.

Sweet songsters, awaken those rich sounds again,
Let the harp on the willow no longer remain;
Let the song of the seraph in triumph be heard,
And the lone heart of sorrow with rapture be stirred.

Come again to the wild-woven amaranth bowers
Wreathe a chaplet once more from those ne'er fading flowers,
That bloom on the banks of the river of love,
Whose waters make glad the bright city above.

HISTORY.

In reading histories, which is every body's subject, I use to consider what kind of men are the authors; which, if persons that profess nothing but mere learning, I in and from them principally observe and learn the style and language; if physicians, I upon that account the rather incline to credit what they report of the temperature of the air, of the health and complexion of princes, of wounds and diseases; if lawyers we are from them to take notice of the controversies of right and title, the establishment of laws and civil government, and the like; if divines, the affairs of the church, ecclesiastical censures, marriages, and dispensations; if courtiers, manners and ceremonies; if soldiers, the things that properly belong to their trade, and principally the accounts of such actions and enterprises, wherein they were personally engaged; and if ambassadors, care are to observe their negociations, intelligence and practices, and the manner how they are to be carried on.—Montaigue.

OLD AUTHORS.

I am not so infatuated an antiquarian, nor so poor a philanthropist, as to seek to retard the expansion of the human mind. But I lament the eternal oblivion into which our old authors, those giants of literature, are permitted to sink, while the world stands open-eyed and open-mouthed to catch every modern, tinselled abortion as it falls from the press. In the polite circles of America, for instance, perhaps there is no want of taste, and even zeal, for letters. I have seen several gentlemen who appear to have an accurate, a minute acquaintance with the whole range of literature, in its present state of improvement: yet, you will be surprised to hear, that I have not met with more than one or two persons in this country, who have ever read the works of Bacon or of Boyle. They delight to saunter in the upper story, sustained and adorned, as it is, with the delicate proportions, the foliage and flourishes of the Corinthian order; but they disdain to make any acquaintance, or hold communion at all, with the Tuscan and Doric plainness and strength which base and support the whole edifice.

As to lord Verulam, when he is considered as the father of experimental philosophy; as the champion, whose vigor battered down the idolized chimeras of Aristotle, together with all the appendant and immeasurable webs of the brain, woven and hung upon them, by the ingenious dreamers of the schools; as the hero who not only rescued and redeemed the world from all this darkness, jargon, perplexity and error; but, from the stores of his own great mind, poured a flood of light upon the earth, straightened the devious paths of science, and planned the whole paradise, which we now find so full of fragrance, beauty and grandeur; when he is considered, I say, in these points of view, I am astonished that literary gentlemen do not court his acquaintance, if not through reverence, at least through curiosity. The person who does so will find every period filled with pure and solid golden bullion: that bullion, which several much admired posterior writers have merely moulded into various forms, or beaten into leaf, and taught to spread its floating splendors to the sun.

This insatiate palate for novelty which I have mentioned, has had a very striking effect on the style of modern productions. The plain language of easy conversation will no longer do. The writer who contends for fame, or even for truth, is obliged to consult the reigning taste of the day. Hence too often, in opposition to his own judgment, he is led to encumber his ideas with a gorgeous load of ornaments; and when he would present to the public a body of pure, substantial and useful thought, he finds himself constrained to encrust and bury its utility within a dazzling case; to convert a feast of reason into a concert of sounds: a rich intellectual boon into a mere bouquet of variegated pinks and blushing roses. In his turn he contributes to establish and spread wider the perversion of the public taste; and thus, on a principle resembling that of action and reaction, the author and the public reciprocate the injury; just as, in the licentious reign of our Charles the 2d, the dramatist and his audience were wont to poison each other.—Wirt.

MARRIAGES.

In Lysander, Onondaga county, April 15th, by Rev. A. Peck, Mr. DARIUS MILES, of Greenfield, Mass., to Miss ELIZA M. CHASE, daughter of Stephen Chase, of the former place.

DEATHS.

At Orville, on the 16th of March, of an inflammation on the lungs, Mrs. ANNA, consort of G. Miller. Mrs. M. was a firm believer in the final salvation of all intelligences, as a doctrine that not only brings peace in prosperity; but being an incentive to virtue it would give support in the hour of death. Her funeral was attended on the 18th, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the family and friends who had convened to pay the last tribute of respect to departed worth, by Rev. Mr. Atwood, Methodist. D. B.

In Sheridan, March 11th, RUFUS ELDRED, aged 65 years. In the death of this good man, community has been deprived of a most valuable citizen, the Universalist society of one of its best members, and his aged companion and dutiful children, of a most affectionate husband and father. In short, all who knew Br. Eldred, esteemed him.

In 1805 or 6, Br. Eldred renounced the doctrine of endless misery, and embraced that of a world's salvation through Jesus Christ, under the ministerial labors of Br. Stacy in Hamilton and vicinity. Five or six years ago, he removed to this county, and, as before, devoted his talents and a consistent portion of his means to the support of the truth. For the last four months he was able to speak only in a whisper, and the disease terminated in a quick consumption. He bore all with calmness, and was perfectly resigned to the providence of God which called him from the fond embrace of his family. Oh, may we live the life, as well as die the death of the righteous!

The funeral on the 13th, at the Methodist meeting-house, was attended by a large concourse of people, including four Partialist clergymen, who mingled their sympathies with the afflicted, and paid the last tribute of respect to the deceased. Sermon by Br. S. Adams, of Carroll. T. C. E.

In Hanover, Chautauque county, March 13th, Mr. STEPHEN WILLIAMS, aged 57 years, leaving a wife and numerous children to mourn his departure. He was a worthy and exemplary member of society, and loved the doctrine of life and immortality, but sometimes doubted the truth of revelation. Several weeks before his death, the subject of religion occupied his thoughts more than usual, and about three weeks before his departure, a great change came over his mind and feelings. His doubts and fears were all removed—a holy confidence filled their place—he declared his full and firm conviction in the resurrection of all mankind, and the reconciliation of the whole world to God, through the Redeemer. Funeral on the 14th—sermon by Br. Adams. T. C. E.

In Salina, April 9th, Mr. JAMES J. RICE, aged 46 years. Society has experienced a great loss in his death—he was beloved by all who knew him. His faith in the Restitution cheered him in health, and enabled him to bear the pains of sickness with Christian fortitude. As his death drew near, he conversed on the subject with composure, and died consoled by his faith in the salvation of the world.

He has left a wife and seven children who feel the loss of a kind husband and father, but who mourn not as those without hope. May their outward loss be made up by inward good; and may his relatives and numerous friends be consoled by the hope of the Gospel. S. B.

In Central Square, April 16th, Mr. EZRA BAKER, in the 72d year of his age. He was a resident of Verona, and for many years a faithful mail carrier between Utica and Fulton, Oswego county. He died in the firm belief of a world's salvation, leaving a large circle of friends to rejoice in the integrity of his character while they deplore their loss. Funeral on the 18th, sermon by Br. C. B. Brown. N. W.

In New-Hartford, April 18th, Mrs. RACHEL STONE, widow of Col. William Stone, deceased, aged 80 years. This aged mother in Israel was formerly of Litchfield, Conn, but for about half her life time has resided in New-Hartford. She died in the house of an adopted daughter, at peace with God and all mankind, and rejoicing in the hope of a blessed immortality for herself and all our race, through the grace of God. The funeral was attended on the following Friday—sermon by A. B. G.

In Hastings, April 16th, MARY ELIZABETH, eldest daughter of Peter and Rhoda Ann Devendorf, aged five years and one day. To the parents we would say,

"Weep not, though thus she hath fled,
In the blossom of beauty and prime;
The flower's transplanted—not dead—
The sunshine of heaven is her clime."

Funeral on the 17th, sermon by C. B. BROWN.

PROSPECTUS,

FOR PUBLISHING

An Examination of Taylor's Diegesis,

BY SAMUEL C. LOVELAND, A. M.

In offering proposals to the public for publishing this Examination of Taylor's Diegesis, it may be proper to state, that the object of this work is to defend Christianity from the attacks that are made against it, from the most accredited sources of infidelity. The Diegesis of Robert Taylor is the modern oracle of the unbeliever. It is his last and best fortification, if his own boastings may be received as a criterion, by which we may judge of its importance. It is therefore on account of the estimation in which this book is held by its friends, that we are disposed to hold it forth to the public, as we believe, in its true light. This is faithfully done in the Examination, we now propose to publish. Christians ought not to be ignorant of the proper grounds of their faith; nor have they reason to believe that they have anything to fear from infidelity, except from the advantages which it takes of their want of information, and by the flattery it offers to the unwary, of making them philosophers. This Examination adheres strictly to its assigned object. It exposes the sophistry of Robert Taylor in a plain and lucid manner, in a way calculated to enlighten the reader on a subject in which, he should, most certainly, be informed. It may be read by believers of one denomination as well as another, with equal pleasure and profit. Its object being to support the authenticity of divine revelation against the attacks of the infidel writer, the author has made a common cause of the Christian faith, without any design of turning his arguments to the advantage of one believer to the detriment of another. From this consideration, as likewise from the interest of the subject, we trust and humbly hope, we shall receive the patronage of the Christian public in general. Our feelings may be sanguine; yet, we can not but think that no one who renders us support will find occasion to regret it.

The Examination will be published as soon as sufficient patronage is extended to warrant the expense.—It will contain no less than 275 pages, 12mo., neatly bound and lettered. It will be afforded to subscribers at 75 cents.

J. B. MORSE, Publisher.

Montpelier, March 28, 1838.

Subscription received at this office, and those who wish to become patrons of the above work will send in their names as soon as convenient. G. and H.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MAY 11, 1838. NUMBER 19.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A VOICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

CHAPTER XII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

MARRIAGE.

While it may not, perhaps, be necessary to urge young ladies to reflect upon the subject of marriage, yet it is all-important that they should be counselled to reflect aright in regard to it.—Marriage is one of the most important events in the life of woman. It effects a total revolution in her circumstances. It introduces her into a new field of existence—to new scenes, duties, trials and responsibilities. Her peace, happiness, and prosperity, throughout the remaining portion of her earthly existence, depend mainly upon the circumstances under which she enters into this union. To young ladies, then, marriage should be a subject of deep, solemn, mature deliberation. It should be divested of all romantic imaginations, and be viewed as an event of a character so momentous, as to give shape to their destiny—a change which is to decide whether theirs is to be happiness or sorrow, peace or wretchedness, through life.

With these self-evident remarks in view, it would seem quite unnecessary to caution young ladies against entering rashly and without sufficient premeditation into the married state. And yet how many rush blindfolded, as it were, into this connexion for life! How many, under the influence of some romantic, evanescent attachment, arising from frivolous circumstances, or the most empty and fleeting attractions, confide their happiness to the keeping of those every way unworthy of a trust so important, and who are utterly incapable of sincere love, or generous sentiment! A long life of contention, of bitterness, may be, of poverty and want, and degradation, too late convinces them of their early folly. I repeat, therefore, that an event of so much importance, and upon which depend so many serious and long continued consequences, should be a matter of the most serious and prayerful reflection to young ladies. And the necessity of precautionary meditation is strengthened in the reflection, that a mis-step in this event, is irreparable. When once the union has been formed, no awakening from a dreaming delusion, no discovery of mistaken views, or unconfirmed anticipations, or unrequited affection, no regret, or sorrow, or despondency, can dissolve its ties and restore the deceived one to her former condition. A life deeply clouded with wretchedness, is the unavoidable forfeiture of her rashness.

My first precaution to young ladies, in regard to matrimony, is not to enter upon it too young. Thousands of females are brought to a premature grave by neglect upon this point. Marriage should never be consummated until the body has obtained full growth and maturity—which in females, is seldom before the age of twenty or twenty-two. A violation of this rule, induces a long train of evils,* as all can perceive who will make the slightest observation in community. Another objection, in addition to destruction of health, is, that females must arrive at years of reflection and discretion, before they can possess that maturity of judgment, so essential to the efficient discharge of the responsible duties, which devolve upon the head of a family. I have endeavored to show in a previous chapter, the evils which flow from this lack of knowledge and judgment, to the lady herself, and those connected with her.

* See Combe's Moral Philosophy, Lecture V.

Beware of early and hasty entanglements. Many young ladies entertain the opinion that it is very romantic to fall in love at first sight. However appropriate and delightful this may be in a lackadaisical novel, believe me, it is an unwise and very silly practice in real life, and calls in question very decidedly, the good sense of her who is guilty of it. The affections have little or no power of penetration and research of their own. They view things upon the surface, and when uncontrolled, are captivated by what appears pleasing, without any regard to intrinsic worth, or real merit. Hence, as appearances are exceedingly deceitful, if the affections are without guide, they are as liable to be centered upon a worthless object, if it has but a fair exterior, as upon one of value. Consequently, this falling in love at first sight, is extremely dangerous, and should be especially guarded against by young ladies. Our Creator has placed the affections under the control of the intellectual powers—the reason—the judgment—and they should be permitted to decide as to the worth and excellency of every object, before the affections are allowed to settle upon it. In pursuing this course the result seldom fails of being auspicious. Young ladies should be exceedingly cautious to keep their affections under their own control, and never allow them to concentrate upon an individual, until they are perfectly satisfied that he is worthy of the riches of their love.

In connection with this precaution, is another of equal importance. Never engage in a hasty marriage. Many instances have transpired within my own observation, and undoubtedly, within the observation of the reader, where parties have married after an acquaintance of but a few days or weeks! It is needless to dwell upon the extreme danger of this practice—especially to the lady. What a consummation of imprudence and folly, to connect yourself for life, with one who is virtually a stranger—of whose character, principles and habits you have no safe ground to judge correctly! This is, indeed, making marriage "a lottery." If you imitate this example, the chances are a thousand to one, that you will draw a blank!—yea, much worse than a blank, an unworthy and unprincipled companion! Beware, then, of a hasty marriage, as you value your happiness. For, although, in this manner, you may possibly secure an eligible connexion, yet the chances of a contrary result are so numerous, that prudence and safety will not warrant the hazard.

Equal caution is necessary against entering into premature and rash engagements. They often lead to great evils. Before you pledge your "troth," you should know perfectly, the character of your suitor, and his prospects in life. And it is, also, highly necessary, before you make any engagement, to consult your parents or guardian, and even some intimate friend, in relation to its propriety. Conceal from them nothing on this point. If even after you are engaged, you discover in him who pays his addresses to you, any new trait of character, hitherto unseen, which you have good reason to believe would be a bar to your happiness were you united with him, break off the engagement immediately, and at all hazards. Your future peace and prosperity demand it—and justice, honor and religion will sanction your decision!

"Abhor the very idea of clandestine connexions as a violation of every duty you owe to God and man. There is nothing heroic in a secret correspondence. The silliest girls and weakest men can maintain it, and have been most frequently engaged in it. Spurn the individual who would come between you and your natural guardians. Hearken to the opinions of your parents, with all that deference which is due to them. Rare are the cases in which you should act in opposition to their wishes."

Never marry a fop. By a fop, I mean a man whose whole attention and mind are entirely engrossed by dress and exterior embellishments—he who views the hue or set of a garment as of greater importance than industry and economy, than honesty of intentions, purity of heart, and the cultivation of the mind! Such an individual may possess comely features, may make a fine appearance, and display gentility in manners, yet he is swayed by no truly valuable characteristic—by none of that worthiness which is so essential to matrimonial happiness. He can not appreciate the real excellences of the female heart, and is incapable of cherishing pure and genuine affection. To unite your destiny with such a man, would be placing your happiness upon a sandy foundation.

Do not marry an indolent man. To become the wife of an individual of this character, would be to subject yourself, in all human probability, to poverty and all its accompanying evils. If he possesses no property at the commencement of matrimonial life, you may be assured there is little probability of his thriving afterwards. The young man who, under ordinary circumstances, has not sufficient industry and energy to acquire some property before marriage, will not be likely to do so with the cares and expences of a family upon him. Even if he has some possessions, there is no certainty that he will long retain them. He who is too indolent to acquire property, will be too negligent to retain, for any great length of time, that which he may already possess.

Be equally cautious not to marry a spendthrift. The same, or worse consequences will follow this indiscretion, as in the instance last referred to. The spendthrift may be industrious—people of this character often are—but of what avail is his industry, if he squanders the fruit of his exertions in some frivolous and useless manner, as fast as it accumulates? He may be wealthy; but the riches of such a man are as the early dew before the rays of the sun—they will speedily vanish away, and leave poverty and wretchedness behind—the more keenly felt, because of former prosperity. And, besides, the spendthrift, in his extravagance, is liable to, and usually does, acquire vicious habits, which accelerate the ruin and seal the misery of himself and his family. You can ascertain without difficulty, the character of a young man, in this respect. If he expends all his income in vain amusements, while he is single, you may be quite certain he will continue a course as bad, or even worse, after entering the marriage state. "I have in my eye at this moment, an accomplished female, (and it were easy to adduce a thousand similar cases,) who married a man of vast wealth, but of prodigal habits; and years have passed away since that immense fortune has gone to the winds; and the last remains of it were squandered amidst the tears, and in spite of the tender and earnest expostulations of a suffering family. And now, if I should look for that once rejoicing and apparently fortunate bride, I should go to an obscure cabin of wretchedness, and should find her laboring with her own hands, to provide bread for her more than orphan children, and she would tell me a tale of wo, which, however familiar to me, would make me sit down and weep. This same man, who has plunged her and her little ones into so much wretchedness, possesses many naturally amiable qualities, and is gifted with enviable powers of mind, but, unhappily, in early life, he became a spendthrift; and on this rock the fortunes of himself and of his family were wrecked. If you should ever give yourself to a man of similar character, you need not be disappointed if you should experience a similar destiny."*

Never marry an intemperate man. This is a precaution that young ladies can not be too careful to observe. How many, by neglecting this admonition, have been plunged into the deepest misery! Of all the evils that afflict the marriage state, intemperance stands in the front rank. It transforms the kind and loving husband into a savage brute—the tender and affectionate father into an unfeeling tyrant. Oh! how much evil, how much dark, cruel wretchedness, has been carried into the happiest family circles, by intemperance! It has cast the mildew of despair upon the fairest, brightest hopes of life! It has caused shivering poverty to creep in, with its rags, its hunger, and want, where formerly all was plenty, comfort, and peace. What must be the wretchedness of that family where the cheek of the wife pales with dread, and the children flee from the house, or cling tremblingly to the mother for protection, when the inebriated husband and father reels toward his miserable home! In the phrenzy of intoxication, he beats his defenceless and heart-broken wife, tramples upon his innocent offspring, and demolishes whatever is valuable within his reach, unmindful alike of tears, and entreaties, and supplications. If there is any thing that can approach the character of the fabled demon, it is man in the wild paroxysms of drunkenness!

Young woman, I beg you, listen to me! As you value your peace and happiness—as you value respectability and good standing in community—form a firm, uneffaceable determination, in the deep recesses of your soul, never, NEVER to become the companion of a man given to intemperance! Yea, I beseech you to go still farther, and firmly resolve not to marry a man who is accustomed, habitually, to drink intoxicating liquors as a beverage, of whatever character, or however temperately or discreetly! The great danger is, you have no assurance, and can have none, that he who drinks moderately now, will not hereafter become involved in the deepest abyss of intemperance. He is travelling the very way, and the only way, that leads to it—the way which all intemperate men pursued in their downward career. In what possible manner (except by total abstinence) can you become satisfied that he will not, ere long, be one among their wretched number! You should not accept, nor give any countenance to the addresses of a "drinking" young man. Even after you have become "engaged," if you ascertain that your intended companion is given to habits of intemperance, you would be justified by every equitable law, human and divine, in immediately dissolving the engagement. But I can not enlarge upon this important topic. Young ladies of good sense, must perceive that their safety and happiness demand that they should avoid all connexion with men of intemperate habits. Better, infinitely better, remain in "single blessedness" all your days, than to place yourself in a condition to be made wretched by a drunken husband!

I think it not improper or unnecessary, that young ladies should take into consideration the health of those who would become united to them. I know of no good reason why a young woman should be connected with a man who, from constitutional causes, is, or probably soon will be, incapacitated to superintend a family. You should endeavor to exercise proper precaution upon this point. It is true, all are liable to disease, and its unhappy consequences; and all I would caution you respecting this subject, is to act prudently in regard to placing your affections upon an individual who is laboring under a constitutional and incurable disease, which would probably be transmitted to his offspring.*

In selecting a husband, you should not be too fastidious in regard to his personal beauty, his occupation, or the amount of his property. These are unimportant circumstances, provided all other qualifications abound. He may be plain in person, yet beautiful in moral and mental accomplishments. He may be poor in property, yet rich in affection, kindness, and all those social qualifications that minister so highly to domestic happiness—and as to the want of property, it is an evil that can, in general, soon be removed by industry and economy. His occupation may be of a common order, but if it is proper and useful, it will not lessen your respect in the eyes of the enlightened and discreet.

While there are many qualifications that would be pleasing in a husband, there are some indispensably requisite. He should be engaged in some laudable occupation or profession—he should be industrious, economical, honest—of good habits, of a kind and benevolent disposition, strictly moral and temperate, and should possess an unwavering belief in the doctrines and precepts of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. He who is destitute of any of these qualifications, you should avoid. But with a young man who possesses these characteristics, you may rationally anticipate a happy union, and a life of as much enjoyment as is usually allotted to mortals in this mutable world.

This "Voice" to the young, now ceases. If its tones have, in any degree, enlightened the minds of my readers, infused a virtuous influence into their hearts, or opened their eyes to dangers that surround them, the object for which it has been sounded, is accomplished.

*Daughter's Own Book.

*See Combe's Constitution of Man.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, MAY 13, 1838.

MATTHEW XXII: 15-22.

In some of the parables recorded in what immediately precedes this paragraph, the Pharisees felt, we doubt not, that their conduct was the object of blame. They felt self-condemned. This lashed into fury that hostility of feeling which animated the bosom of this sect against the meek and lowly Jesus. Throughout his whole life was Jesus subjected to espionage, to cavilling, to insult, to plots, by this arrogant and hypocritical sect. Their hostility knew no limits. Whenever he was in Jerusalem or in the neighborhood of any of them in Judea, he was surrounded with them, chiefly or solely for the purpose of watching him. They were, perhaps, his most attentive auditors, anxious to seize upon some of his words with which to make out an accusation against him.—With this hope they followed him into the remotest parts of Judea, and even into Galilee. Such was the bitter persecution to which Jesus was subjected by hostility of the leading Pharisees.—And upon the present occasion as they were more than usually incensed against him, so they were the more determined upon revenge. The plot they devised, the pit they dug, they doubtless, meant and thought to be so well disguised that he must betray himself into their power.

Let us dwell, for a moment, upon the circumstances of the snare which the Pharisees in their ire had devised against Jesus. The Jews, it is generally known, were at this time, and had been for many years under the dominion of the Romans. Like other nations conquered by these victors of the world, the Jews were compelled to pay an annual tribute in money to their masters. To the payment of this tribute the Pharisees were highly adverse, as to every other mark of being a subjugated nation. They considered themselves the peculiar people of God, that he alone was their rightful sovereign, and that, therefore, they owed no allegiance to any other potentate, and that it was wrong to pay tribute to any other power. It is not certain, but it is probable that the Herodians were a party who held opposite views on this subject. Herod was friendly to the Roman government, and it is likely that those who took their name from him were advocates for the propriety of paying the tribute. It is thought that this party were for entire subjection to the Romans, and to Herod the deputy of the Roman government, and that they made it their business to reconcile the people to that government.

Against this sect or party, the Pharisees indulged a hatred almost as virulent as that which they entertained against Jesus. Yet for the sake of ensnaring Jesus, for the sake of obtaining signal revenge, these proud Pharisees demean themselves to an association with this despised party. To what mean shifts will not the passion for revenge, for power, or for gold reduce its votaries!

The better known among the Pharisees did not go personally to Jesus, thinking probably that some of their disciples whom Jesus had never seen might be more likely to impose themselves upon him as righteous men, who came to him with a conscientious scruple, which, according to Mark, they attempted to do. We have thought too that the leading Pharisees did not wish to be seen in company with the despised Herodians.

Behold this coalition of opposing parties on their way to Jesus, prepared under the tuition of the more cunning and crafty of the Pharisees, with a snare from which they thought, he could in no wise extricate himself! If he allowed that it was lawful and right to pay tribute to Cæsar, they were ready to employ this answer as an instrument in rendering him odious to the people as one who was opposed to the popular notions and wished for independence and liberty,—as one who wished to pay court to the emperor and advance his own ambitious projects by that means; and, on the other hand if he should give it as his opinion that the paying of tribute was wrong, they were ready to accuse him before the Roman governor of sedition and disaffection to the government. On one of the horns of this dilemma, they thought, they would certainly have Jesus caught. They thought this was a snare from which he could by no means extricate himself.

Like almost all other men engaged in treacherous designs, they approach their intended victim with fulsome flattery upon their lips. They compliment him for his love of truth, his fearlessness and fortitude, his impartiality and disregard of power and greatness, evidently with the intention of emboldening him to a free, unqualified expression of his opinion.

> "O what authority and show of truth
> Can cunning sin cover itself withal!"

Mr. Ware, in his "Life of the Saviour," has beautifully remarked in reference to the opposition and hostility of the Pharisees to Jesus, that "we are reconciled to the petty persecution and unprincipled calumny with which they harassed him, only by observing, that they thus furnished opportunities for some of his most delightful instructions, and served to display in constantly new forms, the wisdom and loveliness of his character." On the present occasion we have an instance of presence of mind and ready perception of consequences which are proofs of superior wisdom, and which we do not think we could have expected from any other man. His enemies themselves were astonished at his sagacity in discovering and avoiding the snare they had laid so craftily. Although foiled in their attempt to entangle him whom they hated, although ashamed of being detected in such a nefarious and malicious plot, yet they could not help admiring that wisdom which thousands have admired since.

"My dear children" says Mr. S—— to his family, in a note upon this paragraph, "think of this passage whenever you are addressed by flatterers. Generally, you may depend upon it, the flatterer has some hidden, selfish, unworthy object in view. He means to use you for his own purposes. He means to make of you a stepping-stone to ulterior objects. And even where no evil is designed, the consequences of flattery are frequently ruinous. True, indeed, is the Italian proverb which I find quoted by Dr. A. Clarke—"He who caresses thee more than he was wont to do, has either deceived thee, or is about to do it."

Think often, too, of the answer which Jesus gave to the malecontented Jews. In substance he said to them;—"Whatever claims any one may have upon your time or your possessions, remember that God has a claim upon you paramount to all. Fail not in the discharge of any of your obligations, but above all, fail not in the proper discharge of your obligations to Him who has the highest claims upon you." This is what your father would say to you: Be sure that you carefully consider what you owe to your Father in heaven, or in other words, to your own best interests, and after attending to these fully and conscientiously, then let the claims of your government, and the claims of your neighborhood be attended to. "Seek first to have God reign in your souls." There will be time enough for all things else.

"Having devoted yourselves to God, let it not hold true of you, that the children of this world are wiser in their pursuits than the children of light. Be in earnest, be considerate, be sagacious, be persevering, and you will be successful in every good work." P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

RELIGION NECESSARY FOR MAN'S TRUE ENJOYMENT.

BY REV. WM. M. DELONG.

Man is evidently a compound being, possessing both an animal nature and intellectual faculties. His animal wants are more easily satisfied than his intellectual. Food, clothing, drink, and repose, are all these require—a sufficiency will satisfy them, and check our desires for more. But with our mental desires, it is not so. They aspire after something higher, more exalted, substantial, and lasting. They are anxiously toiling and desiring, when hunger and thirst are allayed, and when the body is clothed, and refreshed by repose.

For what, then, are our intellectual faculties aspiring, and what will satisfy their wants?

Go to the honest and industrious man and ask this question, and he will tell you, "religion." Go to the deluded votary of iniquity, whose bosom's peace is destroyed, and whose enjoyment is blasted by vicious pursuits, and ask him what will cause his peace to return and render him a happy man, and he will answer, "religion." Go to yonder dwelling, an inmate of which has been seized by the palsying hand of sickness, and ask him what will satisfy his mental wants—what will render him calm and composed—what will enable him to endure the pain, and even the dissolution of his animal or physical nature—and he will answer, "the benign and happy influence of religion."

Religion is necessary for our enjoyment in health. When prosperity with its numerous blessings, surrounds us—when friendship's endearing ties are enjoyed by us, and when pleasure renders joyful our existence—she is necessary, in order to caution us not to abuse the blessings by which we are encompassed, and to restrain us from indulging ourselves in vicious pursuits. She points out the way in which we should walk, and inspires us with joy when following her directions. When adversity, with its gloomy train, sickens the heart, destroys our prospects, and blasts our fairest hopes, she comes to us like an angel of light, to dispel the gloom, comfort the heart, cheer the drooping spirits, and to shed her heavenly influence over our benighted path.

The wants and fatigue of the weary laborer are forgotten, when he enjoys the smiles of religion. The domestic fireside is a source of comfort and contentment, of joy and gladness, when her balmy influence is shed around it. The mourning and disconsolate are comforted and consoled, the poor become rich, and the mental slave is set at liberty, when they enjoy this heavenly boon. But, divested of her enjoyment, the afflicted may mourn on, and find no balm to cure the deep wounds of sorrow—no physician that can heal the moral maladies—nothing that can satisfy the mental desires—no ray of hope to inspire them with confidence that this mortal shall be clothed upon with immortality, and a time arrive when the company of the loved and the lost will be enjoyed by them—but darkness, thick as night's sable curtain, hovers over the mind, and deprives it of that consolation which religion inspires.

God, in unerring wisdom, has so made man, that if he neglects to cultivate his religious feelings, the source of substantial enjoyment is closed against him. The man who neglects his duty to his Maker, or remains heedless of the responsibility that is resting upon him, is doing little or nothing to store his mind with useful knowledge, and drinks not of that fountain from which flows all pure and unsullied enjoyment.

Religion consists in a high exercise of all the ennobling faculties of the soul—of love and gratitude to our God—and good-will and charity towards our fellow-men. Without an exercise of these, how miserable and degraded should we be!—how deaf to the cries of the suffering, and how dead to happiness and peace! I know of nothing better adapted to the wants of man, and more happifying in its effects, than religion. The skeptic may deride, the infidel may scoff and call it a dream, a conjecture of the vain imagination, but I am satisfied of its truth—I am willing to embrace it, and bind it to my heart—and I would that every mind was illuminated, and every bosom made joyful with its life-giving power!

Happy indeed would the world be, if mankind were to cultivate their religious feelings, and improve their moral and social natures, more than they now do—if they would take as much pains in improving their mental and religious faculties, as is taken in vain and useless pursuits! The wants of our earthly nature, can be satisfied with earthly things—but the desires of the mind—its longings for substantial bliss—can not rest contented when not under the influence of "pure religion." Troubles and disappointments may and will come upon us—the chilling winds of adversity will sweep around us sooner or later—and oh! if we have neglected to acquaint ourselves with our duty and our God, the bitterness of regret and sorrow will rest upon us. There will be nothing that will sustain us amid trouble—no beacon-light to cheer our drooping spirits when darkness is on our path! But, with the person who has embraced the religion of Jesus, it is not so. Its heavenly influence comforts him, equally amid storms as in the sunshine—in adversity as prosperity. It teaches him to be meek and humble when plenty greets him, and calm and composed in the time of poverty. It lights up the countenance of the sad with a ray of hope, and points to a better and a purer world, where sorrow and disappointment will cease—sin's blighting curse no more be felt, and where a purified world will be clothed in robes of salvation!

Oh! then, how completely adapted to the wants of man is religion! Happy is the man who takes her for his guide—whose mouth is not defiled with cursing, and whose heart is benevolent and kind! She comes to man like an angel commissioned from Heaven, to bring the balm of peace and consolation! She offers to all lasting enjoyment, in her ways. She comes to relieve the oppressed, and to set the captive free! She inspires us with an inward joy, a calmness and tranquillity of soul—and imparts to the troubled mind a draught from the eternal fountain of enjoyment!

Oh! "embrace her, and she will promote thee to honor," and satisfy the longing desires of thy mind!

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PARENTS AND CHILDREN BEWARE.

On Sunday morning last, a daughter of Mr. Huyck, aged about four years, fell into a cistern, and came very near losing her life. One of her older sisters accidentally left the mouth of the cistern uncovered, which was about two feet from the ceiling. A chair was placed between the mouth of the cistern and the ceiling, on which the little girl stood, with her face turned towards the wall. While the elder sister was absent, the younger not being aware that the mouth of the cistern was open, stepped directly backwards into the cistern, in which there was about twenty inches of water. How long she remained in this, is uncertain. She was not discovered until the return of her older sister. After having been taken out, life appeared to be extinct for about twenty minutes. The aid of skilful persons was soon obtained, and after applying warm fluids and flannel cloths, life began to return, much to the gratification of all present. The child is now on the gain, and will, in all probability, entirely recover from this accident. May this serve as a warning to both parents and children; and let them beware of cisterns. F.

Clockville, Madison county, April 24.

A similar accident occurred in this city, about the same time. The cistern was left open but a few minutes, when, the child being missed, was immediately sought and found in the cistern, almost drowned. It was resuscitated, and is now doing well. No blame is attachable to any one—and the only benefit resulting from it, is to induce greater watchfulness on the part of the elder members of a family. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LETTER.

Br. Wilcox.

DEAR SIR—In answer to your inquiry, found in the Magazine and Advocate, just received, I would state, that the Rev. Mr. Swackhammer resided and preached in this county for some length of time. He is known in many parts of it as a revivalist, and is particularly noted on account of his being tried, a few years since, near Esquire Snell's, in Manheim, on a charge of having been over anxious for the salvation of a young lady, by "tickling the inside of her hand."

I have been well acquainted with Mr. S. for about eight years, and I am satisfied he did not think of speaking the truth when he stated, in your region, "that for two years he was a preacher of the doctrine, [Universalism,] and only ceased in his mad career, from the solemn reflection that he was leading numbers down to hell." Indeed, I know it to be a base falsehood, and every intelligent and impartial believer, by conversing with him, will soon discover that he is ignorant of the first principles of the "restitution," and knows not the value of the blessings he rejects.

Sincerely and truly yours,
W. H. WAGGONER.

Eatonville, April 20*th*, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A CARD.

On account of the pressure of the times, and the peculiar state of our Society and affairs, independent of any circumstances connected with Br. ALFRED PECK, our beloved pastor, we shall probably discontinue our meetings for the present season. We therefore deem it our duty to commend our Br. Peck to the confidence, affection, and liberality of the Universalist public.

R. C. KENYON,
ANSON FAY,
JONATHAN CASE,
JOHN WORLOCK,
ROBERT E. ALLEN,
} Trustees of the First Universalist Society, in Fulton, Oswego county, N. Y.

Fulton, April 18*th*, 1838.

Br. GROSH—The above is designed by our brethren of this place, to guard the public mind against any unfavorable suspicions which may affect either myself or the Society. We part in mutual friendship, and with reciprocal good wishes. May Heaven smile upon the Society, and bless them individually and collectively, that they may, in due season, resume their efforts with united zeal and devotion, and sustain that cause among them which is the cause of social peace and spiritual joy. ALFRED PECK.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 23.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Richmond, Va., April 21, 1838.

Dear Sir—Yours of the 6th inst. has just reached me. If pedantry, contumely, bombast and ridicule constitute argument, then is your letter very argumentative; if not, it is decidedly the weakest production I have yet seen from your pen. You are quite mistaken if you suppose that by such a course you will be able to drive me from the equilibrium of my temper and the sober argumentative course I have marked out for myself in this discussion. I began it, and I pray God to enable me to finish it, under a deep sense of its solemn and thrilling importance. Embracing as it does, the eternal destinies of a world, I am at a loss to conceive how a man, like you, professing to believe in the awful doctrine of infinite and endless wo, can adopt the style and exhibit the spirit of your last letter.

2. You say you are "a pupil in the school of Bacon, Newton, Locke," etc. What a pity you had not imbibed a little of the true dignity, charity, mildness and meekness of those illustrious men! You have a right, however, to chose your own course. And perhaps, as arguments failed you, you could think of no better substitute than that you have adopted. From this consideration I freely forgive, and pray God to forgive, all the hard and bitter things you have said against me. But you must excuse me for not following your example in this, and even for not replying at all to much of your fanfaronade. A few paragraphs will dispose of all that is entitled to serious notice in your last.

3. In the first place, I never derived aidios from hades; nor did I ever give it as my opinion it was so derived; nor did I ever state that any lexicographer so derived it. I merely stated that "some respectable critics supposed it to be so derived." (It is not necessary that a man should be a lexicographer in order to be a respectable critic.)—You gave me the lie direct, and said I could not name one. I gave the names of two, who while they say most Lexicon writers derive ades (hades) from a, negative, and idein, to see, and therefore it signifies invisible, unseen, etc., also say aidios "may have the same etymology as ades:" and of course they suppose it may be derived from the same: for etymology signifies, derivation of words. To discredit them, you call one an obscure Universalist, and the other an Atheist. It matters not what the present sentiments of one of those individuals may be. If, when their works were given to the public, they maintained a respectable standing in the literary world, and their works were received with commendations from high sources in the republic of letters, they certainly deserved the appellation I gave them, of respectable critics. The public must therefore judge whose veracity suffers from your wanton assault.

4. In the next place, I showed that aidios was derived from, or made up of, aei, ever, and dios, divine. This you deny and attempt to turn into ridicule, by assuming that dios is merely the adjective termination of aei, and has no significancy whatever in the word, more than orum has in the genitive plural of puer! What a clear-sighted critic my learned opponent is! Will he be so good as to inform me of what use the letters d i are in aidios?—whether there is any meaning in the letters on in aionios—if so, whether d i are not equally significant in aidios—and whether aios would not be as complete, and have as perfect an adjective termination as aidios, if aei, were the only significant part of the word? Recollect, also, that while aei is abbreviated and the e left out in the composition, dios, divine, is left entire and unabridged. It was not necessary therefore, that lexicographers should particularly name it as a root, because the whole word stands unaltered and speaks for itself.

5. You were quite unfortunate too, in the Latin word sempiternus which you introduce for illustration. That is evidently a compound word, from semper, always, and aeternus, everlasting, and when united in one word there is more intensity and strength of meaning than either word expresses alone. But lexicographers did not deem it necessary to say aeternus was a root or component part of sempiternus for the obvious reason that a mere tyro in language would know it, there being no alteration in it except the change of the diphthong æ into i, while semper the first part of the word, suffers the elision of its two last letters. So likewise it appears to me as clearly, that aidios is compounded of aei, always, and dios, divine, as that the English words head-dress, and sack-cloth are compounds of the monosyllables with which they are made up: and here I am perfectly willing both the learned and unlearned world should examine and decide.

6. You say the last four words I introduced are ex post facto, viz. athanatos, (which Hedericus defines immortalis sempiternus, aeternus, perpetuus,) akeratos akerasios, and akerios, (pure, imperishable, undecaying.) They are not ex post facto; for I have not yet written five letters on the third proposition, as I have a right to do. I had indeed supposed enough had been written previous to my last, to establish the affirmative incontrovertibly; and I think you have not invalidated my arguments in the least, and can not; but as you returned to the charge with shouts and redoubled fury after you supposed the enemy had quit the field, I deemed it proper to give you a little more business to do. Will you be so good as to attend to it?

7. Your 6th paragraph evades rather than meets my argument on God's casting off, and not casting off, forever. For my argument is that God will not cast off any of his creatures for ever, (eis ton aiona,) meaning thereby to all eternity: and the Bible sustains me. Isa. lvii: 16. "For I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me and the souls I have made." Thus all "spirits" that come from God and all "souls that he has made" are included in the reason God assigns for not casting off eternally. Again, Lam. iii: 31–33.—"The Lord will not cast off forever—for he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." Here too, the promise is equally applicable to all "the children of men." Hence if any individuals or communities are to be cast off forever, it must be for a period short of eternity, or else the Bible contradicts itself. Which will you relinquish, your Bible, or your opposition to Universalism?

8. On your 7th paragraph I will only remark, that, although Robinson derives aperantos from a negative, and peras, limit, yet Jones, whom I consider far better authority, says it is from "a and perains, to carry to an end, finish, terminate," etc., and hence the word aperantos is quite as applicable, and even more so, to duration than to space. Jones gives endless as its first definition. But, Sir, even limitless would apply as well to duration as to space. You ask me to pardon you for not answering my 15th paragraph, on 2 Cor. iv: 17, and the three texts from the Septuagint where a weight of glory, and a continuance of duration, far exceeding and beyond aionios, are spoken of.—I do, Sir, freely pardon you on the ground that you could not answer that paragraph. No man ought to be required to perform impossibilities.—You ought, however, to have confessed the truth and owned it unanswerable.

9. Where, my dear Sir, have I advanced the ideas you charge upon me in your 14th paragraph, that either the human or brute creation cling to life as a choice of evils—or that God is "unjust in little"—that I would compromise with the Deity by striking a balance between the good and evil, etc., etc.? You well knew I had never advanced any thing resembling such ideas; that I had, on the contrary, advanced the idea that life was a positive good, both to man and brute—that God is just and good in all things—and that the very evils of life would all be overruled for, and result in final good. And yet you demand to know how God's character can be justified on my system. In view of your own system, this demand is as consistent as it would be for Nero, Caligula or Robespierre to ask John Howard to justify himself for incidentally stepping on and crushing a few ants on the threshold of one of the numerous prisons he visited for the purpose of carrying the balm of health, the light of liberty, and joys of salvation to the dying sons of wretchedness and wo, notwithstanding the ants were getting old, had had their day, a happy day, and must soon have died of old age if they had not been crushed!!

10. You seem to writhe and agonise under the bare prospect of my a priori reasoning. But, Sir, if it is so very weak and wicked as you pretend, you will have the less trouble in exposing and refuting it. You seem alarmed and say I "start from hypothesis,"—"begin with what ought to be instead of with what is"—and "send the Bible a-begging to the school of Plato or Aristotle," etc., etc. Is it possible, dear Sir, that you are so ignorant of the laws of argument and rules of logic as not to know what a priori reasoning is? The best Logicians say, "In reasoning a priori, we begin" [not with "hypothesis," nor with "what ought to be," but] with the cause, and infer from it the reality, or the species of the effect."—"Argument a priori proves or disproves the fact from the law, or the effect from the cause." Now, Sir, God is the cause from which I argue to the effect. I go to no doubtful "hypothesis," but to the law as it is—to cause as it confessedly exists. I take the Bible as the basis and foundation of all I advance. I take God and his attributes exactly as laid down in the Bible; and obey that Divine authority which says, "Come now, and let us reason together," and "why even of ourselves judge ye not what is right?" I trust to show both you and our readers that Bible authority will not be wanting for all I advance.

11. The rest of your letter now before me, is either made up of the grossest misrepresentations, or else partakes of the characteristics mentioned in my first two paragraphs of this communication; and for reasons there stated, can not receive any further notice. To satisfy the reader upon this subject, I beg that he will, after perusing yours, again refer back to my last previous letter, especially paragraphs 18-22, and such other parts as you refer to. I shall now proceed to prove the doctrine of universal salvation from the attributes of God.

12. God is omniscient.—"His understanding is infinite;" "declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done." "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." Psa. cxlvii: 5. Isa. xlvi: 10. Acts xv: 18.

> "Did he overlook the least of his concerns,
> (Since from the least the greatest oft originate,)
> Then, unforeseen contingence might alarm him,
> And disturb the smooth and equal course of his affairs."

All events, past, present and to come, must be ever present to the mind of God. With him there can be nothing new, nothing old. His knowledge being absolutely perfect and intuitive, his plan of creating, governing and disposing of the universe must have been from the beginning, perfect and infallible. All causes, primary and secondary, together with all possible results, must have been clearly seen and fully understood. With him there could not possibly be any contingency or uncertainty as to the final result.

13. Every shade and every grade of moral character through which each and all of his creatures would ever pass, were as perfectly known to him before he created them, as they are now or ever can be. Are any of his creatures sinful and disobedient? He knew it before he gave them being. And if their wickedness be, or ever shall be, cause of his wrath and hatred towards them, it must have been equally so, in his own mind, before he created them. But knowing what they would be, he loved them, (Eph. ii: 4, 5. 2 Tim. i: 9,) and he can never cease to love them. His wisdom is abundantly competent to devise, and has devised, a plan for the salvation of all.—When he had finished the creation, surveyed the whole, seen all its bearings and results, with the glorious end in view, he pronounced all that he had made very good. Had the all-seeing and intuitive wisdom of God looked through the vast chain of events flowing from the creation, and seen that endless and immortal evil would have flowed therefrom, and that he could not devise any scheme to prevent it, could he have been infinitely wise in contrivance? Or could he have pronounced all very good? Certainly not.

14. God is infinitely good.—David says, "God is good unto all and his tender mercies are over all his works." Psa. cxlv: 9. Solomon says, "Thou lovest all the things that are, and abhorrest nothing which thou hast made: for never wouldst thou have made any thing to have hated it." Christ says, "there is none good but one: that is God." Mark x: 18. John says, "God is love." John iv: 8, 16. Thus the very essence, the whole nature of God, is benevolence, goodness, or love. Dr. A. Clarke has well remarked, "God is never said in the Scriptures to be Justice, or Patience, or Holiness: but he is frequently, in one form or another, said to be Love." When, therefore, we say God is infinitely wise, powerful, just, merciful, etc., we do but say Love is infinitely wise, powerful, just, merciful, etc., these being but the modifications and attributes of infinite Love. When we say all are created, controlled, governed, and disposed of by God, we do but say Love creates, controls, governs and disposes of all. The goodness or love of God being coeval and coextensive with his wisdom, and even with his existence, must extend to every being he has ever created, and attend that being through every period of his existence. If there be, in the universe of intelligences, a solitary being to whom God is not good, then his benevolence, being limited to less than the whole, is not infinite. But as all allow that his goodness is infinite, no other legitimate conclusion can follow but that his love extends to every being he has ever created.

15. This being indisputable, his infinite benevolence must prompt him to seek, not only the collective good of the whole, but the individual good of each; and that not for time merely, but for eternity. The greatest amount of good for the whole must consist in the consummation of the perfect and eternal beatitude of each individual intelligence. To illustrate; suppose a thousand persons to be susceptible of enjoyment, each of one thousand degrees of happiness and no more. A million degrees of happiness is then the maximum of good of which they are susceptible. Suppose then the author of their being makes one of the number perfectly and endlessly miserable, and the other nine hundred and ninety-nine perfectly happy. In this case he would not produce the greatest possible amount of good to the whole; for there would be a loss of one thousand degrees of happiness to the whole, and the introduction of an infinite and endless evil into the bargain; so that he could not have been infinitely good to them all.

16. Had the Deity foreseen that any individual of the human family would be an endless sufferer by his existence, or would fail of enjoying more good than he suffered of evil—more happiness than he endured of misery—his benevolence never would have created, nay, it must have withholden existence from such being. No principle but that of infinite hatred could have produced a single being, knowing that being would be endlessly miserable. If God were infinitely benevolent in the creation of each individual of the human family, he can never do otherwise than seek to promote the ultimate good, the final happiness of each. He can no more cease to love or be good to each being than he can cease to be God: for God is love. The moment he ceases to be love to any being, that moment he ceases to be God to that being: for God is love, and he can not exist aside from his nature. Will you say that God was good to all in their creation, designed the happiness of all, and continued to love all, till they rebelled against him, and then he ceased to love, or to be good to them, and forever after hates them? If so, one of two things must be true, either he did not know beforehand what they would be or how they would act, or he experiences an entire and infinite change both in his affections and designs. The admission of his infinite wisdom forbids the former, and of his immutability the latter idea.—Therefore, he can not but love all mankind to all eternity. And, Sir, can infinite love torment the objects of its affections to all eternity? What could infinite malevolence do worse?

17. God is omnipotent.—"The Lord God omnipotent reigneth." Rev. xix: 5. The title "God Almighty," so frequently applied to him in Scripture, fully expresses his omnipotence.—All enlightened theists admit it in the premises, though too many deny it in their conclusions relative to the destiny of man. They will admit God is physically omnipotent; but they say "man is a moral being—as such he has rebelled, become a hardened, stubborn, impenitent sinner—God can not violate man's moral freedom, and therefore can not bring man into conformity to his will and the terms of salvation." Thus they virtually deny his moral omnipotence. But I ask, whatever view may be taken of the extent of man's moral powers and freedom of volition—from whence is this moral power—this freedom of volition, derived? Is it not from God? Is there, or can there be any moral power but that which comes from him? And has he imparted a moral power to his creatures which he can not control? Has he given to man a will beyond the power of his own moral omnipotence? Has there a power emanated and passed from himself which is above himself?

18. It is an axiom that no stream can rise higher than its fountain—that no effect can exceed its cause; and it is utterly impossible for God to impart to others what he does not himself possess, or even a power which is beyond his control. He is not merely the physical governor of the world, but likewise the moral. He reigns not only in heaven, but over the armies of heaven; not only on earth, but among the inhabitants of the earth, doing all his pleasure, and none can stay his hand; and he "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." Dan. iv: 35. Eph. x: 11. Hence, as his wisdom is adequate to contrive the plan, and his unbounded goodness prompts him to desire and seek the ultimate, universal, and eternal happiness of man, his moral omnipotence will ultimately secure the object desired. In his own time and way he will "turn the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned." In the day of his power his people shall surely be made willing—(as the persecuting Saul of Tarsus was when God's truth, and power, and grace were exhibited before him—he espoused and promulgated with all his zeal and power what he had once sought to destroy—) their wills shall all become subject to his will; and "God shall be all in all."

19. Now one of the three following propositions I think must be true—either first. God could save all mankind, but would not; or second. He would save all, but could not; or third. He can save all mankind and will save all. If you adopt the first, you grant him omnipotence, but deny his benevolence. If you adopt the second, you grant his benevolence, but deny either his wisdom or power, or both. But if you adopt the third, (Universalism,) it, and it alone, allows all these attributes to belong to God in infinite fulness and perfection. Which will you choose?

20. God is omnipresent.—(See Psa. cxxxix: 1–12.) Throughout all space, all worlds, all beings, all time, God exists, and his wisdom sees, and his power and goodness operate. God being love, and omnipresent, we "can not go where universal love not smiles around." No being can get beyond or out of the reach of almighty love—nothing can separate us from it: neither tribulation, nor distress, nor persecution, nor famine, nor nakedness, nor peril, nor sword, nor death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall ever be able to separate us from the love of God. Rom. viii: 35, 38, 39. All mankind, not excepting sinners, are forever surrounded, encircled, upheld, below, above, around, in life, in death, in this or any other world, by omnipresent, all-pervading love. Though sinners find it a "fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," yet they shall ultimtely find them to be the hands of love, and not of hatred; as sinful David did, when he said (1 Chron. xxi: 13,) "Let me fall now into the hand of the Lord; for very great are his mercies; but let me not fall into the hand of man." And again, Psa. cxix: 67. "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept thy word."

Yours, with all due respect, D. Skinner.

Br. Grosh—Will you correct a typographical error in the word akerios in my last letter to Campbell, as you left out the r in printing it?

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 4, 1838.

REMOVAL.

The Book Store and Office of the Magazine and Advocate is in No. 41 Genesee-street, (east side,) between the former stand and the Rail Road.

DUELLING.

Duelling is incompatible with the present social and moral state of society, and should, therefore, be reprobated and punished for the same reasons and in a similar manner, as other high offences against the peace, good order and safety of the community. And there can be no doubt, that it is strictly within the province, and certainly in the power of the legislative and judicial authorities of the United States, or of any one State in the Union, to make it as odious and as criminal as mail robbery, arson, or murder. Why, then, is it not done? It is difficult to conceive of any other reason, than that those who have the power, want the disposition—lest in the operation of events, it might involve those whom they would wish to exonerate from such infamy.

In the present state of things, the gentleman, as he is termed, who gives or accepts a challenge in hot-blood, and who kills his fellow-man at any future time in cold-blood—is considereded and treated as a gentleman still. At the same time, however, the common villain who kills another in an affray excited by brandy and gambling, is brought to an ignominious death after months of unpitied suffering in the cell of a prison. Is this the boasted impartiality of our institutions? Is this invidious distinction between acts of the same general character and tendency—to say nothing of the parties engaged—consistent with the principles of eternal equity? And will these things be tolerated by an enlightened people? It seems impossible.

In the name of Heaven, if murder in the first degree consists in matured premeditation, or malice prepence, what is duelling? Is there no malice—no premeditation in this case? None, in the whole system of correspondence, arrangement and last deadly encounter?—None, will, or can pretend this. Nor does the fact, that the perpetrater of the fatal deed jeopardises his own life, mitigate the enormity of his offence. The common highwayman often does the same, but is he, therefore, held guiltless? Does the fact, that he is liable to have his life taken by the man whose property he seeks, exonerate him from public abhorrence, or the penalty of law? Neither—nor should the circumstance that the duellist exposes his person exonerate his crime. It is custom—custom sanctified by long continuance, and honored by great names, that has thrown a veil over the nakedness and deformity of the practice; and the majority, perhaps, are deluded into the admission of a distinction between murder and duelling, when there is no real difference.

M. R. M.

CHURCH MUSIC.

In our last paper but two, we spoke of music. We will now make a few remarks on that part of it called sacred, or church music.

We think, then, that sacred music should be cultivated in every society. Let all those who can sing, or who have powers to sing, associate together for practice and improvement, and join in the worship of the sanctuary. You are not required to be first rate, scientific vocalists, to occupy a place in the choir—there are many whose voices are sweetly toned and whose musical taste is good, that with a very little practice will greatly aid in this delightful exercise. Now, will they suffer a little diffidence, or over modesty to keep them from doing good in this sphere?

A choir can not be too large. Let the whole congregation join in the song of devotion if they can. So much the more lofty and fervent will be the worship. We think it a mistaken idea, that the choir is a kind of orchestra, whose business it is to do the singing part, and that the rest must sit or stand and listen. It does devolve upon them, it is true, to lead in this service, but it is no more confined to them, than the act of prayer to the preacher in the desk. Singing is a part of the worship, and should be joined in by all. Will not the heart feel more devotional, when in itself it is making melody and pouring forth praises, and when the lips are uttering its deep impulses, than when we merely lend our ears to the songs of others? Let all who can sing, we say, join in this exercise, and let those who can not, breathe forth harmony to the uttered words, in their souls. And let those whom circumstances will permit, join the choir, and in this manner aid in the service of the house of God.

We do not like a theatrical, or as some, perhaps, would call it, a "fashionable" manner of singing, in church music. A trilling or gurgling of the voice—a screeching upon the high notes, and a clipping or confusing of the words. There may be a beautiful and exquisite, yet simple style of singing, and such is much better adapted to the subject. The other style may sound well enough to those who like it, over the keys of a piano, but it certainly, ill comports with the solemn exercises of public worship.

We like to hear the words plainly uttered in singing. We do not like to hear from a choir, a mere rush of melody, with swells, and falls, and rests, and stops, and articulate sounds, but no continued distinct words. He who has not a hymn book in such a case, may as well be listening, and perhaps better, to hymns in Greek and Latin, for all the associations which he will gather from the subject of the hymn, by means of the choir. Plainness of utterance adds a great pleasure to this part of divine worship.

In the selection of tunes, expression should be regarded. The air chosen, should be adapted to the subject of the hymn. To sing a gentle and plaintive hymn, to a bold major mode, is a violation of the laws of musical propriety—equally so would it be to set a tune like "Windham" for instance, or (if this is thought an extreme case) any other slow or plaintive air, to some triumphant psalm or hymn of exultation. The expression of different verses of the same hymn should be regarded, also. Where the theme is joyful, joyful be the strain—where it is plaintive, let the strain be likewise, and so let them correspond to all the various modes of feeling.

We have thus given a few hints upon an important subject. We are acquainted with but very little of the science of music. But we believe we have thrown out suggestions which have occurred to others, and in which they will coincide with us. It is necessary that this sweet and solemn part of our worship, should be cultivated and attended to. We think it may have a great influence upon the devotional feelings. We know how much it is missed, when services are performed without it. We should suppose a preacher would make a better effort who rose to speak after the full and effective singing of a hymn, than he would, to preach where there had been no music at all, or where the performance of the choir was poor and feeble.

And we think that every society has within itself the elements of a good choir. There needs but confidence, and energy, and application to form one. Let each young person, gentleman or lady, possessing musical taste and a voice, and these are by no means scarce, let them volunteer their services, and use their exertions in collecting, and improving, and aiding a choir.

Regular meetings should be holden, by members of choirs, say once every week, and there should be a punctual and full attendance thereat.

My remarks are somewhat desultory, but I hope that they will be productive of benefit, and the means of exciting some who may read them, to action and diligence in the matter. It is hoped that it will be effectually urged upon societies, by the precepts and the influences of those who are more capable than myself of representing the importance of sacred music.

The manner of employing music, is its combination with the pure and the holy of which we spake in our prior article. Speaking to the soul with lofty and heavenly meaning, it is adapted to excite an impulse and to find an answer there. It is fitting that men in "the great congregation" and the assemblies of the people should praise the Lord with the sound of music, for it is a portion of nature's worship. It is heard from her thousands of choristers in wood and bower, and peals up from things of grandeur and of beauty among inanimate existences around us.

And then, what themes for song we have! The attributes of God—the blessings he hourly bestows upon us—the faith and hopes of the Gospel—the great redemption from sin! How they leap from the heart and burst from the lips, and peal from the organ, and thrill through the multitude, lifting up souls and voices in adoration of the Holy One! Oh! it is a glorious employment of the power of melody, to blend it with our worship, thanksgiving and praise!

Let pæans of salvation, and anthems to Jehovah, fill every lone desert and all the islands of the sea! Let them rise from every mountain-top and every deep valley. And over the whole earth, and in every temple, and by every shrine, let the hearts and the lips of the children of men, be filled with the song of God and the Lamb!

E. H. C.

ELDER JOHN FISHPOOL.

The name of this Baptist Revivalist was connected with the new Female Academy, in a series of questions published two weeks ago in this paper. The business of removing the office has prevented me from obtaining further information on the subject, either to add to, confirm, or correct that already given. I am not, therefore, yet prepared to speak fully on the subject. But at the request of the only person who has stepped forward to answer any of the questions—a man every way estimable, and one of the Trustees of the Academy—I give the following statement, handed to him by one who was a prominent partaker of the excitement produced by Fishpool, and said to have been procured from Miss Sheldon, herself, the Principal of the Academy.

This statement is—that Miss Sheldon's father, a member of the Baptist church, invited Mr. Fishpool to stay there two or three nights, when the French teacher left, and Mr. S. invited F. to occupy his room, which he did until during the first week after the meeting was removed to the Blocker-street church—that F. never spoke to a single pupil except in the presence of a teacher, nor took part in any religious exercises except one evening when he was invited by Mr. S. to do so at the usual family hours. He made a prayer, and afterwards took three pupils who were "anxious" to one side, and addressed them in the same room with the rest. The whole exercises then lasted about forty-five minutes.—Miss S. objected to his proceedings, and he begged pardon, saying it was but his usual custom on such occasions. Miss S. further states, if this account may be relied on, that no alteration was made in school arrangements—that no pupils attended evening meetings except when called for by a friend or relative—that no proceedings were had in the house in relation to the protracted meeting—and that no pupils were up, at any time, after ten o'clock at night.

Such is the whole statement as received. Miss Sheldon, if she has made it, may be deceived in it herself, or others may; but it is a fact that a gentleman who called on Mr. Fishpool, found him surrounded by the pupils, who clung around him as daughters around a father or venerable and good old man. It is a fact also, that hundreds have somehow or other been impressed with the belief, that nearly all the pupils attended the meetings for days and evenings together, often with F. marching at their head to the meeting-house. These, and other reports had been circulating very generally for three weeks before I noticed them—the Trustees, at least some of them, knowing that they were in circulation and that they were generally believed, and yet, to this day, no one has publicly contradicted any of them! Is it any wonder that they are yet, and more firmly believed by the public, in this city and elsewhere? I still think that it is the duty of the Trustees to make a full investigation of the matter, and if in their power, to publicly contradict the hundred reports in circulation. Until that is done, and well done, many will believe there is room for believing them true.

One word more. My motives have been called in question—I expected it—but I solemnly declare that I had no malice to gratify—that I deeply regretted the pain I knew that article would give to many amiable and esteemed persons connected with that Academy; but I had, as I devoutly believe, a higher duty to perform—one that might save parents abroad from greater pain, and their daughters from ruin, if the Academy was permitted to be, at any time, a revival machine in the hands of such men as Fishpool, his coadjutors and dupes in the excitement just passed—and I performed that duty. Besides, if those reports, so generally circulated and believed, were untrue, I believed that by embodying them in those questions, I was giving the Trustees the best chance possible to reply to them, and correct the public mind—and that, too as extensively as the circulation of this paper; for I ask no questions that I am not willing to have answered in our columns.

The other questions, affecting the character of Fishpool's coadjutors, for concealing his crimes as long as they could, and for allowing him to preach a farewell sermon after they knew what he was, are yet uncontradicted, and, it is believed, are undeniable. Threats, anger, talk of prosecution, etc., are unavailing—I am not to be deterred by them from doing what I believe to be my duty. If I am in an error, let that error be pointed out, and no man among them all will be more anxious than myself to render full and ample atonement for the injury my publication of it may have done. I trust that I never will make promises to retract anything that was said amiss, and afterwards refuse fulfilling my promises, as some of our opposers have done. Still I say, "perhaps more anon."

A. B. G.

TO OUR FRIENDS.

During the past year our pecuniary embarrassments and losses have been very great, and the number of discontinuances considerable, while our exertions to render the paper what we would have it, have been considerably checked and paralyzed. But even now, if a reasonable portion of what is due to us, were paid in, we could do much for ourselves and others, during the remainder of the volume. Without such aid we must continue to suffer as we have done. May we not ask, then, for an immediate payment of what is due, from all

—from each and every individual who is able to make it? No one but a publisher can realize the sickening of heart caused by hopes deferred, when he has large sums constantly to meet, and no resources sufficient to meet them—and this continued from week to week, for months together. Each subscriber may ask and think, "What is my poor two dollars, or four dollars and a half, towards paying $120 dollars a week? It can only be paid one week by the publishers, and is then gone from them, never to aid them again—and even in that one payment, it is but a trifle compared to the amount they have to pay." All this would be very true if we had but one subscriber who owed us that sum. But we have several thousands, on each of whom we are waiting for sums of from two dollars up to seven dollars—and if but the one-half of them would pay up what they owe us, we would be able to refurnish our office and store, improve the appearance and publication of the paper, pay our debts, and feel as men engaged in public service should feel, besides helping onward those whom we owe, by paying them, and doing other things beneficial to the cause at large, and, at the same time, profitable to ourselves. Let any man indebted to us, reflect duly on these things—make our case his own, and remember that it is for the want of the two, five or seven dollars that he is owing us, that we are compelled to write this article, and to suffer the embarrassments here complained of.

Brother—will you hold back any longer? Can you not pay us or one of our agents, very soon? Will you not do it, without complaining of the enhanced price, caused wholly by your own delay—a delay that we would not have endured for the additional fifty cents or dollar, had ours been the choice?

We may seem improperly importunate, but situated as we are, constantly reminded of the wants of to-morrow by the deficiencies of to-day, we can not refrain from trying any thing that affords the shadow of a hope. We fear, sometimes, that if we do not complain, our friends and excellent agents may think we are not in special need of their aid and exertions; when, every day, almost, we do deeply need all they can do for us.

One word more—Relying on being ultimately relieved from our present cramped situation, we have taken a new, commodious stand on a lease of years, with a view to render ourselves more useful to the good cause, as soon as we can get the means. We believe that if we continue prudent and faithful, we will be sustained in our exertions, and under the determination to merit the support of our friends, so far as we can do it, we have made our calculations for years ahead, relying on divine Goodness to render our provisions effectual in spreading abroad the knowledge of his truth. G. and H.

THE NEW PAPER IN MICHIGAN.

I should have stated to the public before this, that such are my obligations to Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson, that I can not publish in Michigan, or any where else in this country, a paper that will be confined in size, and in every respect to the same objects, with the Magazine and Advocate. This notice is given, that our worthy brethren of this establishment, may not suffer by a misunderstanding which this is intended in part to correct.

The new paper in Michigan, if published, must be proportionally higher in price than the Magazine and Advocate, and will be what the prospectus alleges, a religious and secular paper. GEO: SANDERSON.

Utica, May 4, 1838.

UNIVERSALIST REGISTER AND ALMANAC.

The subscribers have sold all their right and title to this annual publication, to Grosh and Hutchinson, whose facilities and ability to render it correct and useful, to publish it in a neat and creditable manner, and to circulate it extensively, are such as to enable us to recommend them with all confidence to the patrons of the work and to the Universalist public generally. The work in their hands can not fail to be worthy of an extensive support—and we solicit for them all the aid and patronage that has hitherto been so generously extended to us.

O. WHISTON.
Utica, May 4th, 1838. G. SANDERSON.

It will be seen by the above, that the Universalist Register and Almanac will henceforth be published by us; and it may be proper for us, therefore, to state, that immediate arrangements will be made to issue the number for the year 1839, in the course of August next, with such corrections, additions and alterations as we in our judgment deem necessary, and by our means are able to make. Among other things we may name the addition of tables suited to Boston, New-York, and Cincinnati, and other places for the rising and setting of the sun, etc., if they can be procured in time—the correction of the list of preachers, meetings of our ecclesiastical bodies, etc., so far as information relating to the past and present can be procured—and the printing of the whole work, on fair, strong paper, with new type of the size at present used in the work. This, with the articles intended to prove, explain, defend and illustrate the doctrine of universal salvation, and to exhibit its practical utility, (which will be carefully labored to render them as chaste, clear and convincing as possible,) will, we believe, render the work all that our friends can reasonably expect it to be. And all we ask now, is, that the denomination will wait its appearance, not expecting too much in the brief time allowed for getting out the next number, but prepared to approve all in our labors that is worthy of approbation, and to patronize the work in the hope that we will continue our endeavors to improve it.

A. B. GROSH,
Utica, May 4, 1838. O. HUTCHINSON.

LETTER TO BR. N. BROWN.

Br. Nelson Brown itinerates so steadily, that our friends do not know where a letter will find him. This is their apology for addressing him through our columns. The letter itself was filed, with a number of others, for a leisurely examination, which did not take place until after moving time. This is my apology for not giving it an earlier insertion. Will the friends who first see Br. Brown, tell him there is a letter for him, not in the post office, but in the Magazine? They may call it "a widely spread," but they can not term it a "loud call."

A. B. G.

TO REV. N. BROWN.

DEAR SIR—In behalf of the friends of Universalism, in the towns of Friendship and Cuba, Allegany county, I inform you that I have closed my labors in those places, and you are hereby respectfully solicited to settle with them as their Pastor, for a year at least. They have resolved to support a preacher the whole time in those two places.

Should you conclude to comply with their request, please signify it immediately by letter to Rufus Scott, Friendship, and Stephen Smith, Cuba, and let them know when you will commence your labors.

If you can not accept this invitation, give as early notice as possible, and in their behalf invite some other one; for they do not wish to be left in the wilderness without a shepherd. There is a good work well begun there, and if duly attended, a good society may be formed in each of the above mentioned towns, this season.

Yours, with respect, J. H. SANFORD.
Centreville, April 6th, 1838.

The Quarterly Conference of the Chautauque Association met in Ellery Centre, February 21st and 22d.—Br. S. Adams, Moderator, and Br. T. C. Eaton Clerk. Sermons were preached by Brs. L. Harris, J. Todd, J. Bulcock, L. Paine, T. C. Eaton and S. Adams, to large and attentive congregations. Adjourned to meet in Panama village, Chautauque county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June next.

PERIODICALS.

I would call the attention of our readers to an abridged prospectus on our last page, for the Seventh Volume of the Universalist and Ladies' Repository, which will commence soon. Now is a good time for our friends whose wives, daughters, sisters, or other female friends, want a periodical to read every month, to send on their names, and begin with the new volume. Subscriptions received at this office.

"The Star in the West," is the abridged title of our faithful old friend, the Sentinel and Star, published in Cincinnati, Ohio. It appears gallantly arrayed in whitest of paper, blackest of ink, and beautifully printed with new type, and discourses eloquently by the aid of articles furnished for it by correspondents and Editor. Br. Gurley has much improved the appearance of our old friend, for which I thank him, and hope the Universalist public will reward him with something more substantial. A. B. G.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The Summer term of this Institution will commence on Wednesday, the 23d inst., under the superintendence of Simon Clowes, L. L. D., as the Principal, assisted by the former Professor of Mathematics and Assistant teacher.

The Female department will open at the same time, under the charge of Miss Barker, aided by other competent teachers.

NEW AGENTS.

Martin Thatcher, Antwerp—Ziba N. Ellis, Canton, Mich.—E. Marsh, P. M., Pleasant Valley, Mich.—J. Whitehead, Lockport, Mich.—Ira Harding, Martinsville, Ills.—W. M. Holcom, Christial Lake, Ills.—Seneca Ball, Valparaiso, Ind.

Br. Tompkins—Send current volume Repository, back numbers, to S. Moore, Geneva, Cayuga county, N. Y. Also credit Misses Case and Robinson, Howlet Hill, Onondaga county, and Mrs. S. Camp, Moravia, Cayuga county, for current vol. $2 each, and charge all to H. Boughton.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. DOOLITTLE will preach in Lebanon, and Br. DELONG in North Norwich next Sunday.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. BROWN at Mexico, and at the school-house near Br. A. J. Danby's at 5 P. M.—Br. W. H. GRISWOLD at Smithville Flats—Br. M. B. SMITH at the school-house near Mason's Factory, in New-Hartford, at 6 P. M.—Br. GUILD, in Jacksonboro' at 10 A. M., and in Worcester Academy at 3 P. M.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. T. J. SMITH, in Columbus—Br. BRITTON at the Union meeting-house, Plessis—Br. GUILD, at the school-house near Peter Hanson's, at 10 A. M., and in Colliersville at 3 P. M.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in June by Br. GUILD, in Richmondville at 11 A. M.

☞Union, please copy Br. Guild's notices.

Br. S. J. HILLYER will preach in Amenia, N. Y. Monday evening, May 21st—at Cario, Tuesday 22d—at Prattsville, Wednesday 23d—at Harpersfield, Thursday 24th—Davenport Centre, Friday 25th—at Otsdawa, Saturday 26th—at Mount Upton, Sunday 27th—at South New-Berlin, Monday 28th—at Unadilla, Friday June 1st—at Walton, Sunday 3d, morning and afternoon, and at Colchester the same evening—at Liberty, Monday 4th—at Monticello, Tuesday 5th. Sunday meetings commence at the usual hour—evening lectures at early candle light.

ASSOCIATIONS.—The Central Association will meet in Lebanon, Madison county, on the first Wednesday and Thursday (6th and 7th) of June.

The Niagara Association will meet in Lewiston, on the same days.

The Central Association in Michigan will hold its annual session in Ann Arbor, Washtenaw county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, next. It is hoped that every preacher in the State will punctually attend, and an affectionate invitation is given to all others to "come over and help us." Churches and societies will be careful to send delegates properly accredited, and carefully instructed in relation to business to be transacted. N. STACY, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

Rev J B, Carthage, for self, L J and G S—J M, Venice, for self, W F, T F, W B and J W—Rev P M, Watertown, for E M, St Josephs (Mich)—P M, Fredericktown, (O) for J B, S W, W O, J F D, A A, S McP, R G, Z J and W D—P M, Galway for L W and D S—J H, Liberty, (Ills) for self and A and J—E W, Orleans, for self, J W, T J H, S B, U W, M R, H L and W L F—R B, New Preston, (Ct)—R W R, Canterbury, (Ct) for self and R F R—R R Lapeer, (Mich) for self, S W and J S—P M, Sylvania, (Pa) for R S—J S, Byron, for J G D—E H, Persis, for self, D A, J P, S B, E F, H P, J B W and D B—P M, Lebanon, for W and R—P M, Middleport, for J S W and J R—Rev H B, Scipio, for S W, R N, P S and E B—H R, Turin, for self, N H and E J—P M, E Hamilton, for U N R—M P, Hannibal, for L P, H C, A W, T B, W H, A L, E C, J E, J McC, A B 2d, I H R, W G H, J W J, J C and L C—M H, Spring Water, for Z A Jr, W P, D H G, N P H, E G, J S and J F—S C E, Shirley village, for M B—S C, Pamelia Four Corners, for H B and E J B—N N, Alabama, for self, C P, P R, A H, H R and A C.

POETRY.

From Mary Howitt's Christmas Library.

BUTTERCUPS AND DAISIES.

Buttercups and daisies—
Oh, the pretty flowers!
Coming ere the Spring-time,
To tell of sunny hours.
While the trees are leafless,
While the fields are bare,
Buttercups and daisies
Spring up here and there.

Ere the snow-drop peepeth,
Ere the crocus bold,
Ere the early primrose
Opens its paly gold,
Somewhere on a sunny bank
Buttercups are bright;
Somewhere among the frozen grass
Peeps the daisy white.

Little hardy flowers,
Like to children poor
Playing in their sturdy health
By their mother's door:
Purple with the North wind,
Yet alert and bold;
Fearing not and caring not,
Though they be a-cold.

What to them is weather!
What are stormy showers!
Buttercups and daisies
Are these human flowers!
He who gave them hardship
And a life of care,
Gave them likewise hardy strength,
And patient hearts to bear.

Welcome, yellow buttercups,
Welcome daisies white,
Ye are in my spirit
Visioned, a delight!
Coming ere the Spring-time,
Of sunny hours to tell—
Speaking to our hearts of Him
Who doeth all things well.

CHRISTIANITY AND FEMALE CHARACTER.

There is one topic, intimately connected with the introduction and decline of Christianity, and subsequently with its revival in Europe, which the occasion strongly suggests, and which I can not forbear briefly to touch upon. I allude to the new and more interesting character assumed by woman since those events. In the heathen world, and under the Jewish dispensation, she was the slave of man. Christianity constituted her his companion. But, as our religion gradually lost its power in the dark ages, she sunk down again to her deep moral degradation. She was the first to fall in the garden of Eden, and perhaps it was a judgment upon her, that, when the whole human race was now low, she sunk the lowest, and was the last to rise again to her original consequence in the scale of being. The age of chivalry, indeed, exalted her to be an object of adoration. But it was a profane adoration, not founded upon the respect due to a being of immortal hopes and destinies as well as man. This high character has been conceded to her at a later period, as she has slowly attained the rank ordained for her by Heaven. Although this change in the relation of woman to man and to society is both an evidence and a consequence of an improvement in the human condition, yet now her character is a cause operating to produce a still greater improvement. And if there be any one cause, to which we may look with more confidence than to others, for hastening the approach of a more perfect state of society, that cause is the elevated character of woman as displayed in the full developement of all her moral and intellectual powers. The conjugal confession of Eve to Adam,

> "God is thy law, thou mine; to know no more
> Is woman's happiest knowledge and her praise,"

has grown to be obsolete. The influence of the female character is now felt and acknowledged in all the relations of her life. I speak not now of those distinguished women, who instruct their age through the public press; nor of those whose devout strains we take upon our lips when we worship; but of a much larger class; of those whose influence is felt in the relations of neighbor, friend, daughter, wife, mother. Who waits at the couch of the sick to administer tender charities while life lingers, or to perform the last acts of kindness when death comes? Where shall we look for those examples of friendship, that most adorn our nature; those abiding friendships, which trust even when betrayed, and survive all changes of fortune? Where shall we find the brightest illustrations of filial piety? Have you ever seen a daughter, herself, perhaps, timid and helpless, watching the decline of an aged parent, and holding out with heroic fortitude to anticipate his wishes, to administer to his wants, and to sustain his tottering steps to the very border of the grave?

But in no relation does woman exercise so deep an influence, both immediately and prospectively, as in that of mother. To her is committed the immortal treasure of the infant mind. Upon her devolves the care of the first stages of that course of discipline, which is to form, of a being perhaps the most frail and helpless in the world, the fearless ruler of animated creation, and the devout adorer of its great Creator. Her smiles call into exercise the first affections that spring up in our hearts. She cherishes and expands the earliest germs of our intellects. She breathes over us her deepest devotions.—She lifts our little hands, and teaches our little tongues to lisp in prayer. She watches over us like a guardian angel, and protects us through all our helpless years, when we know not of her cares and her anxieties on our account. She follows us into the world of men, and lives in us, and blesses us, when she lives not otherwise upon the earth. What constitutes the centre of every home? Whither do our thoughts turn, when our feet are weary with wandering, and our hearts sick with disappointment? Where shall the truant and forgetful husband go for sympathy, unalloyed and without design, but to the bosom of her, who is ever ready and waiting to share in his adversity or his prosperity? And if there be a tribunal, where the sins and the follies of a froward child may hope for pardon and forgiveness this side heaven, that tribunal is the heart of a fond and devoted mother.

MARRIAGES.

In Barre, Orleans county, April 25th, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. Ransom Turmicliffe, to Miss Frances Caswell, both of Barre.

In Elba, Genesee county, April 11th, by Rev. R. Tomlinson, Mr. Franklin Patterson, to Miss Caroline Humphrey, both of Elba.

In Skaneateles, February 25th, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. John H. Crawford, to Miss Emeline Hall.

In Nelson, March 1st, by the same, Mr. Edward Richardson, to Miss Amanda Medbury.

Same place and date, by the same, Mr. B. W. Richardson, to Miss Maryett Jones.

In Madison, March 14th, by the same, Mr. John Gilbert to Miss Lucy Way.

In Nelson, April 16th, by the same, Mr. Lonson Clarke, to Miss Lovica Burk.

DEATHS.

In Champion, April 2d, Almira, daughter of Loton Earl, aged 11 months and 20 days.

In Carthage, April 15th, William Henry, infant son of Theodore S. and Mary Ann Hammond.

Same place, April 24th, Josephine, only child of Samuel and Harriet Hopkins, aged 13 months.

Funeral services on each of the above three instances of early death, by the writer.

> "There is a world above,
> Where parting is unknown,—
> A whole eternity of love
> And blessedness alone;
> And faith beholds the dying here,
> Translated to that happier sphere." J Pritton, Jr.

In Hartland, on the — inst., George, only child of Wm. G. and Caroline Morse, (and grandson of Col. James Nelson, of Alexander, Genesee county,) aged nearly 21 months. Sermon by Br. Potter, from I Sam. iii: 18.

In Green, on the 16th inst., Mrs. Emma Alvira Gilman, wife of Mr. Jeremiah Gilman, and youngest daughter of Mr. William Stowel, aged 24 years.

She was a dutiful child, an affectionate wife, a kind parent, and a truly estimable woman. She was known but to be loved. She lived and died a firm and unwavering believer in the final holiness and happiness of the whole human family. For nearly a year had her health been declining, and she viewed and spoke of her approaching and expected exit with a mind calm as the unruffled waters when not a wave flits over their surface. She desired to live but for her friends and she resignedly fell asleep in Jesus. She has left two small children to feel the loss of one of the best of parents.—May God bless them, and all that are afflicted by this dispensation of his providence. Her funeral was attended on the 18th, in the Presbyterian meeting-house, by a large circle of mourners, friends and neighbors.—Sermon by J. T. G.

At Painted Post, Pa., April 29th, Mrs, Wiatt, wife of William Wiatt, Esq., and daughter of John Dodge of Harbor Creek, in the 26th year of her age. She lived and died in the faith of Universalism, which she adorned with a consistent practice. May God temper this dispensation of her husband, four helpless children, and other mourning relatives and friends.

PROSPECTUS OF

The Universalist and Ladies' Repository.

Volume VII.—Commencing June 15, 1838.

REV. HENRY BACON, EDITOR.

The Universalist and Ladies' Repository is now well known. Its character is established. The same management will continue to devote its pages to the great object ever held in view—the exhibition of the beauty of the Christian doctrine, the loveliness of the Christian character, and the worth and importance of the Christian hope. And these objects will be aimed at with the desire to draw out towards God and his truth the best of human affections, and animate the believer in pressing on in the path of Christian progress. It has been our endeavor to preserve a mild and affectionate tone throughout our work, remembering that it is especially designed for the perusal of females, and for their improvement and enjoyment. The past must speak for the future, and as the last volume was an improvement on the one that preceded it, we may hope that the next will excel the last. To this we pledge all our mental energies; and hope with the valuable assistance of a large list of contributors to satisfy the most sanguine expectations of our patrons.

☞ We look with anxiety to the exertions of our agents and ministering brethren for aid. We are grateful for their favors thus far; to many we are under great obligations, and earnestly hope for their continued effort.

☞ To the sisters of faith—our female friends, we anxiously look for aid in enlarging our list of real patrons. Some have kindly exerted themselves in our behalf and rendered us essential aid. We ask of each female subscriber to make the attempt to obtain one or more new subscribers, and do all they can to make the work known among their friends. We hope on the issuing of the first number of the new volume to find cause to express heartfelt gratitude for generous exertions on the part of our female friends. To all who have aided our success thus far we tender our grateful acknowledgments, and solicit a further continuance of their labor of love.

CONDITIONS.

The Universalist and Ladies' Repository will be published in Boston regularly on the 15th of every month, in a royal octavo form, forty pages, printed on fine paper, with clear handsome type, stitched and neatly covered, at the low price of two dollars per annum in advance—twenty-five cents added for every three months delay in payment.

 No subscription received for less than one volume. Eleven copies for twenty dollars.

Subscribers are expected to be punctual in their payments, and inform us of any change in place of residence without expense to us. If there are any who intend to relinquish their subscription at the end of the present volume, they are requested to inform us before the first of June, otherwise they will be considered subscribers for the seventh volume.

We shall send this prospectus to all our patrons in hope that each will use his or her influence to obtain at least one new subscriber. We offer to give a complete set of volume 4, to any one that will obtain four new subscribers. The volume will be sent by mail, or private conveyance, as may be desired.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. Grosh, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MAY 18, 1838. NUMBER 20.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LOOK UNTO JESUS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS."

Are there not many hundreds, perhaps some thousands of the readers, whose eyes will wander over these pages, who, on taking a retrospect of their lives, must acknowledge to themselves that their lives have been very unprofitable—that they are little advanced in likeness to God, in self-command, in power to overcome temptation, in ability to love God supremely, and to do on all occasions, and in the most trying circumstances, exactly as they would that men should do unto them? Are there not many thousands in our land, to whom a review of the time past of their lives, brings little source of satisfaction, but abundant causes of painful regret? Time misspent, opportunities of usefulness neglected, indolence indulged, temptations ingloriously yielded to, conscience unheeded and disobeyed, happiness personal, domestic, and social, unaugmented—are not such painfully frequent in the retrospect?

Let the time past, my brethren, have been sufficient, and more than sufficient, to have yielded ourselves as the slaves of such masters, and to have spent in sowing seeds that produce such bitter fruits. Let us consider, each one for himself, according to his peculiar circumstances, what our Father above doth require at our hands. Let us suppose ourselves on our death-beds, and let us clearly, dispassionately determine what will then yield us pleasing, consolatory reflections—what we will wish we had done at that hour of scrutiny and dismay, at that hour when most we need consolation. Let every reader determine this matter for himself—the objects desired, the resolutions for the conduct of life, will, though agreeing in the main, differ in each particular case. Let not many days pass—let not the next week find one of us, writer or reader, without distinct and worthy objects of exertion—without a sublime, exalted, and judicious plan for life. Then will not the scraps, the odds and ends of time, run to waste—then will we be happier in life as well as at death—then will we not feel, in the prospect of departure, such poignancy of regret, as caused Elizabeth, of England, at such a time, to exclaim, that she would give her kingdom for five minutes of time. Feeling the immense importance of having a high standard of excellence and attainments continually before us in life, I would implore every reader, as in the presence of "Our Father," to give no rest to his eyes, nor slumber to his eyelids, until he had well considered what he would wish he had done when he comes to die, and has resolved to do it. Is this worth doing? "I pause for a reply."

Meanwhile I would submit a few thoughts upon one most egregious error, which is apt to mingle its baneful consequences with our plans and our exertions. But for this hurtful sentiment, many a man would be actively, and usefully, and felicitously employed, who now languishes in idleness and discontent. But for this, there would not be so generally felt a disagreement between our powers and capacities, and the condition in which Providence hath placed us. But for this bane of life, the face of society and the world would be changed; instead of listlessness and stupidity, there would be intelligence and spirit; instead of lethargy and inaction, there would be ceaseless activity in well-doing; instead of hours of idleness and dissatisfaction in the bosom of families, there would be, around every hearth, and in every homestead of our land, a congregation of joyful faces, active intellects, peaceful spirits, and an abundance of useful and interesting conversation.* But for this curse of society, we would not witness so often the noble mind of man, from heaven and God descended, occupied only with the common engagements of life—with labor and business—with eating to please the palate, not healthily to sustain the body—with prating of news, and weather, and neighbors' faults—with bustle, and seeing of sights, and wonders, and new faces—with anxious endeavors after gain, restless huntings after place, or feverish enterprises to secure fortune or fame. But for this, many would not assume the place in our hearts which God should have undivided. I mean the universal straining after effect—the universal thirst for applause and renown—the ever unsatisfied craving after the notice and the praise of man. This, my brethren, I believe to be one of the worst, if not the very worst, of evils which afflict humanity. If you will suffer this subject to occupy your attention, I anticipate that the majority of you will come to the same conclusion. Oh! it is, indeed, a "sore evil," and of innumerable enjoyments doth it deprive the children of one who hath liberally provided for the happiness of His family.

Much might be said upon this topic, and I feel as if I could never be done talking about it, could I only banish this baneful error from the bosoms of myself, my friends, and brethren. But at present, I must restrict myself to one consideration, and that is, the example of Jesus. Yes, let one and all of us look unto Jesus. For we can not look with a sincere desire to learn of him, and to be conformed to him in our sentiments and our lives, without feeling this grossly erroneous sentiment condemned, and for a time at least, less powerful in its influence.

Let us look unto Jesus, first, in his temptation. He was tempted like as we are, and he felt the influence of this passion for display. Yes, he felt the temptation to exchange his humble and obscure condition, for one of royalty, empire, and dominion, wide as the Roman eagle then overshadowed. His weeds of poverty he was tempted to exchange for robes of royalty; his mechanic condition and calling, for the power and the honor of place and office; his being hampered and land-locked on every side, for freedom to work his will, unrestrained by the malice and the power of Pharisee or Roman. But when over against these were weighed the will of his Father, who had given him a work to accomplish, not of renown, but of superlative utility—when, by divine intuition, he beheld the peaceful and joyful fruits which for ages should spring up in the bosoms of his faithful followers—when he looked forward to the goal of his exertions, and beheld himself at the head of the human family redeemed from the power of sin and wrong-doing, and presenting these to his Father with joy, and delivering up the kingdom—when he saw this fruit of the travail of his soul, he was satisfied, and could bid the temptation away from him. Filling a large place in the eye of the world, sunk into insignificance, when compared with doing his Father's will, and receiving His approbation. From men he could expect no honor and no applause in his humble lot; but in the fulfilment of his vocation, he could enjoy the dignity of co-operation with God, of being One with the Wisest, Best, and most Blessed. Royalty lost its charms, and he felt it more than meat and drink to do his Father's will, and work out the work which He had given him to do. Could we but realise the presence of our Father, and feel the importance of the work of self-improvement and beneficence, which He has given us to do, we could, in a measure, prevail over like temptations. We could feel that our devotion and our service was due, not to procure the praise of men but the praise that cometh from God. Then would we feel less disinclination and less difficulty in complying with what is written—"Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

Again: let us look unto Jesus, as a Teacher come from God. In what light is the conduct or the principle to which we have had reference, viewed above? We will see by consulting the 6th chapter of Matthew. We there find ostentation and vanity strictly prohibited; and the principle of acting, in any case, from a desire to be seen of men, we there observe, receives a most sharp rebuke. We can almost persuade ourselves that Jesus would assume an aspect of scorn or keen irony, as he told his auditors concerning those who fasted, did alms, or prayed to be seen of men—"Verily I say unto you, they receive (not shall, but do receive) their reward." From on high doth God look down with anger and with sorrow on this love of ostentation and parade in our actions, for it mars our happiness which He desireth. But with favor doth our heavenly Parent behold every act of obedience to conscience, every sincere desire and endeavor to make our neighbors happier, every temptation resisted and overcome, when no regard is had to an admiring world, when no eye is thought of but His own. Be it remembered, then, that Jesus, our best and wisest Teacher, tells us that if we would be happy, we must not frame our conduct so as to receive the favorable notice of men, but the approbation of Him who judgeth righteous judgment, and who hath more valuable rewards to bestow than empty, unsatisfying applause.

Lastly: let us look unto Jesus in his life. We there behold no efforts after effect, no endeavors to parade or display his mighty powers, no hunting after applause. All his deeds of devotion, benevolence, and miraculous power, are performed in the spirit of modesty and reserve, with quietness and unobtrusiveness. To the reader I leave the carrying out into particulars of the two last views of Jesus. He may, from the records of the life of Jesus, collect several instances in which he condemned the love of applause, and commended virtuous deeds (as the widow's mite) done without the wish to be seen of men. In the actions of Jesus on record, may be found several instances where he shunned popularity, and courted that secresy which he recommended. To the reader's meditations I recommend this subject.

May we all derive from the considerations suggested, together with such as may arise in our own minds, lessons of wisdom and profit. When thinking of what we would wish we had done at seasons of reflection and review, and especially in the prospect of death, let us banish from our thoughts all desire of merely human notice and applause. In the humblest and most obscure conditions in life, we may find work enough to employ our utmost activity. While there remains a fault or a bad habit in ourselves—while there is not happiness, peace, and concord around us—while we love not God with all our soul, and strength, and might, and our neighbors' interests and enjoyments even as our own—we need never lack employment. Let us not, for a moment, indulge the fond dream that if we had a little more wealth, or were a little higher in station, we would then have a sphere of usefulness. A true disciple of Jesus will find verge and room enough in his own bosom, his home, and his circle of immediate neighbors. There, there is always work enough, and the best of work.

*Let the reader refer to the 22d number, or the 172d page of the last volume, and reflect upon the causes of the insipid manner in which the time is spent in many families, when alone. In society, with the eye of man upon us, it is very different, as Mrs. Parkes has there well depicted this lamentable exhibition of humanity.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

IMMORTALITY.

BY MRS. A. F. STEPHENS.

There is no theme which the human mind can contemplate, in heaven above, or on the earth beneath, so momentous, so highly interesting, as the glorious theme of immortality. "If a man die, shall he live again?" Is the brief moment of our life on earth, the dawn of an eternal day? Or does this taper of existence go out forever, at the touch of death? These are questions of infinite import, and thanks to the unbounded goodness of our God, they are not unanswerable.

Look at the vast and beautiful temple of nature, and behold on every side the impress of the infinite perfections of its divine Author, and the evidence and emblems of an hereafter state of existence. Yon brilliant orb of day, now departing from our hemisphere, sets, that it may rise again on the morrow, in resplendent and unfading glory—and the bright luminary of the night wanes, that it may wax again, and revisit our earth in full-orbed splendor and unrivalled beauty. The stars, those glittering jewels that bespangle the midnight heavens, have declined and disappeared from our view, but we know they are not lost; we shall see them all again; they will return, and beam upon us with undiminished radiance, and again shed over our souls their own calm and holy serenity. Do not the apparent declension and renovation of those bright luminaries of the sky, shadow forth man's resurrection from the gloomy night of the grave, to the light of an unclouded and perfect day?

> "What though no real voice nor sound > Amid those radiant orbs be found"— in reason's ear they whisper the joyous assurance that those bright and beautiful forms, which have arisen in our horizon, awhile illuminated our pathway, and gone down to the valley of the shadow of death, will rise again on a fairer morning, in more than pristine glory. The spirit, made in the image of its Creator, after having finished its short sojourn here below, will ascend to God who gave it, and breathe its native air in the far depths of yon bright heavens.

Hark! is that the sound of a minstrel's harp we hear, which comes so mournfully upon the evening breeze? No—it is the sad and chilling blast of stern and ruthless Winter. He comes "to hold his unrejoicing court," to reign triumphant. His destroying hand has dashed from its brow, and mingled with the dust, the beautiful chaplet with which Summer so lately crowned this fair earth. "Dead now the vegetable kingdom lies, and dumb the tuneful." Every thing around speaks of decay and death. But see—see! this dread monarch of the year, must now resign his sceptre. Spring returns in all her glory—nature is restored to life and beauty, and earth again puts on her loveliest array. And "shall man, alone, for whom all else revives, no resurrection know?" Is he, who alone can appreciate the bliss of being, doomed to float a brief moment upon its troubled wave, and then to sink forever into dark, unconscious nothingness? That Being whose almighty power spread out the heavens and called this fair earth out of chaos—whose infinite wisdom and unbounded goodness directed and influenced him in all the works of his hands—never gave his moral offspring hopes and desires vast and boundless as eternity—never capacitated them for endless progression in knowledge, holiness, and happiness, for assimilating, nearer and nearer, his own blessed perfections, and at the same time bestowed upon them merely an ephemeral existence! Impossible. "He hath done all things well," and these high and holy aspirations, these ardent longings of the soul after wisdom and happiness, which the world with all its boasted treasures, can never give, will certainly be satisfied.

But it is in the glorious Gospel of the Son of God, we see the bright, indubitable evidence that we shall exist beyond the grave. "Heaven and earth may pass away, but His word shall never pass away."

> "And in his blessed life I see the path,
> And in his great ascent, the proof supreme of immortality."

Jesus, the bright image of his Father's love, has opened wide the portals of the tomb, and presented to our enraptured view, a world of unfading bloom and immortal glory beyond. There is no need of the light of the sun, for the glory of God and of the Lamb, is the light thereof. The great and the good, the loved and lost of earth, kings and patriarchs, and seers and sages, all are there, accompanying the music of their golden harps, with the divine strains, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and glory, and blessing, for he has redeemed us to God, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." And there, too, (transporting thought!) are our own familiar friends, whose very existence was blended with our own, and whose departure from earth has left a lonely and an aching void in our hearts, which all the joys of time can never fill. Yes, there they are, unassailable by sorrow, pain, or death, blooming in immortal youth, chanting in angel strains, the anthem of redeeming love, and anticipating, with gratitude and joy unspeakable, the glorious consummation, when our heavenly Father, in the plenitude of his boundless love, will bring us and all his wandering children home to join their blessed communion, and unite in their everlasting songs.

> "Eternal life! O how refined
> The joys—the triumphs how divine—
> When all, in body and in mind,
> Shall in the Saviour's image shine.
> Tranquil and happy is the soul,
> Where dwells a hope so bright as this;
> We wish and long to reach the goal,
> And seize the prize of endless bliss

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A REASON OF OUR HOPE.

BY REV. S. P. LANDERS.

"And be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." 1 Peter iii: 15.

In compliance with the above requisition of the apostle, we design making a few brief remarks in favor of the great restitution, derived from the nature, attributes, and character of the Deity, the foundation of all true piety and religion.

God is acknowledged by all denominations, to be perfect and infinite in every attribute, that he is almighty in power, infinite in wisdom, and perfect in love and goodness. Now suppose a Being with these attributes, about to create a world, and people that world with myriads of intelligent creatures, and what is the plain and unavoidable conclusion to which all must come, with regard to the final destiny of that creation? The answer is, that it must be happiness. If we say that he wills this end, but can not effect it, then we impeach his power, and say that he is not almighty. If we say that he has power and wisdom sufficient to accomplish this end, but will not, then we deny his goodness, and God is not infinite in love. If we say that his power and goodness would dictate this end, but that he knows not the requisite means to accomplish it, then we deny the omniscience of the Deity. Admitting that God is infinite in these attributes, the unavoidable conclusion is, that universal holiness and happiness is true.

But for the sake of the argument, we will grant that all will not finally enjoy everlasting happiness. Now, it is generally admitted that God is omniscient, and consequently foreknew every thing from all eternity. I say this is generally admitted, but Dr. Adam Clarke and Mr. Bird have put forth arguments, (if so they may be called,) that would subject a child of fourteen to censure and ridicule. They contend that God can foreknow every thing if he pleases, but that he is not so disposed.

The Brahmins of the East have utterly abandoned the doctrine of divine prescience, because they can not reconcile it with the liberty of the will. Mr. Good, in his Book of Nature, says in relation to this subject, that "it is a shallow and impotent conclusion! Absurd admission of an hostility that has no existence; as though He who sees through infinite space is incapable of seeing through the brief duration of time; or as though, like Theseus in the Cretan labyrinth, the great Author of nature stands in need of a thread to guide him through the maze of his own creation, and depends upon every preceding event as a directing post to that which follows.....All nature is equally before him, in every point of space and every moment of eternity, and he who denies God to be every where, must deny him to be any where; unless he sees and knows every thing, he must see and know nothing." To the omniscient mind of the Deity, all past, all present, and all future are the same, he sees through every thing, and knows every event that ever has transpired, or ever will transpire. If any man be irretrievably lost, God must have foreknown that fact from all eternity. If God foreknew that a part would be lost before he created them, did he not create them for the very purpose and end which he foreknew? If such is to be the final condition of any, that end must have existed in his mind before creation, or else he could not have foreknown it; and if he foresaw this end or condition then it is impossible for any other termination to be brought about, consequently the damnation of a part was decreed before creation; for if we foresee that a certain act will transpire in a given time and place, that act must transpire in that given time and place, or else it is a certain evidence that we did not foresee that it would. In like manner, if God foreknew that certain individuals, to a certain number would be lost, those very individuals, and that very number which he foreknew would, must unavoidably be lost, or else he could not have foreseen that they would, and hence there is no salvation for them. So it is with those who are saved, their number is definite and their salvation certain, and hence we perceive that if it was from endless suffering that Jesus came to save mankind, his labors are useless and ineffectual, for the salvation of a part, and the condemnation of the remainder must then be the immutable decree of Jehovah.

But some attempt to make a distinction between the foreknowledge and decree of God, but I think that it has been shown that whatever is foreknown must come to pass, let the decree be what it may. But it never has been and it never can be shown that God foreknows one thing and decrees another exactly the reverse. What he foreknows, he decrees, and what he permits or decrees, that he also foreknows.

Then admitting that a part must be lost, the matter stands thus; God who is perfect in every attribute, infinite in love and goodness, decreed from the foundation of the world, that a part should live for the purpose of suffering the displeasure of an offended Deity, which displeasure was excited, because they answered the purpose and came to the end which he foreknew they would, and intended should. This is the awful conclusion to which we unavoidably come, if we admit that a part must be lost. The conclusion is true if the premises are true, but if they are false, the conclusion is, of course.

But I am met here with an objection from the Arminian, who says that man is a free agent, life and death are set before him, and he is at liberty to choose or refuse the offers of mercy, so that his future condition depends entirely upon the use he makes of his liberty or agency. This doctrine has a fair outside, but it is like the hypocrite, its appearances are deceptive.

I think that it has been shown that no event can happen contrary to the foreknowledge of God, consequently free agency, nor any thing else can bring about a different end from what God foresaw.—But we will, for the argument, grant that man is a free agent, at perfect liberty to choose or refuse. Now can we conceive it possible for him to choose or refuse contrary from what the Deity foresaw he would? Every intelligent mind must see that the omniscience of God would enable him to know what use man would make of his agency before he gave it to him, and he foreseeing this, man can not make any other use of his liberty than what was foreknown, and consequently if he is lost by having this liberty of the will, it must have been given him for that very purpose. If man can not choose contrary to what is foreknown, which is evident; and the Creator put life and death before man with a perfect knowledge that he would choose death, I would inquire, did he not give him this supposed liberty, for that very purpose?

To make this still more plain, if possible, let us suppose that a parent places a quantity of poison into the hand of a child, with a perfect knowledge that the child would destroy itself by it. Now can we make ourselves believe any thing else, than that the parent put the poison into the possession of the child, for the very purpose of destroying the child? The parent was as well satisfied that the child would terminate its existence by the ingredient, before he gave it to the child, as he was when he saw the fatal deed committed, and in such a case, I say that the parent gave the poison to accomplish the end which was accomplished. In like manner, if the Deity knew that man would destroy himself by his free agency, he must have given him that agency for that very purpose. The conclusion is unavoidable, and therefore Arminianism is nothing more or less than Calvinism under a new form.

Kind reader, we believing that the nature of the Deity is love, the above contains one reason why we believe that the doctrine of immortal suffering can not be true, and it also contains a reason of "the hope that is in us."

Prompton, Pa.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

VALUE OF WORKS TO GOD.

BY REV. W. ROUNSEVILLE.

"Can a man be profitable unto God!"—Job xxii: 2.

If there is one error greater than another, which has obtained among men, it surely must be that which supposes that the works of the creature can benefit the Creator.—That this idea is held by some professing the Christian religion, no one will be disposed to deny, when they take into consideration the fact, that the prevalent belief supposes that God will visit the children of men with the hottest wrath and indignation when they transgress the divine law. Now if this be the case, that the sins of mankind give rise to wrath and revenge, in the bosom of the Creator, it certainly follows, that the Creator can be rendered miserable by the conduct of the creature; for we can conceive of these passions in no possible manner separate from want and consequent unhappiness. The individual who cherishes these passions, is an unhappy man, and in the same ratio that they influence his mind, they detract from his enjoyment. And so, also, when we apply it to the Creator—in the same degree that he harbors in his mind wrath and revenge towards his earthly children, in the same degree his own happiness is lessened, and misery endured.

And if man can injure God by his evil deeds, it certainly is true that he can benefit him by his good conduct. If God is angry with him for his transgressions, he must be pleased with his obedience; and by walking in the commandments of God, he can confer a very essential favor upon him, inasmuch as by so doing, he removes the cause of wrath and revenge from the mind of the Creator, and sows therein the seed of contentment and peace. And in this manner, allowing the premises correct, man can confer a great favor upon God—"can be profitable to the Creator," and, indeed, has the sole control of the happiness of his God! If this position be correct, the Creator is wholly at the mercy of the creature he has made, and dependent upon him for all he enjoys.

But can we swallow such a mass of absurdity and nonsense? Should we not rather conclude with Elihu, "that our wickedness may hurt a man, and our righteousness may profit the sons of men," but "after we have done all, we are unprofitable servants" to God?

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SAYING AND DOING—TWO THINGS.

How frequently do we hear our neighbors exclaim, "how foolish these fellows have acted—how widely they have erred, how absurd their conduct on some of the every day transactions of life—how palpable, how plain the case—any man of common sense might have known better, I wonder how they happened to behave so improperly!" etc., etc.—Such strains salute our ears every hour of the day, among our neighbors and friends. I have long and deeply regretted this uncharitable, this unchristian spirit among brethren. Were this censuring, fault-finding disposition eradicated from the human bosom, how much discord and dissension would cease—and who can fathom the peace and happiness that would ensue! This temper is not only manifested by professed Christians, but by the self styled higher class.—Those upon whom Providence has lavished his bounties with an unsparing hand—those very persons, who have been highly favored of Heaven in the manifold blessings they enjoy;—instead of being grateful for these benefactions, are directly the reverse. They look down upon those in humble callings with contempt—they can not reconcile themselves to that incontestable truth, "that all men are created free and equal."—The very idea of being upon a state of equality with other men, creates unhappiness—the very thought is mildew to their souls. They divide heaven into apartments, which are numbered according to the rank, wealth, and grandeur of men here upon earth, and at death meted out respectively. This pharisaical character is infused into every grade of life—the merchant, mechanic, lawyer, and physician, all, all, are more or less tinctured with this disposition. This state of things is really lamentable—deplorable indeed. It would be well for those who are wise in their own conceit—who aspire to be that which they are not, to read the parable of the Pharisee and Publican, in Luke xviii: 10–14—not only read it, but to remember, and to understand it rightly. The truth is, men are prone to envy—prone to discover other men's faults, and condemn them, when they themselves are guilty of the same. They are righteous in their own eyes, and wise in their own imaginations. They turn not their bedimmed eyes within, to examine their hearts, to see if they are purged from all uncleanliness. Men's professions avail nothing; by their fruits, says our Saviour, shall ye know them. If men say they love Christ and all men as brethren, believe them not, unless in their daily walk they bring forth fruit accordingly—unless their actions correspond to their professions. Individuals may say they are honest, and at the same time endeavor to cheat their neighbor, or defraud their servant. They may profess to love all men—their neighbors as themselves—and immediately say all manner of evil against them—load them with contumely and reproach, and seek to aggrandize themselves upon the ruins of others, of which they are the promoters. So a man may say he is a Christian, that he (like the Pharisee) pays tythes, attends regularly at church, fasts, makes long prayers; yet what matters all this, if his conduct with men, is not in conformity therewith? 'Tis but as sounding brass. Those who are proud—who in their own estimation are above others—who assume a rank in society, to which their virtues do not entitle them, must be abused. Pure and undefiled religion, is benevolence and humility of heart, and uprightness of conduct. Those who possess this, though they may neglect what the world miscalls religion, will be justified in the sight of God. God is not deceived—He judges not professions, but the HEART. ASA.

South Venice, N. Y., April 9, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ANECDOTE.

"By their fruits ye shall know them."

A few years since, I called at the post-office for the Magazine and Advocate, when I was thus accosted by an old gentleman who had previously called for the same purpose, and was seated in the same room, in company with several other gentlemen, reading to them some very interesting article in the same valuable paper. "Johnny," (the appellation with which he always addressed me from my childhood,) "sit down here, if you have time, for I want to talk with you."

"With all pleasure, uncle J.; it is a long time since I saw you: and I shall be glad of a moment's conversation with you."

"Well," said he, "Johnny, it gives me great pleasure to see you engaged in this good cause, and I hope you will be able to devote more time to it, and you will be not only useful to others, but you'll be useful to yourself. You are young now, and have just come upon the stage of action, and if you persevere in this good cause, you will glide along smoothly through life; and when your head is blossoming for the grave, and its fruits are almost ripe, as mine are, you will look back on a life of usefulness with pleasure, and not have to regret, as I do, that your days have been spent in useless sports, or trifled away in unreal pleasure. Oh! if I had been acquainted with this glorious faith in my youth, I never should have led such a life as I have; and when I think of it, it grieves me to the heart. But I mean to attend to it better hereafter, for I don't wish to dishonor so glorious a cause." And the old man did reform, although he is not yet exactly what he ought to be.

But to return to the subject. At this crisis, in came an elderly gentleman, (if I may be allowed the expression,) who had just left the bar-room with as much alcohol in his head as he could conveniently carry, and that not without reeling, and who, by the by, had but a few weeks previously been converted, alias, perverted, by the revival machines which were then in use and successful operation in this country; and I believe he had joined the Methodist society. Being as zealous as he was drunk, he soon observed the subject of our conversation to be religious principles. He staggered along, and abruptly seated himself by me, giving me a push in the side with his elbow, and obtruding his face into mine, said, in an insignificant tone, "Mr. S., if I believed as you do, I would thank any man to take a handspike and knock my (using an oath) brains out." Knowing him full well, I strove to evade him by leaving my seat; but he followed me up, pushing me in the side as before, and repeating the above profane expression, and others of the same kind, saying, "Mr. S., if I knew all men would be saved, I would kill every one I could, and then kill myself." Finding it no easy task to get rid of him, I asked him if he thought he would be saved? "O yes," said he, "I believe I shall, if I hold out faithful to the end." Well, then, you think you will be saved, and I think all men will be. Now suppose you go out into the street and let me meet you, and "with a handspike knock your brains out?" "Oh, no," said he, "I am not fit to die now."

Query—If, after having been "converted" by Partialism, he was "not fit to die," how much preaching of the doctrine of endless misery would it take to make a sober man of him? He is unreclaimed as yet. JOHN.

Whatever we owe, it is our part to find where to pay it, and to do it without asking, too: for whether the creditor be good or bad, the debt is still the same.—Seneca.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ORDINANCES, ETC.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

[The following should, perhaps, have accompanied the article on the decline of Universalism, a few weeks ago; but it seemed to me to relate more to the proposed cures than supposed causes, that I here give it a separate place, under a different title. I need not say that I differ some from the writer in particular portions of his views of ordinances, though I agree with him in his toleration of all who differ from us in opinion. The more I hear our brethren contend for forms and ceremonies, the more I become satisfied that they are sacrificing the spirit in a struggle for the appearance, and are losing the substance in debating about a shadow. However, they who desire or need them, are welcome to them, only let us who care not for them, do without them, without regard to expediency, or others' views of duty. A. B. G.]

A number of articles have lately appeared in the Magazine and Advocate representing our cause in a deplorable state, especially in the western part of New-York; and a number of things are suggested for the purpose, doubtless, of removing the evil and promoting the truth. I entertain no feelings for my brethren who have written, but those of fraternal friendship and affection; but still, I am inclined to think that some of them are differing in part from the spirit and temper of the Gospel.

The kingdom of God is unlike all other kingdoms that have ever been established, since it regards particularly spiritual things, and is governed by a law of mind and motive. The subject of society or church organization, should always be contemplated and acted on with special reference to the nature and design of this kingdom. It should be our aim to make the concerns of our denomination accord with the internal signification of the Gospel, since it is not now an external kingdom, but a dispensation of truth and benevolence which is established in the human breast for the government and happiness of the world. It is not of as much importance to regard the outward appearance, as the enjoyment of spiritual life and the principles of practical goodness.

It was necessary, under the former dispensation, that an external economy should be established; but this was for the grand purpose of introducing mankind into the spirituality of a better dispensation. Now, since we are brought to enjoy the substance, it is but a matter of expediency for us to use the shadow. It may be absolutely essential in many cases to continue the ordinances of the church, as a means of induction into that perfect freedom and comfort which the glorious Gospel is calculated to afford. But even in these cases, they are tending to consummate that inward economy which is "righteousness, peace and joy in the holy Ghost." It is perhaps the case, that I go still further in this matter than the rest of my brethren. I consider baptism not only a duty with some, but also a saving ordinance. It is a means of saving them from that condemnation and unhappiness which results from an omission of duty; for I doubt not that some believe it a sacred duty. With such a view of the subject, I can heartily unite with my brethren and sisters in the observance of outward rites. It would be a difficult matter for us to adopt an arbitrary plan of operation which would be suitable for the whole mass of mankind. The truth is, we are differently constituted and accustomed. I once knew a ministering brother who became an acceptable preacher, in consequence of observing the following great secret:—First, meekness and humility. Second, a short and studied introduction.—Third, a perfect knowledge of the stopping place. I believe this plan of operation was detected by himself, and certain I am, that he was never successful when he departed from it. It was his opinion, at first, that all might, without difficulty, be governed by the same rules; but in this he was much mistaken, for I have since known an excellent brother, who was, and is, a very successful preacher without either, apparently.

The spirit of God by which the Bible was dictated, seems to have designed that we shall receive the advantages of truth by the exercise of our reasoning powers; but it strikes me that this can not be done effectually by the use of outward rites continuously. Externals, in the commencement, were indispensable to the permanent establishment of Christianity, but a living faith can by no means depend upon their continuance, for this "is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen." The mind must have something to labor upon, in order to have spiritual health and strength; but it is generally admitted that a routine of externals tends, in some measure, to paralyze our moral strength. It is wisely observed by Combe, that, "Active faculties are fountains of pleasure."

I have found it difficult to resist the conviction, that ordinances and other externals, as a test of fellowship, must operate as a barrier to the real enjoyment of practical piety. Very many of those who observe them consider this requisite to become a true disciple of Christ, and consequently those who may feel it a duty to depart from their particular views, are looked upon as having no faith which can be tested on the ground of obedience. The consequence is, "it freezes the genial current of the soul," and tends to disconnect society. We can not possess the temper of our divine Master, while we are disposed to neglect or abuse a brother for an honest difference of opinion; and though he may give the Bible a different construction from what we are willing to receive, we have no right to denounce him as an infidel while he professes to receive it as a communication from God. For a number of years I have considered it highly important that no test of fellowship should be established among us, but that of moral character and a belief of the Bible. And I am strongly inclined to the opinion, that our respectability and strength as a denomination, may be referred to the tolerant spirit of our ministry and organization. We can not drive men to embrace, even "the glorious Gospel of the blessed God;" but it is an easy matter to draw them by the power of truth and the cords of love.

It may be that Universalism is on the decline; but it will not answer to judge in this affair from the outward appearance, since it is an established principle, that mankind may appear beautiful without when they are very impure within. We should endeavor to judge from that disposition of benevolence which flows out from a knowledge of the truth, and not from that garb of morality which is used by many to conceal their true character. There is verily, an over ruling Providence, and if we do our duty faithfully, the Lord of the harvest will bless us with abundant success. If we fail not to manifest the virtues and graces of Jesus Christ, the divine principle of the Gospel will continue to exercise a powerful influence upon the mind, till at length we shall all be stripped of that exclusive spirit which has grown from a misapprehension of outward forms.

There is much depending on the preaching and practice of our ministering brethren. The people will do their duty, if the preachers will feed them with knowledge and understanding. Before there can be much unity of sentiment and feeling among the laity, it must be cultivated among the clergy. It is quite "too much like the orthodox" for our ministers to fall out with each other and follow "after the rudiments of the world and not after Christ." The reformation of the world is an object of vast magnitude, and it must, like every thing else in the economy of God, be accomplished in a gradual manner. It will not answer for us to get discouraged because there is still a trifling difference of opinion among us with respect to present and future operations, for we have hardly settled the mighty question with our opposing brethren, whether the building will ever be finished.

One thing more I must not forget to mention In all the communications I have seen on the subject of ordinances, more emphasis has been placed on the observance of the eucharist than on the rite of baptism; but why should this be the case, since baptism—of some kind—is the only mode of induction into the kingdom of God? I do think that baptism is more essential than the ordinance of the Lord's supper; and the same may be said of that "circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ." In order to enjoy or experience salvation from sin, we must be buried with Christ in baptism, and "rise with him through the faith of the operation of God who has raised him from the dead." Then will all our trespasses be forgiven, and the hand writing of ordinances be blotted out and nailed to the cross.—If we dwell upon the eucharist more than baptism, will it not look some like an appearance kept up for the purpose of catching the "orthodox"? I am convinced, however, that our denomination would double in one year if such a course was adopted; or even if we were willing to throw a shade of uncertainty over the destiny of our race.

Ohio City, March, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, MAY 20, 1838.

JOHN XIV: 15-31.

Those readers of these expository and practica remarks, who make a study of the passages selected, before the day which brings to them these weekly remarks, will already have discovered that in this chapter is commenced the narration of that consolatory and farewell address which Jesus delivered to his eleven disciples, after having partaken with them, for the last time, of the paschal supper. These inquiring and diligent students of the New Testament will have discovered, from the tenor of his conversation at supper, that the disciples of Jesus must have felt fearful forebodings, as if some great, yet indistinct evil were about to befall them. Jesus spoke to them plainly enough concerning his death, yet they were so prepossessed with the idea of his yet becoming the king of the Jews, that they would not understand his meaning. Jesus in this valedictory discourse will be found endeavoring to infuse into their minds more exact ideas of their real situation, of the reality and causes of this separation from them, of their duties, labors, and sufferings in his cause after his removal to the Father, and, finally, to impart to them such consolation and support as their destitute and orphanized case required. "Let not your hearts be troubled" he says, but "let it comfort you to reflect that I have only gone before you to my Father's house, and shall return to receive you thither, that we may at last be always together. Still, however, their minds were not perfectly clear. Thomas, and Philip, and Judas, the brother of James, put questions to him which showed that they were yet groping in the dark. He explained himself to them; reminded them how dear he was to the Father, and that therefore they should rather rejoice that he was going to Him; assured them that they should be objects of the Father's love and favor, and be blessed by the gift of the Holy Spirit."

Having discovered such to be the purport of the discourse contained in this and the two subsequent chapters of John's memoirs, the intelligent student is prepared to read it consecutively, or dwell upon any detached portions of it. With such a reader, let us pause, for a little, upon a few of the sentiments contained in that part of this chapter which we have selected for this week's meditation.

The attentive reader of this paragraph will find the sentiment expressed in the 15th verse repeated twice more, before the conclusion of the chapter. Hence he will, very logically, infer that our Saviour was desirous of impressing this sentiment very deeply upon the minds of his disciples.—

Very probably the disciples, although they did not understand clearly the discourse of their Master, could, notwithstanding perceive that he was about to leave them; and, the prospect of thus being left alone amidst enemies and seekers after their life, it is likely that they were dissolved in tears, or were otherwise giving vent to their sorrow and affection for him. This Jesus seizes upon as a suitable opportunity of teaching and inculcating upon them what are the best, the highest, the only proofs of affection and love to him. All other symptoms of attachment to Jesus and his cause are deceitful, are equivocal; living according to his precepts and example, is the only decisive proof of being his disciples. Men, it has been said with much truth and in correspondence with this doctrine of Jesus—men will talk for religion, will write for it, fight for it, die for it, do any thing but live for it. Ay, this is the hardest task; this the severest, most searching trial of a man's love for Jesus and his religion. It is even easier to be a martyr, and triumphantly bear oneself against the severest tortures, than to conform one's conduct to the requisitions of the Divine will, or to those of the monitor within. To assist us in maintaining this truth—this all-important truth—in recollection and in operation upon our lives, let us frequently meditate upon the 15th, 21st, 23d, and 24th verses of this chapter, together with such passages as convey the same lesson, to which we may be directed by a Bible with well-selected parallel passages.

It is probable that many of our readers will have remarked for themselves, before this article meets their view, that Jesus adds a consolatory promise to every statement of the above important sentiment, that is, three times in the course of this paragraph. He makes the retention of his doctrine and commandments, and a conscientious regulation of the conversation and life thereby, a condition, yea, the infallible fountain of a benefit, a greater than which the bereaved disciples for support in their present circumstances, could not have conceived or requested. To perceive this, it is only necessary for the diligent student of the New Testament to make an effort of imagination, and represent to himself the condition of mind which was certainly the most prevailing with the disciples at the prospect of being separated from their Leader, Guide, and Support. The disciples were, generally, simple, unlettered men, little versed, probably, in the arts, of deceits, policy and manœuvering of the leading men of their times. In every point of view they must have regarded Jesus as a very superior being, but probably nothing gave them a stronger idea of his wisdom and superiority, than his frequently outwitting and baffling his opposers in their attempts to ensnare him. Probably one of the first anxieties which beset their bosoms when they came to understand plainly that their Guide and Master was about to leave them, was this—what shall we do, what can we do against the opposers and the enemies of the very name of Jesus? Accustomed to be led and assisted by him with marvellous sagacity, the disciples must have felt that they would be without him, wholly incompetent to assert his claims against such a current of malice, stratagem, and deceit as they had seen him stem and turn aside. They felt, probably, that they were about to be left as sheep without a shepherd—poor, defenceless victims.

To banish such depressing fears, Jesus assures them that not one of them who truly loved him and kept his commandments, would be left alone and defenceless. As they had been accustomed to receive from him assistance and help, there would be sent to them from on high, help and assistance* in another form which should dwell within them and be at hand in every exigency.—One of our young friends, in a letter to his father, states some circumstances which incline him to think that this Paraclete—this assistant—usually styled the Holy Ghost or Spirit, and very generally supposed to be a third person in the mysterious Godhead—is none other than Jesus himself. As the idea is probably new to most of our readers, they will, perhaps, be excited to inquire into its truth for themselves. We shall, therefore, merely state that what is said, in verse 16, to be "another Comforter," or assistant as we would render it, is mentioned in the same connexion, in verse 21, as a manifestation of Jesus himself, to them, and, in verse 23, as the Father and Jesus having come and taken up their abode with the true disciples. When we have given our supreme love to God and to that cause for which he raised up Jesus, are not our hearts as a renewed and prolific soil in which all Christ-like virtues spring up vigorously, bringing to our bosoms a consciousness of communion, of harmony, of oneness (if not too bold an expression) with Christ and with God?† Those who have so felt, will have a reason for coinciding in opinion with our young friend which the world to whom Jesus does not manifest himself, can not have.—So interesting, so endearing a topic as communion with Christ and with God, would tempt us to dwell "forever" upon it; but we must forbear to expatiate. We can not close, however, without this fervent prayer—May hundreds of our readers partake more and more of this invigorating and peace-bestowing consciousness of harmony and communion with the Father of their spirits, and the Captain of their salvation! P. P.

* The original word paracletos has been variously rendered—Comforter, Advocate, Monitor, Teacher, Intercessor; but the most judicious and learned interpreters prefer the sense of Assistant, Helper, to every other. This rendering they observe, is appropriate to all the passages of the New Testament in which it occurs, which can not be said of any of the other interpretations; and it is readily perceivable that this gives the most consistent sense in the present passage. P. P.

† As further proof that Jesus, himself, (or in other words, the presence of Jesus in his instructions and example,) is the Paraclete, Comforter, or Assistant, I would add, that it is said in 1 John ii: 1, that "if any man sin, we have an Advocate (Paracleton) with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous"—hence that the beloved disciple expressly recognizes Jesus as this Paraclete, Comforter, or Assistant. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CANARY BIRD.

With a heart light and free as the bound of the antelope over the green carpeted hills, did I wend my way to a friend's abode, to meet a party of social intimates. Oft had we met and supped the sweetest draught from the cup of social intercourse, without finding one bitter dreg at the bottom. It was not the boisterous laugh, or the maniacal shout of conviviality, that gave zest to our intercourse. O no! it was something purer, holier, than the "Io Bacchi! Io Bacchi!" of the drunken reveller—it was the free communion of kindred hearts, that knew not of malice toward fellow-men, or of jealousy toward prosperous neighbors. Each at peace with his own bosom, smiled to see others smile—nor sought to divert, nor entertain, by arraying his neighbor's faults or tarnishing his neighbor's fair name. We were wont to gossip as buoyant hearts love to gossip, on the passing and the past, and wander with our erratic imaginations into the untrod future; but O! we never gossipped over other's faults. If a rebuke was ever heard, it was the soothing chide of love, not harsh and disconsonant censure.

I wound my way on to meet once more this social band—happy, because I was going to the abode of happiness. The stars smiled, too, and as I neared the house of entertainment, the evening zephyr whispered over the strings of the wind harp—"how beautiful!" It was a happy eve. Every heart seemed a centre from which emanated beams of social converse—every countenance glowed with intelligence, and every eye was eloquent! "It is good for us to be here," thought I.

Never shall I forget one little girl, whose prattle told she was too young to be else than innocence. I looked upon her, and I could not but think of our beloved Saviour, as he said, "suffer little children to come unto me.....for of such is the kingdom of heaven." The social group looked on the little fondling, and what heart so cold as not then to beat with pleasure?—for on the finger of this gentle prototype of heaven, sang a Canary bird! The joy was too exquisite for utterance, and the zephyr played again on the strings of the harp—"how beautiful!"

The warm blaze was glowing in the ample, old fashioned fire place—how social such a fire place!—the bird sang again, then, glancing around on the circlet of happy faces, its tiny wings beat the ambient air—when lo! it was lost in the scorching flames!—One wild shriek, and sadness shrouded those faces of late so smiling! From the hot embers was drawn the smouldering corse of the Canary bird—its plumage was gone—one gentle gasp, and—it died! I marked the crystal tear drops as they fell from the eyes late so eloquent. Ah! now they were more eloquent still—they were eloquent with grief!—it was the eloquence of sympathy pleading for a poor Canary bird!—That little girl—O, how she did grieve! And on stern man, too, was left the impress of sympathy!

We are sympathetic here—shall we be less so in heaven? Shall we there cease "to feel for others' woe?" Can the fond mother, there smile to see her offspring writhing in never, never ending anguish? O no, that creed can not be of Heaven which teaches thus! Rather let my spirit be like the breath of the poor Canary bird—fading, vanishing with the plumage of the corse!

Union College, February, 1838. KAPPA.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor.
Revs. D. SKINNER and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 18, 1838.

PUNISHMENT.—NO. 1

There are some arguments in favor of making all punishments emendatory, mild and humane, yet certain, which though well known and often urged by philanthropists, have not yet made that general and deep impression on the public mind, which is necessary in a popular government, to ensure their adoption in public practice. The criminal is still our brother or sister—still a human being, possessing all the faculties of our common nature, but deadened, paralyzed, or perverted by some error in early education, or by being placed in circumstances unfavorable for their full development or proper exercise. This should never be forgotten. The humanity in man can never be restored to its full and proper action, by treating the criminal as less than a man—by withdrawing all confidence and respect from him—by appeals solely to his animal nature—by considering him as a wholly brutified being. All such treatment, formerly sedulously followed and yet continued in to many cases, can only brutify the man still more. It may restrain him by fear of physical suffering, as a dog is restrained from indulging in theft by fear of the rod, but it never can and never will infuse self-respect into the criminal's bosom—it will never create in him a respect for the rights and feelings of others—it never will work by love to the purification of the heart.

Nor is this all. The relatives and friends of the criminal will never be willing to have him punished, unless they can see some good arising from it, greater than merely the good of some unknown individual in community. We naturally feel more for those nearly allied to us, and the well known, than for the aliens in blood—the stranger. And to consign the nearest and dearest over to a punishment considered wholly revengeful and retaliatory—one that degrades instead of elevating them, and regards them as aliens to humanity, instead of treating them so as to render them more worthy our love and care, must ever be, and is extremely repugnant to every pure and holy feeling of the heart. In this way the philanthropic, the relative and the friend are arrayed against the law, instead of in its favor. Compromises for crimes take place—the criminal is suffered to escape and his iniquities are winked at, until growing bold by impunity, he waxes worse and worse, and an outraged community rising in wrath demands his severe punishment. And this general demand, made in a spirit of wrath rather than of goodwill to the criminal—out of a desire for revenge rather than of reformation, again finds to confirm the improper and injurious error entertained by community at large, and especially by the unhappy criminal himself. This is a sad, but a correct picture. Can not some lights be introduced into it? Is there no way of so ameliorating punishment—of so directing its infliction—as to enlighten the public mind on the subject, and bring not only the friends of the criminal to consent to his being punished, but also, the criminal, himself, to acquiesce in it? I think there is—experience on a small but correct scale, proves that there is.

I will not insist that the whole error arises out of false views drawn from a corrupt and erroneous theology—though I do sincerely believe that Partialism is the corrupt fountain where all these erroneous views have their birth. But be that as it may, nearly all Christians unite with us, in desiring that punishments should have as their principal object, the reformation of the punished. All would rather that the criminal were made a good man—a benefit to himself and to society at large, than to have him continued a bad man—a curse to society, a pest to himself. In this, every Chrstian heart is agreed; and this agreement is as much as we can expect, at present—as much, perhaps, as is necessary for all practical purposes. Let us all, then, unite in endeavoring to spread light on this important subject. The old systems of severity and cruelty—of distrust and cunning, have been tried long enough, and their inefficacy has long been apparent to every careful observer. Let another plan be tried—a plan as nearly opposite the former as circumstances will admit. Let the criminal be looked upon as a brother, who, for his own good, as well as public safety, requires correction and instruction. He has believed that by wrong doing he might advance his own interests, and in so believing he has grievously erred, not only in practice, but in theory, also. He needs instruction on this point—let him have it, from the Word of God, from nature, from reason, enforced by illustrations drawn from numerous examples around him, and by the bitter though scarcely observed lessons of his own experience. He believed that the chances for escape from punishment in this world, were far greater than the chances of incurring it—and, as for the punishments of another state, he believes they can easily be escaped by timely repentance and conversion, all of which he intends to go through before he dies. Of this latter I choose now to say nothing—but in the former he is grievously deceived. Let him be taught so. Let every teacher of religion and morality—every instructor of the rising generation, unite with revelation, sound reason and philosophy in demonstrating that there is no chance about it. Punishment for sin is inevitable in the very nature of man—in the very constitution of the material and spiritual universe. When man can put his naked flesh into the fire without being burned, he may sin without being a sufferer by it. When the musical ear can delight in horrid and discordant sounds, or the other senses and faculties can receive pleasure from what is most abhorrent to them, then may man experience lasting pleasure, and avoid every evil feeling arising from acts opposed to his moral nature, and contrary to the moral government which God has established in the universe wherein we live. In hundreds of ways, and by arguments and proofs the most incontrovertible of any in the world of mind, may these facts be taught to all, and become a principle as well established in their minds, as, that fire yields warmth, and food, nourishment, to their frames. But this may suffice for one article, I will resume the subject in another number. A. B. G.

THEOLOGY

Is an important and interesting study. It embraces vast themes, intimately associated with our moral nature, and our welfare. It is a delightful field, containing productions of varied beauty and flowers of every hue, and it is pleasant to the eye and purifying to the heart, to roam and expatiate among them. All other studies are connected with it, are indeed branches of it, and acquire bloom and verdure when viewed in reference to it.—The whole circle of the sciences is tributary to it, and to it they bring their divers and wonderful treasures.

It speaks to us on every page of nature, and is the subject of revelation. It acquaints us with the greatest and best of beings—God. It teaches us our relation to him—our dependance upon him—the requirements of his government and the motives why we should obey them. It teaches us our duties to our fellow-men, our kindred with them, our portion and our destiny. It enlightens the erring—comforts the sorrowful and despairing—directs the penitent, warns the sinful and rolls away the clouds which darken and trouble our mental vision.

We fear that the study of natural and revealed theology is too much neglected. It is supposed to be, by some, a dull, abstruse study, to be pursued only by the minister or the man of letters and that it is a thing with which others have no concern. This is a mistake. It is not a dull and abstruse study—it should not be confined to a few. It is a pleasing, a glorious study, and will be found interesting and important to all.

We are not opposed to the occasional reading of works of fiction. Some of the best writers of this generation, have employed their talents in writing books of this kind. They contain faithful and powerful delineations of character, and many valuable morals may be derived from their pages. But they are calculated for our times of relaxation, and should not be allowed to occupy those moments which should be devoted to superior and more important affairs. We require loftier powers of action than these give us. The nerves of our intellectual and moral nature need to be moved by stronger energies and to be braced by sterner exercise, than these afford. We do not object, then, to the reading of these works, occasionally. It is with them as with many other things, the abuse, not the use, which we reprobate. But we fear that too many engage their attention with these and other of the lighter productions of literature to the neglect of the solid, the useful and the important! This is wrong—this is absolutely perverting our intellectual and moral advantages.

There are many who have to toil day after day, and who have but a little time to devote to the cultivation of their minds. These should seldom if ever devote that moiety to novel reading. There are things of deeper, and weighter interest, which call for their attention, and they should be regarded. And those who have more leisure, should not abuse their privileges. Their mental and moral advancement should be in proportion to their circumstances.

To all, then, we would say, neglect not the study of theology. We do not mean that we wish you to pore over the pages of the Fathers, the subtleties of the schoolmen, and the metaphysical and abstruse productions of later divines. But we mean by the study of theology, the study of God, his attributes and laws—our relations to him and our fellow-men—our destiny and our duty. This we may do easily and conveniently. The two great volumes of nature and revelation are spread open to our eyes. To peruse these correctly we have many and valuable helps. There are works which can be cheaply obtained, which will aid us in our researches.—Among them, we would mention Paley's Natural Theology, Godwin against Atheism, Combe on the Constutution of Man, and Wilkamson's Argument for Christianity. The attentive and reflective perusal of works like these is what we mean by the study of theology.

In reading the Scriptures also, we may avail ourselves of the aids of good commentators and translators, like Campbell, Wakefield, Clarke and Macknight. There are other works which supply a valuable place in the study of theology—such as Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, Jahn's Biblical Archæology, Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. Now there are long Winter evenings and leisure hours of other seasons, which might be profitably devoted to the reading and the study of books like these. If one individual does not feel himself able to obtain al these books, several may be, and let them unite together and hold them in common, a library to which each may have access.

If we wish to be able to give to every man a reason for the hope that is within us—if we wish to become close and independant thinkers—if we wish to be guided by our own reason and by the spirit of God—if we wish to defend ourselves against, and to combat the errorist, the infidel and the skeptic, we should be well acquainted with theology. And then there is an enjoyment, in having some great end in view, to which we apply and bend all our energies and our acquirements.

That end should be the noblest in the grasp of our comprehension, and that is, improvement in divine science. Upon this object, all our affections and all our knowledge should have a bearing. When we read the records of history, the annals of nations, and conquerors, and kings, and great men, the voice that comes to us from the ashes of the mighty, should teach us a moral lesson. In perusing the works of the poet, the statesman and the philosopher, we should glean and preserve the moral. In culling a flower from the field or an herb from the mountain, we should read a moral. In the incidents of every day life—the tear of the mourner, the smile of the glad hearted, and in all the operations of human passion, and emotion, and circumstances, we should learn the deep moral which they teach. True theology is the combination of morals, and hence every new moral will be adding to our improvement in theological knowledge.

One who pursues this course, will be the Lord's freeman, walking abroad in the majesty of intellect in the heritage which God hath given him. To him every thing has a lesson and an improving efficacy. To him, the gush of the golden sunlight is no trivial occurrence, and "the rich melody of birds" awakens answering music on the deep harp chords of his soul. E. H. C.

THE RECORD.

New Preachers.—Br. George G. Strickland, formerly of Greenfield, Mass., now of Sandy Bay, has commenced preaching, says Br. C. Spear, to good acceptance. Br. W. F. Teudon, a local preacher among the Wesleyan Methodists of New-Brunswick and Newfoundland, has lately commenced preaching the Gospel of universal grace in Halifax, Nova Scotia. Br. B. H. Davis, formerly of Kentucky, and who has been pursuing his studies with Br. W. S. Balch, of Providence, R. I., has lately commenced preaching in that city, to good acceptance. Br. William Cabbe, who pursued his preparatory studies under the direction of Br. Whittaker, of Hudson, has also commenced well his labors in the ministry of reconciliation. Br. A. A. Mixer, Principal of the Scientific and Military Academy in Unity, N. H., commenced his labors as a minister of the Prince of Peace universal, in Chester, Vt., on the 15th ult. Brs. W. H. Griswold and H. B. Soule, late students in the Clinton Liberal Institute, have commenced laboring as ministers of the Saviour of the world, in Oxford, Chenango county. They are both young men of excellent moral characters, and sound minds, and already preach to good acceptance. Here are seven new laborers since our last—God be praised for the increase!

Installations.—Br. H. Bacon, late of East Cambridge, was installed as pastor of the society in Haverhill, Mass., on the 18th ult. Sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner. The next day, Br. E. N. Harris, late pastor of the Baptist society in Malden, was installed as pastor of the Universalist society in Methuen, Mass. Sermon by Br. T. Whittemore. The ordaining council after a full examination of all the charges circulated against this Brother (since his conversion,) pronounced them false. Br. H. Jewell was installed pastor of the society in South Reading, Mass., (an interesting village 9 miles North of Boston,) on the 2d inst. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou. Br. Jewell's labors have been greatly blessed in that place during the past year.

REMOVALS.—Br. R. Tomlinson, of Rochester, has received and accepted an invitation to settle with the society in Ridgeway, Orleans county, at which place he should be addressed in future. Br. Alanson Kelsey, late of Stafford, has removed to Pavilion, Genesee county, where he wishes to be addressed in future. Br. E. Gage has removed from Northfield, Wayne county, to Lima, Washtenaw county, Mich., and desires to be addressed accordingly. Br. G. K. Shaw has removed from Hiram to Dixfield, Me. Br. H. Ballou, 2d, from Roxbury (where he has resided since 1821,) to Medford, Mass. Br. J. C. Waldo, from Lynn to Woburn, Mass. Br. C. Woodhouse from West Brattleborough, Vt., to Westmoreland, N. H. Br. B. B. Hallock from New-Haven, Conn., to Lisle, Broome county, N. Y. Br. Alfred Peck has left Fulton, but has not yet settled down in a permanent residence. Br. H. Chaffee has taken charge of the society in Stafford, Conn., vacated by the removal of Br. J. H. Willis to Petersham, Mass. Br. L. Maynard has taken the pastoral charge of the society at Great Plains, Hingham, Mass., so that there are now two Universalist societies in that town. Br. S. Miles has removed to Perrinton, Monroe county, where he will labor half the time the ensuing year, and wishes to be addressed accordingly.

NEW SOCIETIES.—A new society was organized in Sturbridge, Mass., on the 4th inst., of about thirty members. Another was legally organized in Salina, in this State, on the 13th of December last, under the pastoral labors of Br. S. Barnes. It consisted of twenty-five members; and we hope it will go onward increasing in numbers and moral power. The Star in the West says that new societies have lately been formed in Chardon, Dayton, Batavia, and Franklin, Ohio. Another was formed in Barre, Mass., April 10th, and resolved to have preaching half the time—and another has just been formed in Southbridge, Mass.

NEW CHURCHES.—A church was lately formed in Weston, Vt. Br. W. Skinner officiated. Another was formed, not long since, in Chardon, Ohio. Br. Hoag labors there one-fourth of the time.

NEW MEETING-HOUSES.—One will be erected this Summer in Elizabethtown, Va.—another, to hold a congregation of 2000 persons, is being erected by the second society in Lowell, Mass., under the pastoral labors of Br. James Thompson. The first society in that place, under the pastoral care of Br. T. B. Thayer, is also prospering. Eight years ago Universalism had hardly a name to live in Lowell.

EDITORIAL CHANGES

Before another paper goes to press, Br. E. H. Chapin will probably be on his way to the South, where he will remain, in company with Br. T. P. Abell, late of Perry, Genesee county, preaching in Richmond, Va., and vicinity, during Br. Skinner's sojourn in this region. Br. Chapin will continue to write for the paper as heretofore, and his place as Assistant Editor will be supplied by Br. A. R. Bartlett, whom we cordially commend to our readers, and to the Universalist public in this vicinity, as a new laborer in the ministry, of excellent character both moral and mental. Br. Skinner, also, we trust, will be able to write more frequently for the Editorial department of the paper than he has done for some time past.

One word more. Brs. Chapin and Abell go to the South at the request of Br. Skinner. We commend them with especial earnestness to our Southern brethren, as worthy of all confidence in their moral characters, and as abundantly able to sustain the cause of God's impartial grace in the sacred desk. The first has given frequent testimony of his abilities in our columns—but the modesty and other circumstances of the latter, have not made him as well known in this way as he deserves to be. May they prove good "yoke-fellows" in the glorious cause in which they are engaged, and long see the pleasure of the Lord prospering in their hands.

A. B. G.

UNIVERSALIST EXPOSITOR.

We have not particularly examined the May number of this work, and so can not give a critical opinion of its articles. It contains papers from the pen of H. Ballou, L. C. Browne, J. G. Adams, I. D. Williamson and the Editor. These names being a guarantee of its merit, we cordially recommend it to our readers, as worthy its valuable predecessors. We again call upon our friends, to patronize a work so important and useful to the Universalist public. E. H. C.

TO INQUIRERS.

I have a number of requests on hand for the explanation of various passages of Scripture, which I hope soon to find leisure to answer. Some have been on hand for months, but the press of other matters has caused me to delay them till I could find more leisure and room.

Correspondents generally must not be offended or discouraged if I make them wait—I have to wait, also, at certain seasons before I can publish what I wish.

A. B. G.

NOTICE.

The subscribers having disposed of the Universalist Register and Almanac, request all persons indebted to them for said work to make immediate payment to Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson, Utica; O. Whiston, Cooperstown; or to Geo. Sanderson, Rochester.

Utica, May 4, 1838. WHISTON and SANDERSON.

TO BR. P. MORSE.

Br. J. Van Fleet, our agent, in Bloomfield, Edgar county, Ills., says it is hoped by many of our friends in that section, that you will visit that county in your contemplated tour. And Br. Joseph Whipple, of Franklin Grove, Ogle county, (near Dixon's Ferry P. O.,) Ills., says the friends there hope you will not fail to visit them in your tour. Affectionately yours. A. B. G.

N. Y. STATE CONVENTION.

The ministers and lay delegates attending this Convention in Oxford, on the last days of this month, are requested to call, on their arrival, on Tuesday evening, the 29th inst., at the "FORT HILL HOUSE" in that village, where a Committee will be waiting to receive them, and direct them to places provided for them.

J. T. GOODRICH.

Br. Bazin—Send Expositor to L. E. Harrington Akron, Erie county, Rev. T. C. Eaton, Dunkirk, Chautauque county, M. Pierce, Hannibal, Oswego county, N. Y., G. H. Patrick, Kanawha C. H., Va., Warren Hawley, Milan, Huron county, O. Credit each $2. and charge G. and H.

Also send Expositor to W. G. Emmet, Columbus, O.

Br. Bazin, Please transfer the Expositor directed to me at Utica, to Richmond, Va.

Will Br. Price please do likewise with the Union.

E. H. C.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. MCADAM will lecture in the school-house near Br. Dick's, in Brothertown, next Sunday evening at 5 o'clock.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. C. S. BROWN, at Upper Lisle—Br. BRITTON at Denmark—Br. FRENCH, at Brownville.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. T. J. SMITH, in Columbus—Br. BRITTON at the Union meeting-house, Plessis—Br. GUILD, at the school-house near Peter Hanson's, at 10 A. M., and in Collersville at 3 P. M.—Br. ASPINWALL, at Middleville—Br. C. S. BROWN, at Binghamton—Br. SIAS, at Perch River, half past ten A. M., at Pamelia Four Corners at 2 P. M., and at 5 P. M. at the school-house near Br. Keyser's.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in June by Br. GUILD, in Richmondville at 11 A. M.—Br. DELONG, at Oran—Br. WOOLLEY, at Lebanon—Br. S. BARNES, at South Bainbridge—Br. C. S. BROWN, at Salina—Br. FRENCH, at Black River at 10 A. M. and at Carthage at 5 P. M.—Br. DOOLITTLE at the Great Brook meeting-house in South New-Berlin.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in June, by Br. ASPINWALL, at Eatonville—Br. BARNES in Springwater—Br. QUEAL, in Salina.

THE NEW-YORK STATE CONVENTION OF UNIVERSALISTS will meet in Oxford village, Chenango county, on the last Wednesday and following Thursday (30th and 31st) of May, inst. Delegates who can not attend, are requested to be careful to select substitutes who will. The following is a list of lay and clerical delegates from the several Associations.

Associations.	Lay Delegates.	Clerical Delegates.
Allegany,	J. D. Shuart, L. Vinton,	J. Babcock, P. P. Fowler.
Black River,	Isaac Mendall, Bezalcel Thayer,	P. Morse, J. H. Whelpley.
Cayuga,	Hon. W. Berry, Warden Babcock,	G. W. Montgomery, H. Boughton.
Central,	Charles Smith, Billy Titus,	A. B. Grosh, T. J. Smith.
Chautauque,	L. Harrington, J. I. Eacker,	L. Paine, T. C. Eaton.
Chenango,	E. G. Per Lee, E. W. Corbin,	A. G. Clark, E. E. Guild.
Hudson River,	B. A. Tillinghast, Dr. J. Braman,	T. J. Whitcomb, L. C. Browne.
Mohawk River,	T. Biddlecom, Sanford Coe,	J. A. Aspinwall, W. H. Waggoner.
New-York,	H. H. Brown, P. Price,	T. J. Sawyer, S. J. Hillyer.
Niagara,	Charles Lee, Z. Murdock,	L. Knapp, W. Andrews.
Ontario,	Ebenezer Cook, H. W. Dobbin,	O. Ackley, K. Townsend.
Otsego,	Cyrenus Clark, D. S. Hull,	O. Whiston, M. B. Smith.
St. Lawrence,	L. Buck. J. H. Hazleton,	F. Langworthy, O. Wilcox.
Steuben,	Dr. A. Baker, James Alley.	M. L. Wisner, A. Upson.

Occasional Sermon by Br. G. W. Montgomery.

ASSOCIATIONS.—The Central Association will meet in Lebanon, Madison county, on the first Wednesday and Thursday (6th and 7th) of June.

The Niagara Association will meet in Lewiston, on the same days.

The Mohawk Association will meet in Eatonville, Herkimer county, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (13 and 14th) of June.

The Black River Association will meet in Ellis village, (Ellisburg,) Jefferson county, on the third Wednesday and Thursday (20th and 21st) of June.

P. MORSE, Standing Clerk.

The Genesee Association will meet in Morganville, Genesee county, on the same days.

The Otsego Association will meet in Cedarville, Herkimer county, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday (27th and 28th) of June.

The St. Lawrence Association will meet in Malone, Franklin county, on the same days.

The Allegany Association will meet in Centreville, Allegany county, on the same days.

Each society belonging to any of the above Associations is earnestly requested to choose its delegates in proper season—to have their statistical letters made out—and to see that they are duly and properly represented in the Council to which each is attached.

The Central Association in Michigan will hold its annual session in Ann Arbor, Washtenaw county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, next. It is hoped that every preacher in the State will punctually attend, and an affectionate invitation is given to all others to "come over and help us." Churches and societies will be careful to send delegates properly accredited, and carefully insructed in relation to business to be transacted. N. STACY, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

W L W, Fort Plain, for J G S, D C, J H, W M S, J B, C S, H S, B G, D G, A C N, S T, J M, A A N, Mrs A, S S Jr, E L, J I L, A S, O W L, P F, R A and G H—Rev L P, Panama, for R D, M O, E W and L D—Rev H R, Rochester, for J H, J S B, N R, E A N, J R, D D D, A E D, J B, W H, J C, S W, W F C, C G C, C G, S M, A B, J W and C C—L S, Moreland, for self and J B—J H S, Poughkeepsie, for H D M, I N W and T N P—P M, Halfmoon, for W C and J B A—J R, Warren, (O) for self, J P, J H A and E R—J J, Northeast, (Pa) for self and R T—P M, Cuscowga, (Pa) for self and R T—P M, Patterson, (N J) for M A W—S M, McDonough, (Ga)—I B, Carlton's Store, (Va) for R W and S S—W K C, Otsdawa, for self, J H, A D B, C S H, N H and L H—A S, Brownville, for W K, N P, J B, L T, R B, W L, H L, H B, L C P and G W B—S G Mendon, for self, J H M C, J M, A P D, W L, R L, T L, H L and C C—J H Warsaw, for self, S H Jr, F F and C I B—Rev C S B, Coventry, for H D, H D, A B, M W, J L B, D C Jr, A D and G H—P M, Cooperstown, for B P, A W, E T 2d and H T—P M, Sheshequin, (Pa) for A M—P M, Oregon, for H S, W H P, J W and W G M—P I V, Cold Spring Mills, for self and Z W—P M, West Almond, for I B to D E, J B, E B, H L, J K and P F.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

FOREST DEVOTIONS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

The beautiful idolatry is dead,
Which made the poetry of classic times.
Earth's deities have fled. The fountains tell
No tales of sporting naiads, and the flowers,
By the redundant fragrence in their bells
Weighed down, like lowly vestals at their prayers,
Pour forth their incense at an empty shrine.
No virgin archer, with her silver bow,
Molests the fawn that lingers by the stream
To taste the sweet refreshment of its waves,
The rustic swain may wander through the wild,
Nor wake a dryad from the velvet sward,
Though with his reckless tramp he crush the flowers
That make the pillow of her fabled couch.
The Druid, too—the venerable priest,
Who made the grove the temple of his rites,
Ev'n he no longer lights the fatal flame,
And binds his brother to the wicker pyre.
The ancient oak yields to the soft embrace
Of reverend misletoe, and yet receives
No homage for the union. Earth's deities
Have flown—divinity is dead.

My God!
Thou who art dwelling in the humblest flower,
Existent in the mightiest and the least
Of all created loveliness, whose home
Has no locality—Thou a'rt the lone
The ever present Deity! There are,
Oh spirit of the universe! there are
No empty shrines, no wasted offerings!
All shrines are filled, all gifts received by Thee!
And fountains have a voice to speak of Thee—
A theme eternal as thy nature, God,
And wasteless as thy goodness!

Earth may praise
With all her magic tongues, and human lips
And human hearts may swell their eloquence;
The kneeling choir of seraphim may join
With cherubim and angels round thy throne;
But never, oh, Jehovah King of Hosts!
Shall mortal or celestial voices show
One visible fraction of thy goodness!
Here on this sod, made beautiful by Thee,
And fragrant with thine all-pervading love,
I bend my knee and bow my contrite heart,
Assured that never Druid lit a flame
So sweet to Thee, as the pure glow of love
Which thy own breath has kindled. But I kneel
Not lonely at thy footstool; by my side,
Bend, in their chastened beauty, a sweet group
Of vestal forest flowers; their tearful eyes
Upturned to Heaven; their fragile, sylphlike forms,
Bowed like young Magdalens; and on their lips,
Rich with an eloquence approved by Thee,
Their only auditor, rest radiant smiles
Of pure, confiding, all-beseeching love.
Beloved Father, while I pray with them,
To be a child of grace, and seek the crown
That their meek foreheads wear—the radiant crown
Of hope and peace—give me to wear with them
That small white pearl, more rare than Ceylon yields,
Known as humility. Aid me to be
Humble and lowly hearted as the flowers;
That I may turn away from earth, right glad
To seek their sisterhood; weary with pomp
And gaudy pageantry; with strife for rank
And worldly precedence; content to pass
My blessed hours of worship here, where pride,
The evil tempter of our innocence,
Has no admittance. Father, hear my plea!

Shirley village, Mass.

WORSHIP OF GOD.

Worship was performed by sacrifices in the early ages of the world. This was a wise adaptation to human weakness and wants. From the low state of his intellect man was not capable of that spiritual worship which we are able to render. We ourselves absolutely need outward forms in a greater or less degree. Much more man in the infancy of his nature. Of all things in creation, the most striking to the eye, and the most powerful in its effects, is the element of fire. Of all the things possessed by man, the most indispensable and dear, is the food that keeps us from perishing. What then would be more likely to make man think of God and his commands, than requiring him regularly to consume a portion of his fruits and flocks in that flame which ascended toward the heaven where God was supposed principally to have habitation? The same Being commanded the sacrifice, who instituted those laws the violation of which he would terribly punish. The sacrifice then was the best possible mode of impressing the mind with the remembrance of duty, and the danger of disobedience. Let it not be understood however, that fear and awe were the only emotions excited and kept alive by this service. Gratitude, especially in the purer patriarchal times, must have gone up with the offering. I think however that the sentiment of fear and awe must have been far stronger than any other. The worship was paid as to an authority that must be obeyed, rather than as to a goodness which should inspire gratitude and love. It could hardly have been otherwise from the circumstances that existed. Man was hardly enough of a philosopher to understand the true reason of the Divine appointment. It was best for him at that stage of human progress to be ignorant of the true reason. He felt pleased himself with the respect and the homage of his fellow-men, and he inferred that God was like him, and required homage for his pleasure. This same idea prevails at the present time among the heathen in respect to their many deities; and I believe also among the majority of Christians, in respect to the One living and true. They regard worship as demanded by God as his right, rather than as instituted by him merely for the benefit of themselves. And to this day religious service throughout the world is more generally performed from the compulsion of fear, than the excitements of gratitude.

And taking the majority as they have been and are perhaps now, the constraint of fear is the only motive powerful enough to induce that regular attention to religious services which has been shewn so important. Most of God's moral laws are simply the laws of nature expressed in language; and infringement of them is known by all to be accompanied by pain, bodily or mental, or to lead to it at length. Now if the fear of a supernatural power is absolutely necessary to make men obey the laws of their well-being felt to be established in their own constitutions, much more is it necessary to those other laws independent of nature, and established as mementos of the former. There are multitudes however among Christians who worship from the delightful impulses of love. The numbers are increasing as the parental character of the Deity is felt as well as believed. As knowledge accumulates, as reason is disciplined, and as education forms the man to proper habits from infancy upward, there will not be that need of fear as a motive to rectitude. Perfect understanding, perfect habits, and perfect love, cast out fear; and man is slowly but surely advancing towards this desirable consummation.

Worship, which has been occasional, periodical and abject, will become more continual, filial and joyful.—The idea of God will not come to mind merely from the solemn gloom and memorial forms of temples made and consecrated by human hands, or rush fearfully upon the heart from the intermissions of duty. It will be reflected from every object in creation with a various and exquisite charm, like the many-hued light which reveals those objects to view. It will be connected with all the sensations and thoughts and feelings which have been Divinely ordained to be the elements of human enjoyment. I do not say that the all-diffusive idea will be an uninterrnitted consciousness to the soul. It is not necessary, it is scarcely in the nature of mind to have it so. But it will always be present to particular reflection.—It will be duly felt to be the pervading essence, the unseen soul of the universe of happiness.

And will mankind forsake the assembling of themselves together for especial worship, and social communion with the common Father of their spirits? I trust not. Is it natural for children to come one by one only, with thankfulness and affection before the face of a loving and a loved parent? There is a gladness, there is a sublime felicity in a perfectly spiritual and filial worship which the offspring of Divinity can not but naturally seek at stated intervals. They will seek it as they desire the great end of all being, happiness. If it be not so, I know not others, and I know not myself.—The globes of heaven are fabled to make music in their sphere, and there is indeed an unuttered harmony passing all imagination. But there is a unison more imposing and delightful than this. It is in a fraternal, consentaneous congregation of worshippers; each one of the multitude having a separate consciousness, and an independent will, with power to send his thoughts on wanderings through immensity; but each one self-determined, collecting himself from his unlimited range, to one thought, one feeling, and one act—that of grateful adoration to the all-pervading, all-paternal God. It is a faint similitude of that melody of hearts, of that beauty of holiness which bursts from and adorns the congregation without number in that temple not made with hands, but spiritual and eternal in the heavens.

Such a worship, permanent and universal, may be, centuries in the future, unmeasured heights above the present; but however high in the tops of the mountains the Lord's house of blessed devotion may be established, the innate filial principle must be eradicated by miracle, if all nations, like rising waters, do not at length flow up into it. Isa. ii: 20.

COVETOUSNESS.

Rich people who are covetous, are like the cypress tree, they may appear well, but are fruitless; so rich persons have the means to be generous, yet some are not so, but they should consider they are only trustees for what they possess, and should show their wealth to be more in doing good, than merely in having it. They should not reserve their benevolence for purposes after they are dead, for those who give not till they die, show that they would not then, if they could keep it any longer.—Bishop Hall.

There is nothing wanting to make all rational and disinterested people in the world of one religion, but that they should talk together every day.—Pope.

MARRIAGES.

In Rochester, February 28th, by Rev. H. Roberts, Mr. JOHN L. CARY, to Miss MARY STILWELL.

Same city, March 11th, by the same, Mr. WARREN PIERCE, to Miss ANGELINE ROWLEY, all of Rochester.

In Butternuts, April 22d, by Rev. L. Hyatt, Mr. JAMES H. J. BARRETT, to Miss LUCINDA FANCHER, both of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Penfield, Monroe county, February 15th, Mrs. SOPHIA COOK, aged 28 years, wife of John Cook, and daughter of Joseph Dancy, seven years from England. She retired to rest in the evening in good health, and was found dead the next morning. She was an affectionate daughter and wife, a kind mother, a good neighbor, and a friend to the poor and distressed around her—in short, a practical, as well as a professed Universalist. The funeral was attended on the following Sunday, in the Universalist meeting-house in Fairport, by a large concourse of sympathising friends and neighbors. Sermon by the writer. May God comfort and bless the mourners. H. ROBERTS.

In Byron, Genesee county, May 1st, Mr. TALLCOTT FOSTER, aged 66 years. Mr. Foster was one of the first settlers in Byron, and was uniformly one of the most industrious and prudent citizens, and a believer in God's impartial grace, until a few weeks before his death, when, in consequence of pecuniary losses by the treachery of a neighbor, he became melancholy, and, as is believed, deranged, in which state of mind he committed suicide by hanging. Few men will be more missed in the circle of society in which he moved, than Br. Foster.

The funeral was held in the Free Will Baptist meeting-house, on the 3d inst., by a large congregation who sympathized with the deeply afflicted mourners and friends. Br. N. Sawyer, who delivered the funeral discourse from Rom. viii: 18–23, was kindly assisted in the services by Rev. Mr. Danforth (Methodist), and Rev. Mr. Holt (Baptist); and also united in prayers at the grave, for a blessing on the deeply mourning friends of the deceased. May God abundantly comfort them in their afflictions!

In Medina, May 1st, DANFORD ABBOTT, son of Roswell and Mary Storr, aged 17 months. Singular sermon on the 2d inst., by Rev. Mr. Allenson (Episcopalian), of Medina, from the singular text, Prov. i: 24–29. May God bless the mourners, and enable them to realize that "Jesus took young children in his arms, blessed them, and said, of such is the kingdom of heaven."

N. S.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MAY 25, 1838. NUMBER 21.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

BY S. R. SMITH.

ASTRONOMY.

It is, perhaps, one of the most extraordinary facts which have any bearing upon theology, that the very field which is most abundant in the overpowering evidences of the wisdom, power and goodness of the Deity, should yet be supposed to comprise a mass of testimony against the validity of a divine revelation. Such however is the case; and there are not wanting those who perceive the handy-work of a God in every orb that wheels through the regions of space, and who read lessons of the divine character and perfections in the solar system, who still seem to think it incredible that a direct revelation should be made to man: As if it were less marvellous that God should create unnumbered worlds—balance them in space, fix their motions, distances and orbits, and probably people them with races adapted to their respective climes, than that he should impart needed moral instruction and the evidence of the resurrection to the inhabitants of earth. And all this, merely because to reveal the truths of the Bible to mankind, supposes the intervention of what we term a miracle! But is any thing more miraculous than the existence, position and revolutions of the planets—the light and influences of the sun—the form, functions and faculties of man! To produce these, or any of these, was as palpable a violation of some pre-existing law, as the instantaneous healing of the sick, or the resurrection of the dead. For it should be remembered, that what we term the laws of nature were not in existence, until the system itself to which those laws are supposed to attach, was introduced into being.

1. The objection to the Mosaic history of the creation, derived from astronomy, is, that the sun, moon and earth are made the grand objects of creative energy, while the whole train of celestial constellations which deck the heavens, is for no other visible purpose than to amuse the fancy or please the eye of the beholder: Whereas, in truth, the solar system with all its parts and appendages constitutes but a mere point—an atom in the field of immensity; and all which astronomy has ascertained, might be struck out of existence, and scarcely, or not at all be missed by an inhabitant of another sphere. And that, however produced, there is no good reason to suppose that this earth was formed prior to the more important and ponderous parts of the system; and consequently, that the Scripture account of the creation is vague and absurd—especially that part of it which makes several days and nights without the sun, the only true cause of their existence.

It should be remembered that the Bible accounts for none of the phenomena of nature—it merely in this instance, informs us of the process by which nature itself was organized. And this is done, in the terms of a language as brief as can well be imagined. It enters not into the details, nor stoops to the minutiæ which may well be supposed to have been accumulated for the production of the grand result. Nor was it necessary, that in every instance the phraseology should be strictly philosophical and technical. It was enough, that it was intelligible—and it was precisely that form of description, which so universally obtains among mankind, and which the most scientific find it convenient to use in all their ordinary intercourse with other men. Whatever, then, may have been developed by the improvements of science—whatever may have been added to the stock of astronomical knowledge, especially by the assistance of the telescope, has very little, if any thing to do with the Scripture account of the creation. A proud and imperious hierarchy—jealous of its power and apprehensive of every advance of the human mind, may have been consistent with itself, and with its own maxims of policy in adjudging astronomy to be inconsistent with the doctrine of the church. And we shall probably find reasons of a far different nature from those connected with the account of the creation, for the extreme fastidiousness which the ruling ecclesiastics have betrayed respecting the subject. But it is very far from following, that the most enlarged and liberal views of astronomy, are incompatible with the Bible. Whether we shall succeed in convincing others of this fact, may be problematical; but we are fully satisfied with the consistency and propriety of the reasons which are offered for consideration.

Let any one take the trouble—for it is a trouble that few skeptics or unbelievers do take—to examine the first chapter of Genesis, and he must be extremely sharp-sighted to discover any thing especially exceptionable even to astronomical science, in the narration. The astronomer will no more deny than the geologist, that there was—indeed, that there must have been a time, when the process of organizing and modelling this earth, took place. And to all the purposes of the argument, it is perfectly immaterial whether it were an actual creation from nothing, or from pre-existing materials. The process is just what might be supposed would naturally occur under the fiat of Omnipotence. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." This is far, very far from saying that the organization of the whole physical universe then took place. And the evidence that so much was not intended, accumulates with every step we take in the procedure. In this stage of the process, we are not told that the several parts which are subsequently and immediately named, were reduced to perfect order. The contrary is asserted in the most express and comprehensive terms. So that there is room for the operation of the elementary laws, which were finally to regulate the vast machinery of the system, before the impression of a new mandate was felt by the new-born earth. For in the next place, we are assured that the "earth was without form and void"—destitute of its harmony of parts, empty, and unprovided with its furniture of animal and vegetable existences. The sun itself, possessed not the distinctive and remarkable properties, which subsequently constituted the all-important perfection of its character. "For darkness was upon the face of the deep."

The next step of the process was as obvious as it was necessary*—it was to light up the mass of confused elements; to diffuse over the chaos one of the fundamental principles of order. "And God said, let light be, and light was." There is no intimation in all this, that this light was concentrated in, or poured off in exhaustless radiation from the sun. There is no known principle of reason or philosophy which obliges us to suppose that this immense centre of our system was necessarily luminous. It could, and for any reason that man can give, would have been as opaque as any one of its planets, had not a benevolent Deity been actuated by higher objects in its creation, than merely to make it the centre of our system. The connection between gross matter, and light, is not so manifest as to force the conviction upon any mind that they must unavoidably co-exist—much less, is it obvious, that light must emanate from the sun, and from nothing else in our world. That it does so, is plain—but it must not be forgotten that it is the combined operation of a complete system which meets our view. And there may be as much propriety in the inference of an uninformed spectator of the operations of a steam engine, that the heat which generates the propelling power was always where he finds it, as in the supposition of astronomy that light was always and necessarily in the sun. That the mass which constitutes the body of that luminary, was in being, is more than intimated in the previous assertion that God "created the heavens and the earth." But it was quite another thing to render it luminous—and another still, to set the whole system in motion, so as to make day and night depend upon the revolution of the earth as well as on the light of the sun.

What is there then, so very unreasonable and unphilosophical in the Mosaic history, which asserts that "the evening and the morning," successively alternated, so long as light already existed, though the sun as a sun, was yet to be constituted the medium of illumination to the system? The only apparent difficulty is in the supposition, that there was no progression in the work of creation, and that the solar system was just what it now is. But we have no right to such a supposition. And if claimed in this instance, it subjects the claimant to the necessity of supposing, that every perfect machine, was always a machine, and always operated by the same principles which now govern its movements. It is to overlook the fact, that its respective parts were duly and separately arranged—designed to bear upon and influence each other, and by being put together—and put together just as it is, produces the results which were originally designed.

Thus, throughout this whole process, there is the constant appearance of order and progression—a gradual approximation to the completion of an immense plan. And there is no more good sense, or sound philosophy in denying the successive advances of the physical world to that state of perfection in which man finds it, than there would be, in denying that the human mind had made any progress in science. The astronomer may as well assert that man, six thousand years since, understood his favorite science as well as Newton—as to maintain that the moment the matter of the solar system was aggregated, its whole machinery was perfect and in "the full tide of successful experiment." The whole process of creation as stated in the first chapter of Genesis, is precisely such as might naturally and reasonably be supposed—and is probably as consistent in all its parts and results, as the great men who complain so much about it would be likely to adopt, were the important business of fabricating a new world, entrusted to their own hands. Certainly, the conjectures respecting this matter, with which they have yet favored the world, prove that they can yet imagine difficulties in the existing system, much easier than furnish remedies by which it may be improved. And we would respectfully suggest the propriety of their finding less fault with the history of creation given in the Bible, until they are able to show, with some degree of certainty, that they can account more rationally for the origin of our world. This, they have not yet done—nor are they at all likely to do it, unless the genius of infidelity should work greater miracles with human intellect, than any which the Bible has recorded. And even were this done, it would nullify the present skepticism of the world, by converting its subjects to a belief in miracles.

* Whewell on Astron. and Gen. Phys.—Bridgewater Treatises.

2. Another objection founded on astronomy, lies principally against the Christian system as maintained by the majority of its professors: it is, that among so many worlds, and systems of worlds, all probably peopled with rational and moral beings as well as this earth, and who may of course stand in equal need of the grace of redemption, it is scarcely probable that the Deity could condescend to visit our planet with so distinguished a favor as the sacrifice of his own and equal Son, to the exclusion of all other places of his creation. That were such a service required by the condition of the inhabitants of every orb, it would be strange partiality to pass them all by for the redemption of man, and still more strange, if he should visit them all with a sacrifice so vast as that which rescued the human race from the deepest perdition. And that if other worlds are peopled with intelligent beings, it is probable that they needed such service of mercy, as much as erring man.

There is manifestly something more than mere plausibility in this objection. And it has tasked the talents of some of the most distinguished theologians of the popular school, to furnish an adequate and satisfactory answer. Indeed, it is more than they have done. And it was the difficulty which this involved, that manifestly suggested the former antipathy to astronomy, and the consequent persecution of some of the most distinguished cultivators of that science. Few things ever have been more detrimental to the interests of Christianity, than the apprehension betrayed by the church, that "religion was in danger" from the discoveries and labors of scientific men. It has excited suspicions that all was not right—that there must be prevarication and imposture somewhere—or that there was a consciousness of weakness altogether incompatible with the pretensions so long made, and so vehemently urged. And these impressions were not confined to philosophers alone—they spread with the progress of astronomy, and have undoubtedly induced a silent skepticism in thousands of minds, which imbibed their doubts with their views of the system of the universe.

But the difficulty is neither in the strength of the objection, nor in the talents of those who have attempted its removal. It is wholly in the system which they have endeavored to defend, and against which, alone, the objection possesses any force. And it is not a little surprising, that such men as Chalmers, should never appear to discover the weakness of their own arguments in defence of the common hypothesis. They teach us a lesson of humility, by displaying such great talents rather in leading us from, than to the subject; and show their success in exhibiting the glory of God in the magnitude, number, and variety of his works, instead of confounding the adversaries of Christianity with the power of their arguments.

And how could it be otherwise, while they supposed the system of redemption consisted in the sacrifice of no less a being than one of the persons of the Godhead! Surely if other worlds have, like ours, sinning intelligences to atone for, the same sacrifice must be repeated, to all appearance, an infinite number of times! Or, all worlds except ours, must be passed by with neglect—or their inhabitants never sinned. But to deny that they have inhabitants, is contrary to analogy, and to the rational deductions of philosophy—to deny that they have sinned, will not satisfy the objector who has a right to infer so much, because man has transgressed—to suppose that God has made no provision for their redemption, is to stigmatize his character with partiality—and to suppose that his equal Son shall visit, in endless succession, every separate orb in creation, to make an infinite atonement for the sins of each, is more than any mind can presume. And it is not easy to conjecture a reason, why these things do not press upon the received system of a vicarious atonement.

Let it be admitted, then, that there are as many worlds as astronomy has ever yet imagined—that they are all peopled with moral and accountable races of beings—that these, their inhabitants, are so far like mankind, that they have all become transgressors, and need salvation, or redemption, as much as the inhabitants of this earth—and what then? It will not be denied that He who created all these, knows how to provide for all their wants, both physical and moral. It can not be doubted, that he is as certain to make suitable provision for all others, as for our little world and its inhabitants. And as we have abundant reason to believe, that he has instituted a process for the redemption of mankind, we need feel no solicitude for the fate of those with whose condition we seem to have no common sympathy. The astronomer may, with perfect propriety, give himself no trouble about the probable destiny of any or all of the inhabitants of other worlds. Nor do his objections actually amount to any thing more than the merest probabilities. And as such, the Christian is scarcely obliged to answer them. But since he will not be satisfied without an answer—since that answer must be consistent with itself, and with the Christian system, and with sound science—it must be given, for the sake of the objector, for the well-being of those within the sphere of his influence, and for the honor and vindication of the Scriptures of truth.

It has been stated, that the objection to the redemption of man, founded in astronomical science, lay not against the Bible doctrine of grace, but against the prevailing hypothesis. This will appear from the article on the nature of the atonement. From that, it will be seen that the condition of man, bad as it is, and was, did not require the immense sacrifice of the Godhead, nor of any supposed divine person participating of underived divinity. That an infinite sacrifice was neither called for, nor made; and that if it had been, it must be at the expense of justice, mercy, and truth. That the imputation of our crimes, and guilt, and punishment, to the Mediator, could not alter the temper of our minds, nor so improve our moral condition and character, as to render us worthy of our high destiny, or fit for the communion and fellowship of good spirits in the mansions of the blessed. In fine, that the Scriptures, instead of teaching such a system for our faith, taught a very different one, and one more consistent with the acknowledged attributes of God, and much more congenial with the condition and moral wants of the human race.

According to the Scriptures, the Saviour promised, was to be the offspring of one of the Hebrew patriarchs; and every prediction antecedent to his actual appearance, supposes him to be a divinely inspired man. From the New Testament, we learn, that while he claimed to be the Son of God as the Messenger of truth and grace, he called himself the "Son of man." His chosen apostles—the companions of his public ministry, and the witnesses of his miracles—denominate him "a man approved of God," "the man Christ Jesus," "the seed of Abraham," and who could be "tempted in all points like as we are, and yet without sin." He is familiarly styled "the high priest of our profession," "who could be touched with the feeling of our infirmities," and is uniformly represented as feeling our common wants, partaking the common sympathies of our nature, and suffering and dying like the rest of mankind. All this is utterly inconsistent with the notion that he was a self-existent God. The Deity partakes of none of the constitutional infirmities of man—can neither bear our form, feel our kindred sympathies, nor suffer any of our sorrows, or pains—nor die.

Hence it appears, that the Messiah, the Redeemer of lost man, was raised up from among men—a dutiful, and obedient, and affectionate son, sent with his Father's message of love to the rest of his family of erring children, not for the purpose of bearing their punishment—not to win for man the favor of his God—not to satisfy an offended and violated law for others—but to teach men truth, illustrate every virtue, and excite and confirm the hope of the resurrection. And what God has thus done for man, he can, and obviously will do for all other conceivable moral beings. He secured the redemption of this world, by means of resources which were at his disposal among its inhabitants. And for the people of every orb in the universe, he can perform a similar service, if necessary, and by similar means.

Where now is this mighty objection of astronomy, to the doctrine of redemption? Is it inconsistent with that science to suppose, what Christianity assumes and teaches, that men were transgressors—that Jesus came divinely inspired and empowered to call them back to the practice of virtue? Is not such a system of religious truth consistent with itself? Is it not also in perfect accordance with the testimony of the Bible? And if all this is done for the inhabitants of this world, what is there in it that is incompatible with the belief, that a similar work may be wrought for the inhabitants of every world in the field of astronomy? And if it was a part of the plan of divine goodness to soothe us under our afflictions, to mitigate our sorrows by giving the proof of the resurrection of the dead, what is there in the belief that the Deity may confer a similar blessing, by similar means, on all supposable intelligent mortals, so inconsistent with the deductions of astronomy? The Christian thanks God that such a revelation has been made, and enters by prelibation upon the blessings and glories of immortality. The greatest astronomer who ever honored that science or human nature by his discoveries, and by the improvements which he made in the system, was a Christian. And his views of the character of Jesus, and in consequence, of the nature, and duties, and objects of his mission, made him both the first of astronomers, and a consistent Christian. Such was Newton,* and such will those yet be, who, like him, read the lessons of divine wisdom and goodness in the heavens, and in the earth. He never blamed the Bible, because it gave him no information respecting the laws of attraction and gravitation, nor called in question its authenticity because it did not inform him whether the most active agent in the elementary constitution of the earth, was fire or water. And let a similar humility direct his followers, and astronomy will become the handmaid of revelation.

It should not be overlooked, nor forgotten, that the Bible makes no pretensions to any science—save that of religion. That, in all its modifications and bearings, as a revelation from God, is its only theme—exclusive of the history of the extraordinary people by whom, and through whom it was made. And when compared with the systems of religion which all other works have ever proposed, which have prevailed in any age or country, it alone appears worthy of its divine Original—worthy of the adoption of the beings for whom it was intended. The God whom it presents to our devotions, the purity which it requires in his worshippers, the hopes which it inspires in the breast of the believer—all tend to improve the character of man, and render him more and more worthy of the high place which he holds in the system of being. And the more the heavens and the earth are scanned—the more

*Newton was constrained to reject the doctrine of the trinity and a vicarious atonement: and believed in, and wrote largely on the subject of, the Divine Unity, as well as in favor of the Christian system. How much he was influenced in his opinions respecting the character of Christ, by his discoveries in astronomy, does not, that we recollect, distinctly appear; but it might be well for others to consider his views of theology with more attention, before they reject Christianity as incompatible with astronomy.

the harmony and adjustment of the system of the universe are studied—the better the constituent elements of physical nature are understood—the more obvious and convincing will become the great and fundamental truth of the Bible, that "in the beginning, GOD created the heavens and the earth."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;
FOR SUNDAY, MAY 27, 1838.

JOHN XV: 1-11.

It is probable that Jesus delivered the address contained in the 14th chapter of this Gospel, while himself and the eleven were yet reclining, in the usual manner with Asiatics, at the supper table. From the latter part of that chapter, and especially from the last verse, we would be inclined to suppose that he had brought his farewell address to a close, and that he now thought it was time to go forth to that retirement where, he knew, his betrayer would seek and find him. He seems to have thought that it was now time to bestir himself in carrying the will of his Father into execution, and not to appear at all backward or unwilling to move, even when that will was to carry him to insult, torture, and death. He rose from the table with the intention to go out of the city, but love to the cause, love to his disciples who were to be left behind him to prosecute that work which he had begun, and probably the sight of a vine climbing up by the window of the room in which they were, detained him in their company, and for their further comfort, and suggested the discourse to which we are about to proceed.—Some think that this discourse was suggested by the presence of a vineyard, as Jesus and his disciples were passing out of the city on his way to Gethsemane. We agree with these in supposing it altogether very probable that the discourse took the turn or form which it did, from some vine or vineyard being in sight. In preceding "Mails," we have had many opportunities of remarking how common it was with our wise Teacher, to take occasion from some passing event, or some remarkable object under notice, to enforce some useful lesson. Agreeably to this customary mode of instruction, we think a vine or vineyard was under notice at the time; but we think it more likely that the address suggested by it, was delivered in a room, than upon a road. Let this, however, be as it may; and let us now seek to understand, and to be benefited by the discourse itself.

In the first verse, Christ compares himself to a vine, and again in the fifth verse, where is further added the comparison of his disciples to the branches. We have frequently asked ourselves this question—In what consists the analogy or resemblance between our Saviour and a vine, and his disciples and the branches? We have looked into many commentaries for a satisfactory answer to this query, but in none of those examined, have we found entire satisfaction. We have, in the mean while, rested in the following mode of reply to our query, as the most satisfactory of any which has occurred to us. A vine is planted in the earth by the owner or vine-dresser, in order that the branches may shoot out abundantly, and bear clusters of fruit luxuriantly. So, Jesus was raised up in this world for a certain purpose, even the amelioration of the physical, mental, and moral condition of his brethren. The spirit which animated, supported, characterized him, was to be transfused into the heart and the conduct of his followers. Without a participation in this spirit, none are truly his disciples. Those in whom this spirit dwells, not only advance themselves by repeated efforts and gradual steps to the likeness and perfection of Jesus, but they become centres or foci, whence issue beams of the same celestial fire, enkindling the latent materials in the bosoms of those who may be within the circle of their influence. Thus the work of Christianizing men—of ameliorating the human condition—of transforming men into the Divine likeness—proceeds in our world. For this purpose did God raise up Jesus, and made him head over all things unto the church, which is his body. Self-dedication to this object, and conscious co-operation with Jesus, constitute that union with the Prime Mover in the cause which is represented by the connexion between a branch and the parent stem.

In the first and every subsequent age of Christianity, there were and have been some who professed themselves disciples of Jesus—who admitted, or rather, could not deny, that Jesus was a Teacher come from God, who yet did not act conformably to this admission, and in whom his words brought forth no fruit. With such God dealeth as the vine-dresser does with a barren branch. And do we not sometimes see that those who make a profession of Christianity, without cultivating the virtues enjoined and practised by its Founder, become hardened and more insensible to heavenly influences, and the monitions of conscience, than such as have newly become acquainted with the claims of our Heaven-sent Master? On the other hand, the true, the practical disciple of Jesus, receives from the God of our salvation, such aids in his upward efforts, as a fruitful branch receives at the hands of a judicious dresser. And have we not experienced it to be a law of our moral constitution, that every effort in promoting the amendment of ourselves or others, is followed by an increased attachment to the work, and by an increase of vigor for its prosecution? Such is the will, the appointment of the Father.

The third verse we read somewhat differently from the common version, thus: "Now be ye like pruned branches, through means of the words which I have spoken unto you." A comparison of this with Christ's prayer in the 17th chapter, "Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth," will make the sense readily apparent. In the revelations which Jesus has made of the Father, and of our relation to Him, are we to seek for those assistances in our Christian race and labors with which it has pleased Him to furnish the genuine disciple.

The 4th, 5th, and 6th verses, convey very nearly the same sentiment. The disciple, in order to be an efficient "worker together with God," must partake with Jesus in his devotedness to the cause for which he was raised up, in the spirit of self-sacrifice and self-dedication to the Divine will. This appears to be the meaning of these three verses.

In the 10th verse, Jesus tells his disciples how they may retain his love and affection to them.—They had witnessed his earnest prosecution of the work which the Father had given him to do; and in order to maintain his attachment to them unabated, they had only to give themselves with a like promptitude and energy, to whatever they knew or supposed to be according to his wishes. Acting by the same rule, will secure to us the welcome, "Well done, good and faithful servant," and in the present life, a peace which passeth understanding. May Jesus have many such devoted followers in this generation: their reward—a rich one—is certain. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

BENEFICENCE IN SPIRIT.

BY REV. W. ROUNSEVILLE.

"Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you."

Reader, are you of the number that heeds the instruction contained in this best of rules? Your neighbor is in affliction, and do you do unto him as you would that he should do to you? Do you pour into his wounded mind the oil and wine of consolation? Do you show by all those little kindnesses which should have a place in your heart, that you sympathise with him in his distresses? Do you dry the mourner's tear, and soothe the sorrow of the lone widow, and supply the wants of the desolate orphan? When the half famished mendicant craves your charity, do you satisfy his desires, and supply his necessary wants? or do you first "inquire the cause that made him poor, or why he help demands?" Do you, when you behold the wants and necessities of your fellow-creatures, do you relieve them without subjecting them to the humiliation of asking your assistance? Do you do it cheerfully, and with a free will, or does popularity constrain you to be generous? Place yourself, then, in the same situation: could you receive the gift of a haughty lordling who must know your whole history before he satisfied your wants? Would you not be ashamed to beg? and yet you must live. Do ye, then, to others as ye would that they should do to you. Wait not until the child of misfortune begs your assistance, for so ye would not that they should do unto you. But in all things obey the command of the text, and thou shalt be happy.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SUSPICIONS REMOVED.

Mr. EDITOR—In your paper of March 16th, (volume ix, number 11,) there is a communication from Ashley Clark, of Elbridge, N. Y., containing some aspersions on my character, to which I hope, through the columns of the "Magazine and Advocate," you will give me an opportunity of replying. I will endeavor to be brief.

A little more than two years ago, Mr. Clark subscribed to me for "Chambers' Edinburgh Journal," and paid one year's subscription ($1,50) in advance. It appears the publication has not been sent, and Mr. C. has published the circumstances, accompanied with his suspicions that I was not a responsible agent.

The fault was not mine. The office, and almost every thing connected with it, were burnt down by the great fire in New-York, and the publication has not, to the best of my knowledge, ever been resumed. On finding that the Journal was not forwarded, I suspended operations, and immediately wrote to the publisher to ascertain the cause—although I wrote repeatedly, I received no reply. At a considerable expense to myself, and for the sole benefit of the subscribers, I went to New-York twice—the first time, the publisher assured me the Journal would soon be recommenced, and regularly continued. On finding that it did not come, however, I went down a second time, and seeing but little probability of its being early resumed, I brought all the complete sets of the preceding volume, which had escaped the fire, (amounting to nearly seventy volumes,) and distributed them among the subscribers so long as they held out: there were only five individuals who were not supplied, and among that number was Mr. C. I did not obtain a single subscriber after I knew or suspected that the publication would not be sent; and I afterwards used every endeavor to obtain what I could as an equivalent for those who had subscribed.

If Mr. C. has any doubts as to my being a duly appointed agent, I would refer him to the latest numbers of the Journal, where my name is published as agent. I have also a communication in my possession from the publisher.

Mr. C. also writes, that I have been an agent for the Knickerbocker, Blackwood's Magazine, etc. This is correct. Until within the last nine months, I have been an agent for all the foreign Reviews, Blackwood's Magazine, etc., as Mr. C. can easily see by looking at the list of agents—my name is published as agent for New-York State. I would also refer Mr. C. to John S. Furman, Skeneateles, or Dr. J. K. Brown, Seneca Falls, both of which gentlemen I appointed agents for the above works. I would confidently refer Mr. C., or any one interested, to the publishers of Blackwood's Magazine, Knickerbocker, New-Yorker, or Christian Library.

Above, Mr. Clark has a statement of the circumstances—as he has the means of satisfying himself as to my responsibility as an agent, I hope he will regard it but an act of justice publicly to allay any suspicions his communication may have excited. I would also add, that if Mr. C., with a knowledge of the circumstances, is still dissatisfied, by writing me here, I will refund the money out of my own pocket. WM. ELDER.

Minaville, Montgomery county, May 19th, 1838.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 24.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., April 30th, 1838.

Sir—The ninth day has brought me your last defence of Universalism. If an array of gratuitous epithets and abusive sentences can sustain your cause, it is in safe keeping. Any one with Johnson, Walker, or Webster in his hands, can find reproachful epithets enough to cover the brightest name and to bedaub the fairest reputation in Christendom. To all which, were I able to reply, I need not. Our readers will doubtless understand it. As your cause becomes desperate, we expect desperation on your part; and the first paragraph of your epistle assures us we shall not be disappointed.

2. Your Greek and your Greek authorities, it must now be obvious to all, have assumed the garb of sackcloth and ashes and gone into mourning. You now say you did not derive aidios from ades. Why did you then throw dust in the eyes of your readers? Why introduce that hypothesis when you say you did not believe it! You now place your respectable critics in the past tense, and vow that they were respectable critics when they were Universalists; and only allege that Kneeland's turning Atheist can not nullify his Universalian erudition! You talk of ridicule—and yet you ridicule yourself! Call the devil a saint when you call Kneeland a scholar or a critic. I said you could not name a respectable critic or a lexicographer that sustained your assertion. You have now twice proved that you can not.

3. I called for your authority for deriving aidios from aei and dios, and you now give me yourself for authority! And yet you talk of my ridiculing you! Why, Sir, you ridicule yourself. It was not necessary, you say, that lexicographers should so derive it, because it is so plain!! And you talk of pedantry!! And to cap your splendid climax, you proceed to find in aeternus a root and reason for ternus in sempiternus. This is as fatal to your reputation as your other learned criticisms; for ae in aeternus is the Latinized aei, with the termination ternus. So that ternus is no more a root of sempiternus than simus is of grandissimus, or rimus of pulcherrimus.

4. And, as if you had not sufficiently exposed yourself, you call in M. Jones as authority against Robinson, to derive aperantos from aperaino.—The hardest task that I could have assigned me, next to striking fire out of lead, would be to discuss any question in language with a person who is wholly uneducated in its construction. Positively, Sir, Messrs. Jones and Robinson derive aperantos from the same root, for peraino, is itself only a form of peras, the genuine root of aperantos and aperaino. You talk of pedantry! You compelled the discussion of Greek and Hebrew words, and yet you talk of pedantry!! And when I refuse to expose all your folly, as on 2 Cor. iv: 7, "a far more exceeding and eternal," you intimate that it is because I could not do it. What a magnanimous opponent I have found in you, Sir! If I expose your ignorance, I am pedantic; if I do not, I am a coward!

5. After you had commenced your last proposition, you return to the third, and offer a new batch of words as absolutely declarative of duration without end, which might have been applied to punishment had it been endless. This is your design in introducing them, if other design than to blindfold your readers you had. Now, Sir, these ex-post facto words—(for when you go on to a new proposition, it is ex-post facto to go back and offer new arguments on the preceding, as indicated in our rules)—I say these ex-post facto words are wholly out of the record: for in the whole New Testament they are not applied to heaven or happiness, to God, angels, or men—indeed they are not to be found in the whole Testament even once!! And when found in profane authors, they are ten times applied to things that have an end for once they are found applied to any thing endless in duration—just as their representatives are in our language: for example, how often have we the words deathless and immortal applied to fame and infamy—to glory, honor, and disgrace. So in Latin, Greek, and every other language dead or alive.

6. I take no advantage of your having misspelled the words you quote; for akeratos means without horns: but I presumed you intended akeeratos, pure, etc., etc. So dies the reinforcement, and so end your three propositions, and the edifying defence of Universalism in its Latin, Greek and Hebrew arguments for an English community!! As you beg to be excused for not answering the major part of my last letter, for reasons which all our readers can easily understand, I beg leave now to address the candid and inquisitive part of our readers, while I leave you for a few moments to reflect upon the posture of your affairs as the campaign now stands.

7. Courteous and inquisitive readers, I think an apology and an explanation are justly due to you for both the matter of this controversy and the manner in which it has been hitherto conducted. I am not censurable for introducing such a logomachy as we have just now finished: for, from the beginning to the last letter, I have objected to it as inexpedient, unnecessary, and unedifying to the nine-tenths of our readers. But I am censurable, you will say, for having consented to it.—Well, perhaps, I am. Strike, then, but hear my explanation.

8. 1st. Universalists are incessantly preaching and writing about those words, and by their bold assertions and supercilious denunciations of certain translators and lexicographers, have succeeded in forming a considerable party of refugees, with barely as much moral cement as serves to keep a particular mass together for two or three years in any one place. Baptized into this faith, Deists, Skeptics, Atheists, Mammonites, and all, suddenly become liberal Christians, under the pleasing hope that heaven is capacious enough for them all, without any holiness on this side of the grave: for the system provides for all by making death itself a purgatory for some, or by appending to it a few thousand years punishment in Mr. Skinner's post mortem purgatorial fires.

9. 2d. Now to have peremptorily and absolutely refused to discuss these words, would have been trumpetted by some dozen of Universalian Telegraphs through all the length and breadth of this land, as an irrefragable proof that we were unable to sustain our cause but through the unfaithfulness of the common translation, or popular ignorance of the true and proper force and meaning of the ancient languages. Learning also that some honorable though uneducated persons, chiefly young men, were inveigled by such representations, we consented to the dry and prosing drudgery of a verbal controversy, especially as we had the guarantee that what we should write upon this subject would be laid before the Universalian community; and I had so much confidence in the liberality of my regular and constant readers, that, however useless such a disquisition might be to them, they would cheerfully allow me a few pages for the benefit of those whom they can not but regard as wholly deceived on this awfully important subject.

10. 3d. And as to the manner in which I have prosecuted this investigation, I frankly acknowledge that it has been most repugnant to my feelings.—Regarding all religious controversy, however expedient and necessary, as in some degree detrimental to the sanctifying and consolatory power of the Gospel on those engaged in it, I never enter upon it with the same feelings and delight, nor do I prosecute and terminate it with those pleasurable emotions and results which accompany any other method of inculcating, illustrating, or propagating truth. On this occasion, too, I undertook it with more reluctance than ever before, because I did not think the question an interesting one to my readers in general; because the subject itself, on the authority of revelation, is so plain and intelligible as, not without unusual violence on one side, to admit of debate at all; and because in all my readings I had never had the good fortune to meet with an able and candid debater in all the ranks of Universalianism. In coming into the arena under such circumstances and with such opponents, one feels as if he trod on forbidden ground; and therefore if I have a right conception of how Michael felt when he contended with satan about the dead body of Moses, I feel a good deal out of sorts, as I imagine he must have felt on such an encounter!

11. 4th. Besides, the perversity and obliquity of every errorist must always be in the ratio of the plainness and magnitude of the truth which he opposes; and to manage such spirits without exposing their follies and rebuking their hardihood, is as unavoidable as it is necessary to save the uncorrupted from the snare which intentionally or unintentionally they have laid for their feet.

12. 5th. Now as Mr. Skinner is perfectly accomplished in all that species of garniture requisite to his being one of the most popular, artful, and specious of the defenders of that system; and as he had long flourished by dint of his Hebrew, Greek, and Latin lore, so as to be regarded as the Magnus Apollo, of his party, and withal reckless, bold, and dogmatical to a proverb, it threw upon my hands the painful task of exposing the nakedness of the land and of denuding the man of his gratuitous and unfounded pretensions to a knowledge of the language of Scripture and well-established rules of interpretation.

13. 6th. If, then, I have gone into details—into plain, blunt, and unvarnished expositions of mere pretence, and of false assumption; if I have taken off my gloves and at any times sharpened my pen, I did so because in my judgment no other means were adequate to the occasion. It has indeed been a great trial of my feelings to have to descend to such expositions; but when I think how prophets and apostles, and the great Teacher himself had to stand in the arena with all sorts of spirits, and to answer fools and madmen sometimes according to their folly, and sometimes not according to it, I feel myself, however impinged in my feelings, justified in my conscience in the course which I have just now finished.

14. 7th. Mr. Skinner's Hebrew, Greek, and Latin arguments are certainly transfixed to the core if they ever had any. He has fully shown, by all his blunders, first and last, that aei, whether by itself or in composition with any other word, does signify absolute eternity; and that there is no other word in any language more indicative, indeed none except its own representatives, so indicative of endless duration. He has shown us aei by itself, in aioon, in aidios, in æternus, and in every form, as the word which himself argues would have imported the endless wo of the wicked had it been so used. This he has positively and repeatedly, though ignorantly done.

15. 8th. His assertions about authorities have been fully shown to be of no credit. When his reputation has been suspended upon his redeeming his pledges, I need not repeat how it has been left to totter, to its entire prostration. This may have been the consequence of ignorance rather than of perversity; but this is a matter of which every one will think for himself despite of all that he or I may write about it. Should he now introduce the subject of verbal controversy after the ecclaircissement now before the community, I should feel myself acting out of character to spend another paragraph in reply to him. His assertions about the meaning of foreign words must now pass with us as matters of course, which will excite no more attention than the constant and monotonous lashing of the waves against the shore.

16. 9th. It is indeed a subject of awful moment, if, apart from the canting style and insulting diction of the letter before me, we could be permitted to examine and discuss it. I shall endeavor that the sequel be more intelligible and interesting to all my readers: for I think there is much more useful matter of reflection which may come in our way in the common sense and scriptural view of the whole subject, which remains to be taken. We shall again, after this apology and explanation, return to Mr. Skinner.

17. In your courteous style, Mr. Skinner, you ask me, paragraph 9, for my authority for certain conclusions; and politely add, "that I well knew that you had never said any thing resembling such ideas." I well know that in Letter xxi, paragraph 20, you say that notwithstanding all their pains, the brutal creation "still love life and cling to it, and doubtless on the whole enjoy much more than they suffer." "We, too," you add, "esteem life a blessing, and cling to it maugre all its troubles." And what is this but to say with the poet, "It is better to bear the ills we have, than fly to others that we know not of"?—virtually making the love of life the choice of evils. "To be, or not to be," that is still the question which reason without the Bible can not decide. We also argued on your allegata, that God is either just or unjust in inflicting present pain for trasgression. If he can not justly inflict eternal pain for eternal reasons, we argue that he can not inflict temporal pain for temporal reasons: but he does the latter: therefore he is either unjust in the little or unjust in the much. Your system makes him unjust in little that he may be just in much—mine represents him just in little and in much.

18. But you justify this injustice by assuming that temporal sufferings are means to a certain end. Well, be it so, if you please, and I assume, with more reason, that eternal punishment is a means to eternal ends, and that these ends are perfectly compatible with perfect justice and benevolence. If you, Sir, will explain the justice of the pains and sufferings of our stage and waggon horses in any way that will not justify the eternal pains of him that wickedly and wantonly causes them to suffer, I will answer the hardest question in your Catechism. But you can escape from all difficulties on your present plan of disposing of the three-fourths of my last letter, by reproaching it and begging to be excused for not replying. Our readers, however, know how to interpret this.—"They are sour grapes," said the fox, when he saw he could not reach them.

19. Your parade about a priori reasonings is wholly gratuitous and unworthy of any respect. Still, lest you or any one should imagine that it has any sense in it, I observe—that to prove a fact from an established first cause or law of nature, is a priori reasoning good and valid. But to suppose a law of nature or of the divine perfections—and then farther to suppose that law to be an adequate cause for an effect, is a priori reasoning false and deceitful in the superlative degree. And this is precisely your case, as I will abundantly prove. You imagine the laws and the causes of your effects by a priori reasonings, and, without detecting the sophistry, substitute your hypotheses for facts. Now-a-days we find out the laws of nature and of the divine government, so far as reason is employed, by reasoning a posteriori from the facts, effects, and events, up to their causes. You place your interpretation of the divine perfections for the perfections themselves. This is your first hypothesis. Then you imagine what will be consistent with these divine perfections. This is your second hypothesis. And finally you disprove eternal punishment because it is incompatible with both your first and second hypotheses. With half this expense of hypothesis you might fully prove the utter impossibility of the origination or existence of any moral or physical evil in God's creation. Had I supposed you could not have understood this, I should doubtless have fully explained it.

20. That you reason from hypothesis to facts is a truth which must not only be obvious to the uncommitted reader; but this alone fully explains your disquisitions upon the divine perfections. When I read over your preceding speculations upon the divine perfections, believe me I was forcibly reminded of the reasonings of one who first whispered to mankind, "No danger! Eat:" "you shall be as gods, knowing both good and evil." "God is too good to punish you:" "You shall not surely die." "God is love, infinite and immutable love: he can not punish sin!" How much truth in these hypothetical reasonings? Just as much as there is in yours. You have said many things about the divine perfections which I cordially approve. In the one hand you present a glass of pure water, but before it reaches our lips you infuse into it a few drops of adulterated wine, which discolor and vitiate the whole of it.

21. To illustrate: You say some correct things on four propositions:—God is omniscient; God is infinitely good; God is omnipotent; God is omnipresent. Three of these propositions are scripturally expressed; one of them is not. You introduce mathematical or metaphysical infinity in one proposition, and from your application of that term, you poison all the good things you have said. "His understanding is infinite," says the Bible; but no where does it say he is infinitely good. This is as apocryphal as your quotation from the book of Wisdom to prove it. It was homogeneous enough for you to quote the Apocrypha, as you have done, to prove this apocryphal interpolation. If two lines incline to each other at either end they are not parallel, and will when projected form an angle. So your interpolated proposition when extended contradicts the Bible: for God has not been infinitely good to the devil, nor infinitely good to Adam, nor to you, nor ever can be on your own mathematical reasonings: for Sir, if your head only ache once in a million of years, God never can be infinitely good to you!! your theory being that omnipotence can prevent whatever infinite goodness dictates. He that practically admits your reasonings to be correct, takes a viper into his bosom, poisons his own bliss, and drinks to himself eternal death.

22. Your reasonings on God's perfection are false and most pernicious. Your trilemma is a mere trick in logic. I can make a child see through its folly. 1. "God," you say, "could save all mankind, but would not; or, 2, he would save all, but could not; or, 3d, he can save all mankind, and will save all." This is your trilemma. Here is another constructed after its model: "God could save all men from all temporal evils, but would not; or, 2, he would save all men from all temporal evils, but could not; or, 3, he can save all men and will save all men from temporal evils." Now, Mr. Skinner, choose the first, and you impugn God's benevolence and infinite goodness; choose the second, and you impugn his omnipotence; choose the third, and you declare a falsehood. Repair, then, your trilemma, if you can. In the same easy mode we can explode all your reasonings upon mathematical omnipotence, goodness, omnipresence, etc.

23. You reason most sophistically upon the word possible. You think of one perfection only when you use this word, namely, the power of God. I think of all his perfections. The word "possible" in my mouth has respect to all the perfections of God viewed together—in yours it has respect to simple power. Many things are impossible to the whole person called Mr. Skinner, which are quite possible to a part of him. It is impossible for the whole Mr. Skinner to be a matricide, patricide, a fratricide, a filiicide, a suicide; and yet if Mr. Skinner have such relatives it is possible for a part of him to commit any one of these deeds. Singular logic in your ears, Sir; but it is true logic. The whole Mr. Skinner can not do what a part of him can do! Neither can the whole Creator do what a part of him could most easily perform. God can only do what is consistent with all his perfections.

24. He is supremely good to the whole universe; but he can not be infinitely good to any member of it that ever suffered a single pain! Thus we dispose of your little universe of 1000 persons, each one capable of 1000 degrees of bliss, a million of bliss in all; but should only one of them fail of this state, whether annihilated or cursed with eternal wo, then your universe is minus 1000 degrees of possible bliss. Hence you add, "He would not produce the greatest possible amount of good to the whole." We shall now see how much logic is in your mathematically happy universe. Suppose that each one of your 1000 genii has suffered during the first part of his being a thousand earthly agonies, designed you say for his ultimate bliss; but which your Deity of omnipotent power and infinite goodness might have prevented by making and keeping him from the necessity of suffering these 1000 agonies—then your universe fails by a million of agonies of all possible bliss, through the infinite goodness and almighty power of its author! On your premises and conclusion God can not be infinitely good to any man who has suffered on earth only a single agony; for he has been that agony minus infinite bliss. So ends your mathematical universe of mathematical bliss. Our theory is, that God's government will secure to his own universe the greatest possible good at the least possible expense of evil. But evil, moral and physical, is an unavoidable attendant on rational agency; and if God had not permitted, controlled, or punished it in some instances, and pardoned it in others according to its meaning and desert, his justice, holiness, wrath, condescension, mercy, never could have been known at all, and none of his other perfections could have been so fully developed and glorified; consequently God could never have been enjoyed by any creature.

25. You eulogize the proposition God is love. A glorious proposition it is. I rejoice with joy unspeakable in the belief of it. But you pervert it the moment you change the subject into the predicate, and say, "Love is God." In this you err, as much as should you change the proposition, "God is Light" into Light is God, or God is Spirit and Spirit is God. You say love is almighty, omniscient, omnipresent, etc., and why not say that love is jealous, just, true, indignant, not acquitting the guilty, but visiting the iniquities of fathers upon their children to the third and fourth generation of them that hate God? But this would not suit your purpose.

